Forgoing the money and avoiding the trigger "really allows people like me who are technical experts to work for the government," he said.Steptoe Children

The merger of law firms Collier Shannon Scott and Kelley Drye & Warren earlier this year sent a group of lawyers and lobbyists from Collier Shannon looking for a new home because of a client conflict.

The Scott Group represents retailers concerned about the fees they have to pay banks on credit card transactions. Kelley Drye represents J.P. Morgan. (The merged firm in Washington is Kelley Drye Collier Shannon.)

The Scott Group, which includes former representative Thomas J. Bliley Jr. (R-Va.), just landed at Steptoe & Johnson, a D.C. law firm that has a respectable regulatory practice but isn't known for a big legislative practice -- a point in its favor, said Douglas S. Kantor, a Scott Group member and a Department of Housing and Urban Development official in the Clinton administration.

But Steptoe folks "know and understand Washington and how the legislative function fits in," Kantor said.

Steptoe Chairman Roger Warin said members of the group are strong professionally and known for "substance and strategy, rather than just influence peddling."

Other members of the Scott Group include: Scott A. Sinder, former member of the executive committee of Collier Shannon; James D. Barnette, former general counsel of the House Energy and Commerce Committee; Leslie Belcher, former chief of staff to Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.); Suzie Brewster, a lobbyist for more than two decades whose husband is former representative Bill Brewster (D-Okla.); R. Timothy Columbus, chairman of the government relations practice at Collier Shannon; and John P. Fielding, former senior counsel at the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.Here and There

Also moving about town . . . Health-care specialist Stephen J. Northrup has joined Arent Fox in the law firm's government relations group. He most recently was health policy director for the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions.

Democratic strategist and lobbyist Steve Elmendorf has set out on his own, forming Elmendorf Strategies, after a stint at law firm Bryan Cave. Like the Scott Group, Elmendorf ran into client-conflict issues. He would have been prevented from representing a coalition of companies with patent issues because of a conflict with a Bryan Cave client. Joining him from Bryan Cave: Kristi Kennedy and Jessica McEwen.

Gail MacKinnon, senior vice president for government relations at the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, is leaving for Time Warner Inc., where she will be senior vice president for global public policy. Succeeding her will be Steve Vest, a vice president there, who earlier worked for Bracewell & Giuliani and then-House member Bill Richardson (D-N.M.).

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Aims To Move Beyond Rhetoric (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Top U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill said yesterday that he will push for "measurable, concrete progress" to end North Korea's nuclear weapons programs when regional talks resume this weekend in Beijing after a break of more than a year.

Just over two months after Pyongyang stunned the world by conducting its first nuclear test, Mr. Hill said in a State Department briefing that China has offered the United States "unprecedented cooperation" in recent weeks in pressing the North to return to the stalled "six-party talks."

Both China and the United States have talked directly with North Korean diplomats about reviving the talks, and both Beijing and Washington reject the idea that North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test has given the isolated communist nation permanent status as a "nuclear power."

"The Chinese have also been in direct contact with the North Koreans on several occasions, and they also have reason to believe that we will see some specific ideas for moving ahead," said Mr. Hill, undersecretary of state of East Asian affairs.

Negotiators for the six countries -- the United States, China, North and South Korea, Japan and Russia -- are set to meet Sunday night in Beijing for the first time since Pyongyang's nuclear test. Mr. Hill said he anticipated this round of talks would last at least a week and he hoped to be home by Christmas.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters Tuesday that a deadline on the talks was not firm and that the goal remains the same: complete denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

In a concession to Pyongyang, parallel U.S.-North Korea talks on U.S. financial sanctions against the North will begin at virtually the same time Sunday in Beijing. Pyongyang has harshly criticized the sanctions, which led to the freezing of millions of dollars in North Korean state accounts in a Chinese bank, and cited the sanctions as a reason to boycott the talks.

The financial talks will be kept separate from the six-party discussions, and a Treasury Department official will be the lead negotiator, Mr. Hill said.

He said his focus in Beijing will be to move beyond talking and to start implementing a joint accord reached in September 2005. That agreement committed the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong-il to give up its military nuclear programs in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees.

Mr. Hill acknowledged that the North's nuclear test, which resulted in new U.N. sanctions against Pyongyang, had "done damage" to the six-party process, but said the United States and its allies were still insistent that the North honor the September 2005 statement in full.

"We need a sign that we have moved off the pages of the September agreement and on to the ground of the Korean Peninsula," he said.

Song Min-soon, South Korea's new foreign minister, also pressed the North to go beyond talking in the new round.

"I hope that the North will heed the importance of this opportunity and act in a way that will lead to visible steps," Mr. Song told reporters in Seoul.

Mr. Hill said he planned to stop in Japan and perhaps South Korea on his way to Beijing for the weekend talks.

Envoy Says U.S. Expects "concrete Progress" At Revived Nuclear Talks (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON: The top U.S. envoy to next week's North Korean nuclear weapons negotiations said Wednesday that the United States wants "concrete progress" when diplomats from six nations convene in Beijing.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said "the purpose of the six-party talks is not to talk." The goal, he said, is to implement a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to scrap its pursuit of nuclear technology in exchange for energy and aid.

"We are indeed looking for measurable progress" in the talks, Hill told reporters. "We need concrete progress."

He said it had not been determined how long the round will last, but that talks would begin Sunday night and he would spend next week in Beijing. Hill said he would be meeting over the weekend with his negotiating counterparts, including the North Korean delegate. The other countries involved are South Korea, Japan, Russia and China.

DOJ_NMG_0106465

Hill said cooperation with the Chinese in preparation for the meeting has been "unprecedented."

North Korea Appears Serious About Denuclearization Talks: US (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, December 14, 2006

North Korea has indicated it is ready to "deal in specifics" about giving up its newly proven nuclear arsenal when it returns to six-party disarmament negotiations next week in Beijing, the top US negotiator said.

But Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill predicted "very tough negotiations" when the talks resume at the weekend after a 13-month break and said there were no guarantees the process would achieve its goal of convincing North Korea to dismantle its nuclear weapons program.

"At this point I can't tell you if that strategic choice has been made or not," said Hill, who has held two rounds of preliminary talks with the North Koreans since they agreed to return to the negotiating table after carrying out their first test of a nuclear bomb on October 9.

Hill told reporters that during one round of meetings on November 27 and 28 in Beijing, "there were indications that the DPRK, the North Koreans, would be prepared to deal in specifics at the coming round."

"The Chinese have also been in direct contact with the North Koreans on several occasions, and they also have reason to believe that we will see some specific ideas for moving ahead," he said.

Hill declined to provide any details of what specific steps the US and its allies would demand of North Korea or what incentives they would offer during the negotiations.

But he stressed that Washington would not allow the talks to drag on while North Korea pursues its nuclear program.

"It's our very strong view that in this first round, which starts over the weekend, we want to show some significant progress."

The six-party talks -- involving China, Japan, North Korea, South Korea, Russia and the United States -- started in 2003 to stop Pyongyang from acquiring nuclear weapons.

North Korea signed on to a vaguely worded joint statement in September 2005, pledging to give up its nuclear ambitions in return for security guarantees, energy assistance and improved relations with the West.

But North Korea pulled out two months later, apparently to protest US sanctions imposed on a Macau-based bank, Banco Delta Asia, for allegedly laundering money and circulating counterfeit US 100 dollar bills on behalf of the cash-strapped communist Pyongyang regime.

It then conducted its first nuclear test, triggering global condemnation -- including from closest ally China -- and unprecedented sanctions agreed by the United Nations.

Hill said China's pressure was a critical element in North Korea's decision to resume negotiations and that Washington's and Beijing's goals in the talks "are pretty close to identical -- complete denuclearization" of the Korean peninsula.

"We need concrete progress. We need a sign that we have moved off of the pages of the September agreement and on to the ground of the Korean peninsula," he said.

The US diplomat said it was not clear if North Korea's notoriously unpredictable leadership agreed to resume talks due of the bite of UN sanctions or "because they have exploded a nuclear device and they feel very strong as a result of that".

But Hill said he had made clear to the North Koreans already that "we do not consider them a nuclear power and we will not consider them a nuclear power."

The UN sanctions, which include a trade embargo on nuclear and weapons-related material and luxury goods, will remain in place during the negotiations, he said.

But in a concession to Pyongyang, the US has agreed to hold simultaneous discussions in Beijing on the Banco Delta Asia sanctions, he said.

A US Treasury official will lead those talks for Washington.

Hill said he would travel Friday to Tokyo for preparatory talks with the Japanese and could also visit Seoul before heading to Beijing, where informal talks will continue among all parties through the weekend prior to the formal start of negotiations on Monday.

"I'm not here to predict success or to express optimism, but I'll have a much better picture of that probably a week from now," he said.

Britain, Russia Report Progress In Bid To Agree UN Sanctions On Iran (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106466

Six major powers edged closer to agreeing UN sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear fuel work, raising hopes that the Security Council could vote on a compromise package soon.

After a new round of informal talks on a sanctions draft resolution early Wednesday by envoys from the Security Council's five veto-wielding members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- plus Germany, several participants emerged reasonably upbeat.

"We had a good meeting this morning. we made substantial progress," British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry told reporters.

He expressed hope that a compromise text would be agreed on this week and that the full 15-member council "will vote as soon as possible after that."

Western diplomats say they expect passage of the resolution by Christmas.

France's UN envoy Jean-Marc de La Sabliere also spoke of "progress" following amendments presented by Russia and the United States to a revised European draft drawn up by France, Britain and Germany.

"Important matters of principle have basically been agreed," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said.

While there were still differences on some issues, including a proposed travel ban on officials directly involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, the six powers now "have a basic understanding that we should be focusing on uranium enrichment, chemical reprocessing, heavy water projects and nuclear delivery systems," he added.

The European draft would mandate a ban on trade with Iran on goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programs and impose financial and travel restrictions on persons and entities involved.

Jones Parry said nuclear experts of the council would go over the text Thursday morning while envoys of the six major powers would take it up again later that day.

In the meantime, the amendments and the comments made during Wednesday's session would be forwarded to the envoys' respective capitals, he added.

Churkin for his part described the text as "very positive," "even tough there are certain restrictions on activities which we are concerned about."

In Washington, the State Department described amendments put forward by US deputy UN representative Alejandro Wolff as "tweaks."

Churkin hailed on Monday the European changes to the draft but objected to the proposed travel ban on officials linked to Tehran's nuclear and missile programs.

The text contains in its annex a list of 12 officials targeted for a travel ban, including some associated with the Natanz nuclear fuel processing facility and with the heavy-water reactor Iran is building in Arak, as well as Iran's Revolutionary Guards chief General Yahya Rahim Safavi.

It dropped, however, all references in the draft to Iran's first nuclear power station, a one-billion-dollar facility that Russia is helping to build in Bushehr.

Meanwhile Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei vowed Wednesday that the Islamic Republic would make further progress in its nuclear program despite the objections of world powers, state television reported.

Tehran has consistently rejected UN demands that it halt uranium enrichment, a process which can provide fuel for nuclear reactors but also, in highly refined form, material for the core of a nuclear bomb.

In The Hague, former UN chief weapons inspector Hans Blix said Wednesday that giving security guarantees to Iran could help persuade Tehran to scale down its nuclear ambitions and freeze uranium enrichment.

"To avoid Iran going for enrichment, one must go into the concerns they have ... they might be concerned by an attack of the US," Blix told journalists.

Blix is now chairman of the Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission (WMDC), an independent body that works to limit the dangers posed by WMD.

The West claims Iran is running a secret nuclear military program parallel to its civilian one, an allegation strongly denied by Tehran which says its nuclear ambitions are entirely peaceful and aimed at producing electricity.

Iran Nukes Prompt Concerns Within Mideast (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

Christian Science Monitor, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad boasts that world powers are getting weak knees about stopping his country's nuclear program.

Is the fiery leader right?

DOJ_NMG_0106467

The United Nations Security Council is considering a watered-down resolution of sanctions aimed at punishing Iran for pursuing its uranium- enrichment program - a process that could lead to development of a nuclear weapon. But with the United States seemingly occupied with Iraq, and with Russia and China still balking at any action that would suggest "humiliation" of a valued trade partner, doubts are rising over how much the Europe-sponsored resolution will be worth.

"Nothing has changed for the better with respect to this resolution and what it says about determination to stop a very dangerous scenario before it gets out of control," says Gal Luft, codirector of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security in Washington. "The Iranians are moving ahead. The world is acting in ways that reduce the chance of having a real impact on that - and countries in the region are taking note of both."

Indeed, as prospects wane for tough international action against Iran, some countries in the region are expressing alarm at the pace of Tehran's progress toward mastery of the nuclear cycle. And they seem to be saying, "If the international community is not going to do something about it, we will." Such an attitude is raising fears of a Middle East arms race.

Noting that Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries announced over the weekend their interest in developing a cooperative nuclear-energy program, former Middle East negotiator Dennis Ross said, "Who is that message for? Let me tell you, it's not for Iran. It was for us."

Ambassador Ross, now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, also said at an event Tuesday that the Saudis are telling the US, "Stop them - or that [nuclear power] is the way we go, too."

The regional warnings on Iran come amid reports that the Saudis have also warned the US that they might be compelled to enter on the side of the Sunnis in any Iraq that the US had abandoned to civil war.

The countries that make up the Gulf Cooperation Council are Sunni powers expressing concerns over the rise of Shiite Iran, Mr. Luft says, which adds one more worrisome ripple to the signs of growing Sunni-Shiite tensions in Iraq and Lebanon. "They are saying that if there is to be a Shiite bomb, then they will need a Sunni bomb to counterbalance it," he says. "They don't want that, but if their neighbor Iran goes nuclear in this climate of deepening Shiite-Sunni divisions, they don't see how they could sit aside and not match it."

The Security Council draft resolution circulated this week by France, Britain, and Germany forgoes the proposed blanket sanctions against Iran that drew a Russian rebuff. Instead, it outlines sanctions focused on the country's uranium-enrichment process - targeting Iran's atomic-energy agency, facilities involved in the uranium-enrichment program, and individuals and companies associated with the program.

The resolution removes any reference to Iran's first nuclear power plant at Bushehr, while focusing on a pilot enrichment facility at Natanz. That change satisfies one Russian demand, but Russian officials have held out for additional changes.

If the resolution is passed by the Security Council before the end of the year, as some diplomats expect, it would be nine months after the international community first demanded that Iran cease its uranium enrichment or face tough trade and financial sanctions. By early next year, it will have been two years since the Bush administration deferred to European diplomacy to try to halt a program that Mr. Ahmadinejad says is purely peaceful but that European officials have concluded is designed to deliver nuclear weapons.

Some analysts say the US is so preoccupied with Iraq - and tied up in debate over whether it should engage Iran in diplomatic efforts to stabilize Iraq - that it has weakened its determination to stop a nuclear-armed Iran from emerging. They note that the resignation of John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, who is a fierce opponent of nuclear proliferation to dangerous "rogue states," has lowered the US profile in the struggle with Iran at a crucial moment.

Others note that while the US goes along with diplomatic efforts to curtail Iran's nuclear progress, President Bush continues to insist that "no options are off the table" in terms of guaranteeing that Iran never develops the bomb. They speculate that if Iran continues its nuclear march, the US could take military action to at least seriously damage its program before the end of Mr. Bush's term, claiming it had favored diplomatic action until the risk dictated another course.

In the meantime, Iran claims it has neared mastery of the nuclear cycle, from mining of uranium ore to its enrichment into fuel for nuclear facilities. Last weekend, Ahmadinejad announced his country had "begun" the installation of 3,000 centrifuges - which, if true, could be a major step toward large-scale uranium enrichment. He used the announcement to needle his international opponents, crowing that "resistance of the Iranian nation" has spurred the nuclear progress, even while forcing the world "to retreat tens of steps over Iran's nuclear issue," according to Iran's Fars news agency.

Nuclear experts say it is hard to say how much of this is "bluster" or to what degree it reflects real progress in the Iranian program. "A lot depends on what a phrase like 'beginning to install' really means," says David Kay, a security specialist at the Potomac Institute in Arlington, Va. "I don't think anyone would say they are 'mastering the fuel cycle,' which was another of [Ahmadinejad's] claims."

Mr. Kay notes, for example, that what is known about Iran's initial centrifuge "cascade," as the high-speed facility allowing uranium enrichment is called, suggests "they are still at a very, very preliminary stage" in their capabilities. "From what we hear the facility is down as much as it is up," he says. All this suggests Iran is still at least four years away from the ability to build a bomb, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0106468

Yet as rudimentary as the program may still be, Luft says Iran is taking important but little-noticed steps to weather even weakened international sanctions. In a new report, his institute says Iran is acting to address its "Achilles' heel" - its lack of gasoline-refining capacity - by expediting construction of two new refineries, signing gasoline import contracts with "friendly countries" like Venezuela, and undertaking a crash conversion program to convert 1.2 million vehicles a year from gasoline to natural gas. Iran has the world's second-largest natural-gas reserve.

"They are taking all kinds of innovative measures, and showing by the high priority they are giving these measures that they do not intend to change course and capitulate on their nuclear program," Luft says. "It's become a matter of national pride."

In a similar way, he says that the Gulf countries are not talking about a nuclear program for energy reasons - but with national security in mind. "If you sit on top of the world's biggest pile of oil and gas, the last thing you need is nuclear energy," he says. "They would be doing this for security interests, not for energy."

Move To Charge Ahmadi-Nejad Over Israel Remarks (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

In one of his first acts since leaving his post as US ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton will on Thursday call for legal proceedings against Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad for incitement to genocide.

Mr Bolton will join Dore Gold, a former Israeli ambassador to the UN, Irwin Cotler, a former Canadian attorney-general, and Nobel peace prize winner Elie Wiesel in claims that a series of public statements against Israel constitute a crime under the Genocide Convention.

The call comes amid growing pressure on the US to start talks with Iran about Iraq, but also amid international criticism of a conference in Tehran questioning the Holocaust. A 68-page study produced by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, and the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, argues that Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's declaration that "Israel should be wiped off the map" is part of a hate campaign punishable under international law.

A series of remarks by Mr Ahmadi-Nejad, including one in which he reportedly questioned whether Zionists were human beings, "constitute direct and public incitement to genocide", the study alleges. While reminiscent of incitement before the Rwanda genocide, "the critical difference is that while the Hutus in Rwanda were equipped with machetes, Iran, should the international community do nothing to prevent it, will soon acquire nuclear weapons," it says.

Mr Gold told the FT that while "most people think of [legal proceedings against] genocide in terms of setting up tribunals after the crime has been committed", the challenge was to stop genocide before it begins.

"The question is, what specifically can be done? Let the Security Council meet and discuss the issue," he said.

The Iranian mission to the UN dismissed the call as "a propaganda move, and an act without any substance. The international court of justice should give every priority to the real genocide of Palestinian people by Israeli leaders". Earlier this year, visiting the UN, Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said his fight was not with Jews but with Zionists.

Juan Mendez, the UN's special adviser on the prevention of genocide, said he did not plan to take any official action over the remarks because his job was to help vulnerable populations that could not defend themselves.

"But that doesn't mean I don't consider them serious and grave," he said. "Expressions of hate speech, especially in the context of an ability to act on them, are certainly one of the warning signs we look for."

Deep Roots Of Denial For Iran's True Believer (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

CAIRO, Dec. 13 — Iran's so-called Holocaust conference this week was billed as a chance to force the West to reconsider the historical record and, thereby, the legitimacy of Israel. But why would the Iranians invite speakers with so little credibility in the West, including a former Ku Klux Klan grand wizard and disgraced European scholars?

That question misses the point. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, portrays participants like David Duke, the former Louisiana Klan leader, and Robert Faurisson of France, who has devoted his life to trying to prove that the Nazi gas chambers were a myth, as silenced truth-tellers whose stories expose Western leaders as the hypocrites he considers them to be.

Just as Soviet leaders used to invite Americans who suffered racial or political discrimination to Moscow to embarrass Washington, Mr. Ahmadinejad seems to enjoy pointing out that countries like Germany, France and Austria claim to champion free debate yet have made Holocaust denial illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0106469

He has also repeatedly tried to draw a moral equivalency between questioning the Holocaust and the decision in Europe last year to publish cartoons lampooning the Prophet Muhammad. It wins him favor at home and across the Arab world for standing up to the West and allows him to present himself as morally superior to the West.

But there is another important point. Mr. Ahmadinejad actually seems to believe that the volumes of documentation, testimony and living memory of the Nazi genocide are at best exaggerated and part of a Zionist conspiracy to falsify history so as to create the case for Israel. As a former member of the Revolutionary Guards, he was indoctrinated with such thinking, a political analyst in Tehran said, and as a radical student leader, he championed such a view.

Now he has a platform to promote the theories — and to try to position himself regionally as the reasonable man who is asking hard questions.

The two-day meeting included no attempt to come to terms with the nature of the well-documented Nazi slaughter, offering only a platform to those pursuing the fantasy that it never happened. In addition, the organizers of the conference, a small circle around the president, have been building ties with neo-Nazi groups in Europe.

"He is connected to people in Iran who trust his way of doing things and who seriously believe the Holocaust did not take place," said Martin Ebbing, a German journalist in Tehran who has closely followed the president. "They seriously believe it."

Evidence of that came in a revealing interview last May with the German magazine Der Spiegel. The interviewer mostly wanted to discuss Iran's nuclear ambitions and the government's refusal to give up uranium enrichment, but the discussion kept returning to the Holocaust. At one point, the exasperated interviewer actually lectured the Iranian president on Germany's culpability.

"In our view, there is no doubt that the Germans — unfortunately — bear the guilt for the murder of six million," the interviewer said to Mr. Ahmadinejad.

The president gave little ground, saying Germans should rid themselves of such guilt. "I will only accept something as truth if I am actually convinced of it," he said.

Across the Middle East, contempt for Jews and Zionism is widespread and utterly mainstream. Many say the Holocaust has been wildly exaggerated and used to justify the creation of the Jewish state in 1948 at the expense of Palestinians, a move viewed as yet another example of Western imperialism.

Anti-Western rage fueled the 1979 Iranian revolution, and Mr. Ahmadinejad has tried to rekindle its energy by spreading Iran's influence beyond its borders. Battling Washington, chiding Arab leaders and claiming to promote the Palestinian cause have made him extremely popular on the streets from Cairo to Morocco.

Such actions have also helped turn attention away from his inability so far to deliver on promises of economic populism, including a redistribution of wealth and greater social justice for the bulk of the country that is struggling to make ends meet.

The president's ideas do not resonate in all corners of Iran, though, and some political scientists there say they have embarrassed officials who, even if they agree, do not want to see a focus on Holocaust denial further isolate Iran from Europe.

"I raise two questions about this conference," said Ahmad Shirzad, a reformist politician and former legislator. "First, how much does this solve the problems our people are faced with? And secondly, which one of our goals were realized? It looks like he wants to make news and do provocative things."

Others see an even more ambitious post-Iraq agenda reflected in Mr. Ahmadinejad's high profile on the issues of Jews, the Holocaust and Israel.

"It is for public consumption in Arab countries," said Mustafa El-Labbad, editor of Sharqnameh, a magazine specializing in Iranian affairs and published in Cairo. "It is specifically directed toward deepening the gap between the people and their regimes and toward embarrassing the rulers so that the regional power vacuum, especially after Iraq, can be filled by Iran."

Iran's President Faces Test Of His Support In Elections (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 13 — Iranians will go to the polls on Friday in elections that are expected to be a test of whether President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad still has the popular support that led to his victory 18 months ago.

The elections are for city councils around the country and for the 86-member Assembly of Experts. The Assembly has the power to replace the country's supreme leader, but since it selected Ayatollah Ali Khamenei for that position in 1989, it has been relatively inactive and meets only twice a year behind closed doors.

The city councils, on the other hand, exercise substantial political leverage, especially in the capital, Tehran. The councils appoint the mayors, who run the local governments and control the budgets.

DOJ_NMG_0106470

The watchdog Guardian Council, which reviews applications to run for office, rejected 240 nominees out of 490 who initially registered to run for the Assembly of Experts. Others dropped out, and so only 140 candidates remain for the 86 seats, which are elected by district. Some districts are left only with one candidate running for the seat.

The council rejected many candidates who had a lenient stance toward reformers but also some who are affiliated with Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, a cleric who has often spoken against democracy.

Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi and a group of his supporters were running against Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a former president and pragmatic politician, in the hope of dominating the assembly, which is considered less likely now.

In the Tehran city elections, a slate affiliated with Mr. Ahmadinejad whose name roughly translates as the Good Scent of Service (even Iranians are puzzled by the title) is running against other radicals who have been sidelined by Mr. Ahamdiejad and against reformist politicians who are trying to make a comeback after three major defeats in the past three years.

Members of the slate allied with the president had called on their supporters to vote for those close to Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi, the radical cleric, in the Assembly of Expert elections. The group is led by a young former leader of the Basij Militia force, Mehrdad Bazrpash, and the sister of the president is a member.

Analysts say the group has a chance of winning if the turnout is low. The turnout in the last city elections in Tehran, in 2003, was only 12 percent after voters who had brought the reformists to power stayed home when they concluded that the reformists had failed in their efforts to create a more open society. That led to victory for the radicals. They appointed Mr. Ahmadinejad, then an unknown figure in Iran's politics, as mayor and then nominated him for president.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has cracked down on civil liberties since his election, and his fiery speeches and uncompromising foreign policy on such issues as the country's nuclear program is causing the country to face possible sanctions. He also has failed to deliver on his promise of improving people's economic status, experts say.

Reformists are appealing to their supporters to vote in an effort to slow down his radical policies.

"This election can be a way for us to find our place in the government again and to try to moderate the situation," said Ali Nozarpour, one of the reformist candidates for the Assembly. "We are telling people that if they don't vote, they will let a minority to decide for them."

Enthusiasm over the election appears to be increasing as the reformists have intensified their campaign at universities and around the city. On Wednesday, 20 local candidates spent time talking to people on the streets of Tehran to persuade them to vote.

"A lot of students are saying that they will vote for the reformers," said Sajad Ghoroghi, a graduate student at Amir Kabir University who has decided to vote despite his disillusionment with the reformists.

"Voting does not mean that we approve of what the reformers did during the eight years they were in power," he said. "We want to vote to stop the current situation."

The other major group running against the president's allies in Tehran is a radical group that supports the current mayor, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, who also ran against Mr. Ahmadinejad in the presidential election last year..

The radicals initially said they would join to create one slate against the reformists. But Mohammad Tavakoli, a radical member of Parliament, said in a letter that was posted on a Web site that the young supporters of Mr. Ahmadinejad refused to join a coalition with the more veteran radical politicians, the Iranian daily Aftab-e-Yazd reported.

"They say that they will definitely win and do not need to have a coalition with other groups," Mr. Tavakoli wrote, warning that such an attitude would damage Parliament's relations with the government of Mr. Ahmadinejad, where the more veteran group holds a substantial number of seats.

Another radical, Emad Afrough, expressed concern that the election could be rigged, the newspaper Etemad reported. This is the first time that the committee that supervises the election is controlled by the group in power.

"Rigging does not take place only when the votes are being counted," he was quoted as saying. "It can happened secretly in different ways."

Iran Province Looks To Everyday Issues In Polls (AFP)

By Aresu Eqbali

AFP, December 14, 2006

Conservative-reformist power struggles or foreign policy are far from the minds of the voters of Takestan, a dusty Iranian town whose inhabitants are more concerned with unemployment and the cost of living.

The streets of the town, whose name means "vineyard" and where grape-farming is the main industry, are underdeveloped and many people go about their business with little faith in political promises.

"Construction of houses, improvement of traffic infrastructure, green spaces, medical and educational centers" was how the town's governor, Ali Sadeghi Niaraki, outlined the town's priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0106471

With youth unemployment rates still high, joblessness and wages are among the main concerns of people ahead of municipal elections on Friday -- if they believe their votes can make a difference.

"Takestan now is developing metal projects ... farmers today do not have only one job," the 48-year-old governor said.

"The number of candidates for this round of municipality elections is 52, with a 20 percent growth in the number of registered contenders," Niaraki proudly added.

The central street has been plastered by posters and banners of candidates from different groups including ultra-conservatives supporting the President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as well as the reformists.

The oddly similar surnames of candidates -- there are lots of Rahmanis and Rahman-Dousts on the posters -- makes it look like a tribal battle rather than political elections.

"I am the mother of three young men at a rented home. They need jobs, they want to raise a family, but we simply cannot afford it," said Moloud Mardi, 49.

"So, what is the difference who wins the city council when we see they will not do anything about the problems?" asked Moloud Mardi, 49.

"Now that they need us to vote they promise many things, but we have not seen any action from them yet," she said, vowing not to go near the polling stations.

A group of street-sellers on unbuilt land in downtown begged to differ.

"The councils take care of people's problems, they can build schools and streets. It does not matter whom we vote for in which elections. It is important to vote to make the country proud," said Khosh Ghadam Eskandari, 34, mother of two teenagers and a young boy.

She was faced by quick objections from a neighbouring vendor who deals in second-hand teddy bears and dolls.

"I am not happy with my income. Their promises are just words. We only vote because we need to have the (electoral) stamp on our papers in order not to get into trouble," complained Abu Bakr Rasti, 31.

A Peugeot 405 limousine parked in the main street, plastered with the pictures of the sole female candidate for the town's council, was one of the main attractions of the afternoon.

Maryam Taherkhani, 25, has become a municipality candidate because she believed "at least one woman should be sitting in the council among the other male members to take care of order and cleanliness".

"Building green spaces and movie theaters are the things that we need," she said.

Despite her bizarrely luxurious campaign limousine, she considered her town as "deprived, with jobless youths" -- one of Iran's most persistent economic problems.

"I do not know about elections that much. We may vote however, even though they do not do anything for the town," said a 28-year-old farmer, Karam Ardebili while spreading oil seed around his inherited land.

"Reformists" and "conservatives" sounded to him very important things that he said he had nothing to do with.

"I am happy with my income but I would ask for loans to rent fields," the married man with one child said, adding that he honestly only cared about his agricultural job and nothing more.

Hezbollah Out To Develop New `cold War,' Some Say (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - For most Americans, the standoff between the militant Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and Lebanon's government may look like inside politics in a country that's barely big enough to contain its name on most world maps.

But Hezbollah's two-week-old siege of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora's administration is, in many ways, a test of U.S. power and credibility in the Middle East at a time when the Bush administration is struggling to regain the offensive in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Analysts, Lebanese leaders and Western diplomats agree that the crisis is an outgrowth of a developing showdown between the United States, which backs Saniora, and Syria and Iran, which support Hezbollah.

"Because Lebanon doesn't count in anybody's equation, it is the perfect place to use it as a cold war arena; there is a cold war in the Middle East now," said Timur Goksel, who was a longtime senior adviser to the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon until 2003. "I think Hezbollah is being drawn into this cold war ... they are taking sides."

That cold war can be seen across the region. In Iraq, Syria and Iran are helping forces aligned against U.S. troops. In the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, Iran has pledged millions to help the Hamas-led Palestinian government - which the United States and Europe have cut off - and Syria continues to support Hamas and several Palestinian terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0106472

The fight is complex: The United States wants to stop the tide of Iranian Shiite power from destabilizing oil-rich Sunni Arab countries with significant Shiite populations, such as Kuwait, Bahrain and Saudi Arabia. The government of Saudi Arabia, in particular, has grown anxious about the ascent of Iranian influence in the region.

At the same time, however, American officials are seeking ways to curb the violence in Iraq by bolstering the Iranian-backed Shiite government there, which U.S.-sponsored popular elections brought to power.

As the United States has been pushed and pulled by the region's problems, what some U.S. officials believed was an invincible American empire has begun to look weaker to some in the Middle East.

Top Hezbollah officials have made no secret of thinking that America is stretched too thin to stop them.

"What can America offer you?" Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said via video link to a huge crowd of demonstrators last week in Beirut. "It is sinking in the mud of Iraq and Afghanistan and Palestine."

A Western diplomat based in Beirut said Hezbollah officials had made their intentions clear by constantly pairing Saniora with U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman in their speeches.

"Why are they using this rhetoric of saying, `The Feltman government'? Why are they saying Saniora's a U.S. agent?" said the diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. "It's because they want to be able to deliver the United States a strategic defeat in Lebanon. Because they see the problems in Afghanistan, they see the problems in Iraq, they see no progress in Palestine and they want to be able to play the defeat of the Saniora government ... as a defeat of the United States."

Hezbollah leaders counter that the United States, facing setbacks in Iraq, is seeking to use Lebanon as a base from which to shape Middle East politics.

"Their main enemy in Lebanon is Hezbollah. They want to get rid of Hezbollah and use it (Lebanon) as a bridge to other goals," Hezbollah spokesman Hussein Rahal said. "They want to begin in Lebanon, then Palestine, then Syria and then Iran."

Another Western official, who also asked not to be identified, conceded that "what has happened in the region is not exactly as we envisioned it; I think it underscores the importance that Lebanon survives as a democratic state."

Hezbollah assertions that Saniora is a U.S. puppet are incorrect, the official said.

"That coming from the force that is on the payroll of Iran, that receives a large amount of arms from Iran, that's just laughable," the official said. "It's a cheap emotional trick to paint this as a fight against American hegemony."

Many Lebanese Sunnis and Christians say that Hezbollah and the Saniora government are being disingenuous when they accuse the other side of being too closely tied to foreign powers.

"In our view, both of them are tied to outside political axes of some sort," said Osman Bakhach, a spokesman for the Liberation Party, a fundamentalist Sunni political group that calls for establishing an Islamic caliphate and opposes the United States and Hezbollah.

Emil Moukarzel, a spokesman for the Lebanese Forces, agreed. His organization, which is one of the main Christian groups in Lebanon and played a major role as a militia in the country's 1975-90 civil war, is pro-Western but has tried to remain outside the current conflict.

"The major war here is between the United States and Iran," he said.

Hezbollah and its allies began massing demonstrators in front of the main government building on Dec.1. They demanded that Saniora either give Hezbollah enough Cabinet seats to dissolve the government, or scrap the government immediately and begin anew, presumably with Hezbollah and its allies at the fore. The crowds outside the government center have ebbed and flowed, but they've never numbered fewer than tens of thousands.

Hezbollah officials said they'd summoned the demonstrators after concluding that Saniora had sided with the United States during last summer's Israeli military campaign - which devastated Shiite villages in south Lebanon - and watching while the prime minister pushed for a tribunal that the militant group believed would target Syria, one of its main backers.

"We cannot leave this government to lead the country to this fate, of following the Americans," said Mohammed Fneish, a Hezbollah member who resigned from the Saniora Cabinet last month along with five other militia members and allies. "The main issue is the Americans want to keep this government in power because they can control them."

The Western diplomat in Beirut said that for the Bush White House, Lebanon had acquired the image "of the heroic democratic country" in a way reminiscent of how the Reagan White House viewed "captive nations" such as Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia during the Cold War with the Soviet Union.

"It became impossible for anyone to suggest that we should be just accepting their incorporation into the Soviet empire," the diplomat said. "Lebanon has almost become like that."

Lebanese Government Issues Own Warning (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

DOJ_NMG_0106473

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 13 -- For years, Fouad Siniora was a man of numbers more than rhetoric, as a banker, finance minister and friend to Rafiq al-Hariri, the billionaire former prime minister assassinated last year. This week, he stood before a crowd that included more than 1,800 women at his barricaded government headquarters, more populist than pragmatist, more agitator than accountant.

"Victory to Lebanon!" the prime minister shouted, jabbing his fists into the air and playing to a boisterous crowd.

Women from the southern town of Sidon surged forward, some holding signs reading, "You make us proud." Others pushed at his guards, straining for a view. In occasional moments of bedlam, youths climbed atop chairs: "God be with you, Siniora!"

In the test of wills that Lebanon's crisis has become, the government is playing a game of perceptions. Ministers insist it is business as usual, while in almost daily scenes, busloads of supporters from elsewhere in Lebanon are ferried to the stately Serail, as Siniora's headquarters is known. The government, in sometimes blunt ways, is mobilizing its sectarian constituencies -- usually Sunni Muslim -- as a veiled warning to Hezbollah and its Shiite Muslim followers not to go too far in a campaign the government's supporters variously portray as a coup d'etat, an attempt to grab power for the Shiite community or a ploy to deliver leverage here to Iran and Syria.

"I suppose they did not expect our resistance as a government, and they did not expect the passionate reaction of the Lebanese people, especially the Sunni reaction," said Nayla Moawad, the social affairs minister.

For nearly two weeks, thousands of supporters of Hezbollah and its allies have camped at the foot of the Serail, pushing for a greater share of power in the cabinet or Siniora's resignation. Every few days, more barricades go up: a third coil of barbed wire and now spare tires stacked two high across the road. The camp itself -- sprawled across the downtown, now largely shuttered, that Hariri envisioned as his legacy -- is becoming more permanent. Under construction Wednesday was wood scaffolding around an outdoor latrine, near the doorstep of the libertine, now-closed Buddha Bar.

Since the demonstration staged Sunday by Hezbollah and its allies, one of the largest in Lebanese history, the crisis has entered a lull of sorts. Hezbollah and its allies have spoken vaguely of escalation, but all sides seem willing to give a chance to mediation underway by the Arab League and its secretary general, Amr Moussa.

Since October, Hezbollah and its supporters have sought one-third plus one of the seats in the cabinet, which would give them an effective veto over key decisions and allow them to force the government to resign at will. Siniora and his supporters have insisted on approval first of an international court to try Hariri's alleged killers. While Hezbollah has not publicly opposed it in principle, its ally Syria, blamed by government supporters for the assassination, has.

Other issues are still in the air: The government and its supporters want an election to replace President Emile Lahoud, a Syrian ally; Hezbollah and its allies want early parliamentary elections that they believe would deprive the government and its supporters of a majority.

"We'll deal with any Arab or local initiative very positively but on the basis of one-third-plus-one in the government," said Amin Sherri, a Hezbollah member of parliament.

The crisis is entrenched in a very Lebanese context, with its delicate communal balance. Hezbollah's foes have suggested that its leader, Hasan Nasrallah, has lost his standing in the Arab world by miring himself in a local political struggle; even Nasrallah felt the need to address the charge in a speech last week.

From the beginning of the crisis, the government itself has played sectarian politics as a way to slow Hezbollah's momentum, a game that even some of its supporters admit is dangerous. In an almost unprecedented move for a government traditionally built on sectarian consensus, the Sunni mufti, Mohammed Rashid Kabbani, led Friday prayers at the Serail on Dec. 1, the first day of Hezbollah's protests, when hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah's supporters converged on downtown. At the time, he called toppling the Sunni-led government an uncrossable "red line." Loyalists of Hariri's son, Saad, have organized rallies in the country's Sunni strongholds: Tripoli, the northern Lebanese region of Akkar and parts of the Bekaa Valley in the northeast.

For the past week, the government has brought delegations of mainly Sunnis but also Christians and Druze to the Serail for revival-like rallies and receptions in which Siniora has tried to shed his technocratic image.

"With our soul, with our blood, we sacrifice for you, Siniora," the women from Sidon shouted Tuesday.

In a conservative dark blue suit, Siniora entered the room of marble floors and chandeliers to a rapturous standing ovation. He shook hands, kissed babies, raised his hands into the air. At times a bit awkward, he still tried to seize the moment.

"The enemy is there on the border," he said, a reference to Israel, as he jabbed his finger. "The enemy is not in the streets of Beirut. We don't have to dig trenches among the Lebanese in the streets! We want to build bridges!"

Government officials are reluctant to talk publicly about playing the sectarian card in a country that still bears scars from the 1975-90 civil war. They contend such appeals are more a response to Hezbollah's campaign than an initiative by government officials. But privately, they assert they have intimidated Hezbollah, which has mobilized its constituency but gone to great lengths to portray its campaign as a broad-based effort that includes substantial numbers of Christians loyal to Michel Aoun, a populist former general. There is a sense, too, among supporters of the government that Hezbollah is not prepared to escalate the conflict dramatically.

DOJ_NMG_0106474

"They realize it's not possible to enter into what they want alone," said Nabil de Freige, a member of parliament and supporter of Siniora's government.

At least for now, Hezbollah is signaling the same.

"We will not be provoked into where they are trying to take us," said Nawar Sahli, a Hezbollah parliament member.

Nearly two weeks into the crisis, the Serail remains businesslike; bouquets of flowers are freshly arranged next to an entrance for frequent convoys of cars with tinted windows. Several ministers, Moawad among them, have taken up residence there, fearing for their safety. Others walk the halls casually in suits, going ahead with cabinet meetings and sessions to prepare for a donors' conference next month in Paris to assist Lebanon's recovery from this summer's 33-day war with Israel.

"They may have thought we would be afraid and we would collapse immediately," Moawad said.

As she spoke, Hezbollah anthems blared from the protest below. "Oh, you most honorable people," the favorite goes.

But she added, "It is the future of Lebanon that is at stake."

Party Set To Accept Plan To End Crisis (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

A Lebanese official yesterday said the leading government party was ready to accept an Arab League package of political solutions to defuse the crisis paralyzing the country.

The Shi'ite Muslim group Hezbollah has tied up central Beirut for more than a week with huge street protests aimed at undermining the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and gaining more political power.

Arab League leader Amr Moussa told reporters Tuesday that "progress has been made" toward a compromise resolution, but that all parties would have to make concessions for a consensus to be reached.

Amal Mudallali, a foreign policy adviser to parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri, said the package would grant the opposition more seats in the Cabinet but leave it one short of the veto power demanded by Hezbollah.

The deal floated by the Arab League and accepted by the ruling anti-Syrian March 14 Alliance would assign 19 Cabinet positions to the governing party, 10 to an opposition comprising Hezbollah and the Christians led by Gen. Michel Aoun, and one to a political independent.

The deal also supports the establishment of an international tribunal to investigate the bombing murder of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, the holding of early presidential elections and the formation of a new government.

"It has to be approved all at the same time," said Miss Mudallali. "Our position is, this is a comprehensive package to finish the current crisis. The political situation is such that it cannot afford much more tension, nor can the economic situation."

Lebanon's political leaders were still negotiating yesterday evening. The main sticking points appeared to be the sequence of events in the package and final formal approval of the international tribunal.

"There is no indication that we are any closer to an agreement," said Miss Mudallali.

President Emile Lahoud and parliamentary speaker Nabih Berri -- both seen as supporting Syria and Hezbollah -- have resisted taking the final steps needed to authorize the tribunal.

A U.N. investigators' report says there were links between the assassination of Rafiq Hariri on Feb. 14, 2005, and theslaying or attempted killing of 14 other prominent figures over the past two years, the Associated Press reported yesterday.

The AP quoted the head of the U.N.-led inquiry, Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz, saying in New York that the investigation had reached "a critical stage."

The government, which thinks Syria is behind the killings, sees the tribunal as essential to establishing Beirut's independence from Damascus.

Prominent Hamas Rebel Is Killed As Palestinians Renew Infighting (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 13 — In renewed fighting among Palestinians, gunmen forced a prominent Hamas militant to his knees on Wednesday, then shot him dead outside a courthouse where he worked, in the southern Gaza Strip.

Hamas, the militant Islamic group that leads the Palestinian government, said a “death squad” from the rival Fatah faction was responsible for the killing of the militant, Bassam al-Farra, in Khan Yunis. Fatah denied involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0106475

The shooting occurred just two days after unidentified gunmen in Gaza City killed three sons, ages 3 to 9, of Baha Balousha, a senior Palestinian security officer and Fatah member. “This is a very dangerous situation,” said Fauzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman. “There has been an escalation in the violence and the chaos.”

Hamas and Fatah, the two dominant Palestinian factions, have been trying for months to form a national unity government. However, the talks have broken off, and the violence this week has again raised the prospect of widespread internal fighting, even a civil war.

Mr. Farra was arriving Wednesday at the courthouse in Khan Yunis in a taxi, when several men grabbed him and forced him to his knees on the sidewalk, while another man shot him, Palestinian witnesses said.

Palestinian security forces and Hamas militants set up roadblocks, but the gunmen escaped and no arrests were made.

Mr. Farra, who was about 30, was a leading local figure in Hamas’s armed wing. He was a judge’s assistant at the courthouse, Palestinians said.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, who has been traveling in the Middle East for more than two weeks, plans to return to Gaza on Thursday to address the crisis, aides said.

“We want to assure you that the words ‘civil war’ don’t exist in our dictionary,” Mr. Haniya said in Khartoum, Sudan, The Associated Press reported. “They don’t exist in our makeup, in our culture.”

Palestinian factions have periodically fought one another since the Palestinians began an uprising against Israel in 2000. Criminal gangs and Palestinian clans have also been involved in internecine violence. However, the internal fighting and the sense of lawlessness have increased this year as the political rivalry between Hamas and Fatah has intensified.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, is expected to announce his plan soon for ending the political deadlock, and aides have said he is leaning toward new presidential and parliamentary elections. But Hamas has challenged his authority to call new parliamentary elections, and proposing a new round of voting could add to the tensions.

In other violence on Wednesday, Israeli troops shot dead an armed Palestinian who approached Gaza’s perimeter fence, the Israeli military said. The shooting was the first fatality on either side since the Israelis and Palestinians declared a cease-fire in Gaza on Nov. 26. Also, a Palestinian stabbed an Israeli security guard, seriously wounding him, at a checkpoint near the northern edge of Jerusalem, Israeli officials said.

In another development on Wednesday, Israel’s Supreme Court sided with the government, ruling that a section of Israel’s West Bank separation barrier, which runs near the northeastern boundary of Jerusalem, could stand. Arab residents in the area had appealed to the court, contending that the barrier greatly disrupted daily life and made it difficult to move between East Jerusalem and other parts of the West Bank.

Palestinian Gunmen Kill Hamas Commander (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, December 14, 2006

Palestinian gunmen ambushed a Hamas commander outside a Gaza courthouse Wednesday, forcing him to his knees and killing him gangland-style in an attack that threatened to push Hamas and Fatah closer to civil war.

The brazen daylight slaying forced Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to rush home from a trip abroad and dampened already fading hopes for creating a national unity government and renewing peace talks with Israel.

The attack on the Hamas activist was the latest in a wave of bloodshed that began Monday when unknown assailants gunned down the three young sons of a Fatah-allied security officer in Gaza City. Fatah accused Hamas in those killings; the Islamic militant group denied involvement.

Both sides criticized President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah for failing to halt the violence.

On Wednesday morning, four gunmen calmly ate breakfast at a food stand outside the courthouse in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis as they lay in wait for Bassam al-Fara, 30, a judge at the Islamic court, witnesses said.

When al-Fara, who belongs to the largest clan in Khan Younis, emerged from a taxi, three men grabbed him and forced him to his knees, while the fourth shot him, the witnesses said. The attack left his body and the sidewalk riddled with bullet holes. The witnesses declined to be identified, fearing for their safety.

Palestinian security officials set up roadblocks and Hamas militants established checkpoints of their own as they searched for the gunmen.

About 3,000 people turned out for al-Fara's funeral, some firing shots in the air.

Outside the family home, his widow, a black veil covering her face, said her husband had received many death threats, the last on Tuesday, but she would not say from whom.

In a statement faxed to reporters, Hamas accused a Fatah "death squad" of al-Fara's killing. Late Wednesday, Fatah issued a statement saying the killing was a family dispute, and Fatah was not involved.

DOJ_NMG_0106476

Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman, said al-Fara was a field commander in the Hamas military wing. He pledged to hunt down the killers. "Hamas is not going to forget the blood of its members," Barhoum said.

Fatah spokesman Tawfik Abu Khoussa rejected the accusations. "We condemn all acts of anarchy whatever may be behind them, and we call on the brothers in Hamas to stop firing accusations before the investigation," he said.

Haniyeh, who was in Sudan, said he would return to Gaza on Thursday, cutting short a trip to Arab and Muslim countries including Iran and Syria. Haniyeh left Gaza on Nov. 28 on what was billed as a monthlong trip.

At the al-Fara home in Khan Younis, Hamas lawmaker Salah Bardawil said Abbas was responsible for failing to stop the security agencies from carrying out killings. "We ask the president to live up to his responsibilities before God and the law," he said.

After nightfall, gunmen fired at a Hamas rally at the Nusseirat refugee camp in central Gaza, witnesses said. One demonstrator was hurt.

Fatah activists also criticized Abbas; about 1,000 Fatah supporters marched to his house in Gaza City, demanding action.

Maj. Othman Shalouf, a Palestinian security officer, said Abbas must take charge of the situation.

"The time has come to exercise your powers and stop this farce," he said. "Security agencies are able to control things, but we need a political decision from you." Abbas was at his office in the West Bank city of Ramallah at the time and had no plans to go to Gaza.

Also Wednesday, Israeli soldiers shot and killed a Palestinian near the Israel-Gaza border fence. The military said he was armed and carrying explosives. A cease-fire has stopped most violence between Israel and Gaza.

Abbas plans a speech to his people on Saturday in which he is expected to outline his plans to hold elections to break the deadlock between Fatah and Hamas.

The Hamas victory in January's parliamentary voting pushed Fatah out of power but led to an economic and political stalemate. Israel, the U.S. and the European Union, which list Hamas as a terror group, all cut off contacts, economic ties and aid to the Palestinian government, further deepening poverty and instability in the West Bank and Gaza.

Hamas is responsible for dozens of suicide bombing attacks in Israel over the past decade. The Islamic group has rejected international demands that it recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing peace deals, but Hamas flatly refuses.

Israel has tried to promote the idea of separate peace talks with Abbas, a moderate who was elected a year before the parliamentary vote.

Somalia's Islamists And Ethiopia Gird For A War (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Dec. 9 — The stadium was packed, the guns were cocked and even the drenching rain could not douse the jihadist fire.

Thousands of Somalis, from fully veiled, machine-gun-toting women to little boys in baggy fatigues, gathered Friday to rally against what they called foreign aggression. As a squall blew in, they punched wet fists into the air and yelled, "Allahu akbar," or "God is great."

"I am ready to die," said Osama Abdi Rahim, dressed head to toe in camouflage and marching around with a loaded rifle. He is 7 years old.

The inevitability of war hangs over Mogadishu, Somalia's bullet-pocked seaside capital. But unlike the internal anarchy that has consumed the country for 15 years, the looming battle is now with Ethiopia, threatening to further destabilize the troubled Horn of Africa.

In the past week the increasingly militant Islamists in control of Mogadishu and much of the rest of the country have begun a food drive, a money drive and an AK-47 assault rifle drive, and have sent doctors and nurses, along with countless young soldiers, to the front lines.

For its part, Ethiopia, with tacit approval from the United States, has been steadily slipping soldiers across the border, trying to hold off the Islamists and shore up Somalia's weak, unpopular and divided transitional government.

Though that government has been recognized by the United Nations as the legitimate authority in Somalia, its power barely extends to the municipal limits of Baidoa, the inland town where it is based.

The Islamist forces, on the other hand, seem to be very popular here, having defeated Mogadishu's warlords earlier this year to pacify one of the world's most murderous cities.

Their troops, which United Nations officials say are secretly getting weapons from several Arab countries and Eritrea, have encircled Baidoa and are vowing to wage war against the Ethiopian forces unless they leave. Ethiopian convoys have been attacked, and the Islamists recently skirmished with soldiers from Baidoa, with dozens reported killed. That taste of war seems to have whetted the appetite for more.

DOJ_NMG_0106477

"We wait for the Ethiopians like dry land waits for rain," said Mustafa Ali Mohammed, an Islamic leader in Burhakaba, a town near the dividing line between the Islamists and Baidoa.

Analysts are unanimous that a full-scale conflict between the Islamists and Ethiopia, a country with a strong Christian identity, would be disastrous for Somalia, which is already suffering from severe flooding and years of neglect, and for the region as a whole, because neighboring countries may jump in.

Gen. John P. Abizaid of the United States Central Command — or Centcom — which has responsibility for American military interests in the region, recently flew to Ethiopia to meet with Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who had told American officials that he could cripple the Islamist forces "in one to two weeks."

Walking a careful line, General Abizaid made it clear that a broad military invasion of Somalia could create a humanitarian crisis across the Horn of Africa, Centcom officials said, but did not tell Ethiopian officials to pull their troops out.

Indeed, some American officials say the United States supports Ethiopia's military buildup because it is the only way to protect the weak Baidoa government from being overrun, force the Islamists to the negotiating table and contain what they call a growing regional threat.

American officials have accused the Islamists of sheltering terrorists connected to Al Qaeda, but the Ethiopian troops' presence seems to have only increased the potential for terrorist activity. Suicide bombers, unknown in Somalia until a few months ago, have attacked Baidoa twice recently, and last month the first Iraqstyle roadside bombs were detonated against Ethiopian convoys.

Residents of Mogadishu say hundreds of fighters from other Muslim countries have arrived at the city's main airport in recent days, drawn by the Islamists' blaring call for a holy war against Ethiopia and against America, which is especially despised here.

Memories are still fresh of the botched American-led relief operation in the early 1990s, and more recently of the covert American effort to bolster Mogadishu's warlords in an 11th-hour bid to prevent an Islamist takeover. That strategy backfired, driving more people into the arms of the Islamists.

"I'll be honest," said Sheik Muktar Robow Abu Monsur, the deputy security chief for the Islamists. "America is the best friend of Islam. It wakes up the sleeping Muslim."

In fact, Jendayi Frazer, the State Department's top official for Africa policy, said diplomatic and intelligence officials believed that the Islamists could be trying to provoke an Ethiopian attack as a "rallying cry for support" to their side. The countries fought a war from 1977 to 1978 over the Ogaden, a contested area of eastern Ethiopia — and Somalia lost.

"If this thing goes to a military fight," Ms. Frazer said, "it's a bloodbath."

American officials helped push through a recent United Nations resolution authorizing peacekeepers from African countries to back up the Baidoa officials. The resolution lets the Baidoa government, but not the Islamists, bring in weapons despite a longstanding arms embargo.

The problem with that strategy, many analysts say, is that it misreads the Islamists' power, rooted not so much in their military strength — a few hundred armed pickup trucks and a few thousand fighters — but in their popular support. The Islamists emerged several years ago as a network of clan-based courts that unified warring factions.

Ethiopia may have the strongest military in the region, trained by American advisers and complete with jet fighters, but attacking Islamist forces may only drive them underground, into a guerrilla insurgency.

American officials have said they are hoping that the moderates within the Islamic administration will prevail over hard-line, war-mongering elements. But if there ever was such a struggle, it is over.

Three months ago, Ibrahim Hassan Addou, the foreign minister for the Islamists and an American citizen of Somali descent, talked of sharing power and holding elections.

Now, like the others, he is talking war, in terms nearly indistinguishable from the most militant Islamic leaders. Moderates, he said, were backed into a corner by an American-led campaign to discredit and isolate the Islamic administration.

"Everybody was against us from the beginning, and now we have no choice but to fight," he said. "What I don't understand is why the whole world is trying to throw its weight behind a government that has been totally rejected by its own people."

United Nations officials say they support the government in Baidoa because it is the most representative of the various clans in Somalia. But one side effect of the multiclan approach has been ceaseless disputes between clan elders. Meanwhile, the Islamists have aggressively expanded their territory.

Many officials in Baidoa vehemently opposed calling on Ethiopian muscle, fearing a backlash. In the past some Somali clans have teamed up with Ethiopian forces to dominate other clans, ending in greater bloodshed. So when the idea of bringing

DOJ_NMG_0106478

Ethiopian soldiers to Baidoa was first proposed last year, it proved so divisive that it set off a brawl among officials — and it failed to pass.

"The problem with having Ethiopians defend us is that they make us look like the puppets that the Islamists accuse us of being," said Sharif Hassan Sheik Aden, the speaker of the parliament in Baidoa. Ethiopian officials insist that they have sent only a few hundred military advisers to Baidoa, but United Nation monitors and witnesses on the ground say several thousand Ethiopian infantry troops are digging in near the city.

Sporadic peace talks between Baidoa officials and the Islamists have produced little but broken promises. The only thing that seems to be delaying all-out war is the mutual recognition that a decisive victory is unlikely.

The Islamists are reluctant to march on Baidoa and set off a crushing Ethiopian response, while the Ethiopians seem fearful of trying to storm the Islamists' stronghold of Mogadishu, the city that claimed the lives of 18 American soldiers in the infamous "Black Hawk Down" battle in 1993.

A growing number of Democrats in Congress are urging the Bush administration to change course and deal with the Islamists for what they are: the power on the ground.

"The Islamists aren't going away, so the sooner we talk to them, the better," said Representative Donald M. Payne, the New Jersey Democrat who is expected to become the chairman of the House subcommittee on Africa when his party takes control of Congress in January.

In Mogadishu the Islamists are continuing their hearts-and-minds campaign, organizing neighborhood cleanups, delivering food to the needy and resuscitating old national institutions like the Supreme Court, which was given a fresh coat of paint and reopened in October.

Streets that were clogged with years of debris are now clear and bureaucracy is budding, with more rules and more paperwork, including forms at the airport that ask name, age, nationality and religion — Muslim or non-Muslim being the only choices.

All the talk of slaughtering Ethiopian invaders and their American sponsors, though, seems to have brought out a harsher side of the Islamic administration. Nearly every day, rings of people gather on Mogadishu's streets to watch lashings, and the crowds cheer as leather whips cut canals into flesh. One Islamic leader in a town north of Mogadishu recently issued an edict threatening that anyone who did not pray five times a day would be beheaded.

"It's black and white," said the leader, Hussein Barre Rage. "The Koran says people must pray."

Not long ago Somalia was a place where women wore skirts and men drank beer, and even today a large chunk of the population is quietly concerned about the absolutist direction the Islamists are heading in.

But the prospects of war with Ethiopia seem to have pushed many of these people solidly into the Islamic camp.

"I'm not into thought control," said Dahir Abdullahi Hirsi, a pharmacist in Mogadishu. "But I hate Ethiopians even more."

Regional War May Loom In Africa (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Dec. 13 -- With the Ethiopian government saying it is technically at war with Somalia's Islamic Courts movement, and the movement having declared holy war against Ethiopia, there is fear that an all-out conflict in the Horn of Africa may be unavoidable.

In the past week, several skirmishes have broken out between militias loyal to Ethiopia and those loyal to the Council of Islamic Courts, the movement that has taken control of the southern region of the country, including Mogadishu, the capital.

The fighting has occurred around the southern town of Baidoa, seat of Somalia's fragile but internationally recognized transitional government. Ethiopia considers the interim government a buffer against Islamic Courts leaders who have long expressed desire to create a "Greater Somalia," including ethnically Somali portions of Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi on Wednesday rejected a declaration by a leader of the Islamic movement that Ethiopia withdraw its troops or face war. Though the Ethiopian government has repeatedly denied having more than several hundred military trainers in Somalia, diplomats in the region estimate that at least 8,000 troops have poured in around Baidoa and that thousands more are gathering along the Somali border.

"This declaration is based on falsehoods," Meles said in an interview, adding that the movement, also known as the Islamic Courts Union, is "hellbent" on controlling all of Somalia. "Now, if the transitional government doesn't want our trainers, we're happy to withdraw them at any moment," he said.

The weak transitional government has made no such request.

For now, hopes for a peaceful resolution are pinned on a U.N. Security Council resolution adopted last week, authorizing deployment of an African Union force, excluding troops from neighboring states, to Baidoa. In theory, the resolution would remove Ethiopia from the volatile equation and encourage more moderate leaders within the Islamic movement to join the transitional government.

DOJ_NMG_0106479

Some analysts, however, contend that the measure has already prompted the Islamic Courts to push toward Baidoa and will ultimately serve as a rallying point for the movement's more radical factions, which have said they would consider any African Union force a foreign invasion.

In any case, deployment could take months. The president of the transitional government has requested 8,000 African Union troops, though only one battalion of about 800 Ugandan troops is ready, according to African Union officials.

In question at the moment is whether the Islamic movement or Ethiopia will mount a full-fledged offensive before the African Union soldiers deploy, and whether the transitional government, which has spent much of its time exiled at the InterContinental Hotel in Nairobi, will simply disintegrate, leaving no internationally recognized government for the United Nations, or Ethiopia, to support.

"My feeling is that Ethiopia will go to war. . . . Their own security is at stake," a senior Kenyan diplomat said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation. "Unfortunately, the [U.N.] resolution was sponsored by the United States, and it will be used by the Courts as a propaganda tool. But at least there's a window."

Besides fear of an Islamic government on its border, an increasingly authoritarian Ethiopian government is also concerned about radicalization of its own Muslim citizens, who now account for nearly 50 percent of the population. The government has accused the Islamic Courts of training and arming insurgent groups in the ethnically Somali region of Ethiopia called the Ogaden. The two countries have been to war over the area three times since Somalia's independence in 1960.

The situation unfolding in Somalia, a society of warring clans and sub-clans without a central government since dictator Mohamed Siad Barre fell in 1991, is one in which diplomats, analysts and others involved tend to agree on one point: that war would be disastrous, threatening to destabilize a region of great strategic import not only to Africa but also to the United States, because of its proximity to the Middle East and Red Sea shipping lanes.

A triple car bombing at a checkpoint outside Baidoa last month heightened those fears, with the transitional government blaming the attack on al-Qaeda sympathizers within the Islamic Courts, which denied responsibility. Some analysts say that even if Ethiopia, which has a predominantly Christian army, initially trounces Islamic Courts fighters in a war, the movement's more radical members might retaliate with suicide bombings and other terrorist-style attacks in neighboring countries such as Kenya, Ethiopia and Djibouti, where the United States has a significant military presence.

"I think if the ICU [Islamic Courts Union] suffers from defeat, it will only take months for them to regroup and it would strengthen them internally," said Matt Bryden, a consultant with the International Crisis Group, a policy research group. "If they are hit, there is a risk they would come back on steroids and pose a threat to the whole region."

Meles rejected that argument, saying the policy of dialogue and engagement has only bought the Islamic Courts movement time to expand its control.

"It surprises me that intelligent people at the dawn of the 21st century could claim that if you respond to terrorism with force, you spawn terrorism," he said. "But that if you appease them, you somehow tame them."

Since 1991, Somalia has held no fewer than 15 peace conferences aimed at cobbling together some sort of central government.

A U.S.-led attempt to stabilize the country led to the deaths of 18 American troops in an October 1993 battle depicted in the movie "Black Hawk Down." After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the U.S. government was accused of bungling Somalia policy again by supporting warlords marketing themselves as an "anti-terrorism coalition," who generally terrorized Somalis who came to hate them.

The Islamic Courts, initially a grouping of local clerics, offered an alternative to that lawlessness, establishing an order based on Islamic law village by village, often persuading local militias to join them.

A recent U.N. study found that although the transitional government is supported by Ethiopia, among other countries, the Islamic Courts are receiving substantial assistance from Iran and Hezbollah, a claim some regional analysts contend is exaggerated.

Support for the Islamic movement by Eritrea, Ethiopia's neighbor and rival, appears to be a big part of Ethiopia's motivation. The Ethiopia-Eritrea proxy conflict in Somalia could ignite a regional conflagration and threaten U.S. anti-terrorism efforts in the Horn of Africa, according to a report due out this week from the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations. It describes "a general unraveling of U.S. foreign policy" in the region and calls for the United States to exert stronger pressure on the two countries to implement a U.S.-brokered border agreement.

The U.N. study found that the Islamic Courts group has also raised money from various Arab states and the Somali diaspora. Relatively quickly, the movement established an efficient system of taxation and social welfare programs that enabled businesses to function and that seem to have earned support among Somalis, even if many in the traditionally moderate country are uneasy with the harsher aspects of Islamic law. At the same time, the movement has been backed by a more radical military wing called the shebab, made up of young men raised in a chaotic country awash with weapons, and indoctrinated with the ideology of holy war.

DOJ_NMG_0106480

Both the United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts of harboring suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and other attacks. Movement officials have denied that, accusing both countries of waging a propaganda war.

Diplomats and analysts differ sharply on whether Islamic Courts leaders such as Sheik Hassan Aweys are genuinely striving for legitimacy or cynically concealing a radical agenda.

"The Courts are not monolithic" said Mario Raffaelli, an Italian diplomat working in Somalia. "In my experience, the majority is not following this extreme approach."

Raffaelli said the Courts group has an incentive to negotiate even with a weak transitional government because doing so would provide the movement with legitimacy.

Some observers, including Ethiopians opposed to war, are convinced that the United States is tacitly giving a green light to Ethiopia to attack. That, they say, would amount to the worst U.S. policy blunder yet in Somalia. Beyene Petros, an opposition leader in Ethiopia's parliament, questioned the wisdom of a visit that Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the U.S. Central Command, paid Meles in Ethiopia last week.

"If there is disapproval, you don't pay visits, right?" he said. "We used to see this call for restraint, but I have not seen that lately."

Staff writer Karen DeYoung in Washington contributed to this report.

Russia Ready To Cut Off Gas Supplies To Belarus, Georgia (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

Russia is preparing to cut off natural gas supplies to neighbouring Belarus and Georgia unless the two former Soviet republics agree by the year-end to pay much higher prices in 2007.

Coming a year after Gazprom, the Russian gas giant, briefly cut gas to Ukraine in a similar pricing dispute, such a move could provoke further criticism that Moscow is using energy as a political tool. It might also intensify pressure on Russia to ratify the European Energy Charter treaty, which would require such disagreements to be resolved through arbitration.

Action against Belarus could affect supplies to Poland and Germany because a transit pipeline runs across the republic, though it carries only a third of the volumes running through a bigger export pipeline across Ukraine. Last January, pressure in the trans-Ukrainian pipeline to western Europe dropped as a result of what Gazprom said was Ukraine "stealing" gas for its own use.

Gazprom has made clear it is prepared to reduce price increases in exchange for stakes in the republics' gas distribution networks. It is pushing hard for 50 per cent of Beltransgaz, the Belarusian company that also controls the export pipeline across the country, although Russia and Belarus differ sharply over its value.

Dmitry Medvedev, Gazprom chairman and Russia's first deputy prime minister, declined to comment directly to western reporters this week on whether the company was prepared to cut off supplies. But he admitted negotiations were "not easy".

Sergei Kuprianov, a Gazprom spokesman, told a radio station he could not exclude a cut-off to Belarus, though he added: "We would hate to see that." But it is understood Gazprom is preparing for a worst-case scenario if agreements are not reached.

Senior Russian officials say the increases are a move away from subsidised supplies for former Soviet republics towards transparent market pricing, which Gazprom aims to achieve by 2008.

While Belarus has been happy to remain in Moscow's orbit, western-leaning Georgia sees the threat as politically motivated. It has seen Russia sever transport and mail links in a feud and portrays the demand to double the price it pays from $110 per thousand cubic metres to $230 - close to European levels - as a matter of more than economics.

Georgian officials say because Georgia's gas is sourced from nearby Central Asia, it should pay less than more distant European customers. It says it can replace Russian gas with supplies from Azerbaijan and from Iran. But as well as trying to raise prices to $230 to Azerbaijan, Russia is reducing its gas exports to the country next year.

Putin Turns On Close Ally Belarus (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

Russia is set to deal a double blow to the economy of one of its closest allies – potentially making life much more difficult for the man the US has called “Europe’s last dictator”.

DOJ_NMG_0106481

As well as pressing for Belarus to pay much more for its natural gas, Moscow said this week it would slap an export duty on what are currently duty-free Russian crude oil exports to its close Slavic neighbour of $180.70 per tonne from next year.

The measures could sharply reduce or wipe out the $4bn-plus effective annual subsidy Russia provides to Belarus, which has helped Alexander Lukashenko, its authoritarian president, deliver higher wages and living standards to his 10m people.

That, say analysts, could make it harder to sustain the support that saw Mr Lukashenko re-elected last March to a third presidential term with 82 per cent of the vote – albeit in a poll international observers condemned as below international standards. It could also drive a wedge between countries with close cultural and historic links.

"Raising gas prices to [market] levels is equivalent to breaking off relations entirely," Mr Lukashenko recently told Russian journalists visiting Minsk. "We will survive, but you will lose the last ally."

Belarus pays only $46.67 per thousand cubic metres for Russian gas, saving it more than $3bn compared to market prices, but Russia is now pushing to increase the price to $200.

At the same time, Belarus imports duty-free crude from Russia, refines it at two refineries, and sells the petroleum products to western Europe at market prices, pocketing a healthy profit. Russian export duties will deprive the Belarus budget of about $1.7bn a year.

This is a sharp turnaround from nine months ago, when Russian president Vladimir Putin was criticised for being one of the few world leaders to congratulate Mr Lukashenko on his controversial election victory. It is the more surprising since Russia and Belarus signed agreements in the mid-1990s on creating a political and economic union, including a common currency and union constitution.

Analysts from both countries suggest Moscow is penalising Mr Lukashenko for not delivering on pledges of closer integration with Russia, including the currency union and selling half of Beltransgaz, the Belarusian gas distributor, to Gazprom, the Russian natural gas giant. Beltransgaz controls the gas export pipeline to western Europe.

"Mr Lukashenko monetised his rhetoric," says Yaroslav Romanchuk, head of the Mizes Research Centre, a Minsk think-tank. "He sold his integration pledges for a high price, but now Putin feels he was cheated."

Analysts attribute Mr Lukashenko's support for the union state in the 1990s to his belief that it could lead to a senior position for him in Moscow – even president of the union. His enthusiasm waned after the Kremlin made it clear there was no prospect of that.

Mr Lukashenko says there can be no talk of further integration with Russia in a pre-election period. That would postpone matters until after Russia's presidential elections in 2008.

The Belarus president now has a difficult choice. He is loath to cede a half-share to Russia in Beltransgaz, which one western diplomat calls Belarus's "sacred cow".

But even a limited gas price increase could render much of the country's largely state-owned industry uncompetitive – and handing over the Beltransgaz stake would probably only delay Russia's demands for a higher gas price. Stanislav Bogdankevich, a former Belarus central bank governor, estimates that 60 per cent of Belarusian industry is barely profitable or loss-making.

Independent economists suggest Mr Lukashenko may be forced to introduce market reforms into the economy. That could mean privatising some of its more attractive industrial assets – with Russian companies the most likely buyers.

From Russia, With Polonium (WP)

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

IT'S STILL not known how the former Russian KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko came to ingest the deadly dose of polonium-210 that killed him in London last month. But thanks to the radioactive trail left behind by the isotope, some important conclusions about the case are now possible.

First, the polonium was smuggled into Britain from Russia, where most of the known global supply of the intensely toxic substance is produced. Second, the dose was almost certainly carried by one or both of the former Russian security operatives -- one of them also a KGB alumnus -- whom Mr. Litvinenko met at a London hotel Nov. 1. Finally, the government of Vladimir Putin is making it difficult for British and German investigators to question the suspects, who are now sequestered in Moscow hospitals.

Does this mean that Mr. Putin or the FSB agency -- successor to the KGB -- is responsible for the death of Mr. Litvinenko? Not necessarily: It's conceivable, as Russian and some Western investigators have lately begun suggesting, that he was a victim of a botched attempt to smuggle nuclear materials out of Russia for some other purpose. Still, Mr. Litvinenko is one of a number of opponents of Mr. Putin who have fallen victim to poisonings in the past several years; he himself charged that the FSB maintained a poisons laboratory, and he accused Mr. Putin of ordering his assassination. The Russian president retorted that enemies based abroad are staging operations to discredit him. But why, then, did the instrument of Mr. Litvinenko's death come from Moscow? And why are Russian authorities shielding the two men implicated in the smuggling?

DOJ_NMG_0106482

Mr. Litvinenko's case, like that of the murdered journalist Anna Politkovskaya, may never be solved. But what is already known should cause Western governments, including the Bush administration, to insist on some answers from Mr. Putin. How did a toxic dose of polonium, a substance reportedly produced and held by only three Russian government entities and one private company, come into the hands of people who could smuggle it into Britain? Polonium can be used not only to poison someone; it can trigger a nuclear weapon or fuel a "dirty bomb" that could wreak havoc in a major city. The leakage of such materials is a serious threat -- and not just to enemies of Mr. Putin.

Russia's Killing Ways (WP)

By Oleg Gordievsky

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

The KGB and its predecessors liquidated people abroad quite regularly in the 1920s and '30s and even after World War II. But after two embarrassing and highly publicized defections of assassins, in 1957 and 1959, these activities ceased. Nikita Khrushchev, Leonid Brezhnev and later Yuri Andropov all avoided political killings when they led the Soviet Union.

(Of course, this did not prevent the assassination in London of Georgi Markov in 1978, when the Bulgarian dictator Todor Zhivkov persuaded Andropov to allow the KGB to help carry out such an operation.)

There were no secret assassinations under Mikhail Gorbachev or Boris Yeltsin. But under Vladimir Putin, the militant element of the KGB (now known as the FSB) slowly began working to persuade the leadership to carry out such killings, according to my sources. "Too many enemies," they said.

Those members of the FSB have a different style than in the past, however. The Communist Party was cruel, but it had its rules. The current people are like bandits -- no code, no rules, hard to distinguish from the Mafia. The gangster mentality started to spread after 2000; there were assassinations inside the country, of enemies of the regime. But there were so many contract killings at the time under Putin that it was difficult to tell which were the work of the FSB and which were not. In that atmosphere, it was easy to disguise an assassination.

The FSB has also become a protection racket. Some of those in business who are willing to go along with the FSB report everything to its operatives and also give 10 percent of their profits to the KGB's successor agency. And everyone is happy.

So in a way it's a big criminal state. The FSB has become like the Mafia in its methods and goals.

In 2003 the journalist and reformist politician Yuri Shchekochikhin was murdered in Russia. It was obvious from the way his "illness" developed that he was poisoned.

Anna Politkovskaya, a courageous journalist, honest and intelligent, was shot two months ago. Well before that -- in 2004 -- she was poisoned on a flight to the Caucasus. It was, I am certain, the work of the FSB. Afterward, the Putin-controlled media put out the usual propaganda to cover up the act. After Politkovskaya's death this year, many Russians said -- because she was Jewish and had American citizenship -- "Oh, just as well someone shot her; she was probably an American spy."

In July Russia's parliament passed a law, introduced by Putin, to permit the assassination of "enemies of the Russian regime" abroad. As a result, overeager -- perhaps chauvinistic, anti-Semitic or xenophobic -- factions within the FSB may suggest someone to kill. But there is no paper trail. (By the way, I don't think the recent illness of Yegor Gaidar -- a man whom nobody reads, whose importance is entirely in the past -- was due to poison. He is too insignificant to be killed by the regime.)

Here, too, the FSB has learned from the example of Joseph Stalin. Documents proving Stalin's atrocities continue to surface. To prevent such disclosures, orders for assassinations no longer have names or signatures on them, according to what I am told by my connections. Directives such as the one to assassinate Alexander Litvinenko are written to say, for example, "Request permission to carry out inquiry abroad," with no mention of the target. The document goes to an archive with nothing tying those involved to an assassination.

The first such killing took place three years ago, in Qatar. Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev, a former president of the Chechen republic, lived there as a pensioner, and was with his son and bodyguard when his car exploded. The two Russian intelligence agents who carried out the killing were caught, tried and imprisoned. But because Qatar wanted to avoid trouble with Russia, the prisoners were released to their home country after five months, to serve their sentences there. Once home, however, they were decorated rather than jailed.

Now, with Litvinenko, they have dared to kill a citizen of Britain on the soil of that country. Yandarbiyev, Shchekochikhin, Politkovskaya, Litvinenko: Russia has become a terrorist regime.

The writer, who was once a colonel in the Soviet KGB, defected to Britain in 1985.

DOJ_NMG_0106483

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Thursday, December 14, 2006 10:42 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 12/14/06 Civil Division News

Judge Rejects Guantanamo Inmate's Detention Challenge

Judge Sets Back Guantánamo Detainees

Father of Australian Guantanamo Bay detainee attacks U.S. court ruling

Judge's findings laid foundation for new investigation (Arar)

Cheney visit ruling appealed

Dukakis Testifies in Limone Trial

New Cobell judge has experience with DOI

FBI testimony that terrorism expertise not important made public (Bassem Youssef)

Judge rules against 2005 bankruptcy law; Restrictions on lawyers' advice, ads cited

Opinion: Why Signing a Waiver to Avoid Vaccines Can Be Considered Abuse

Commentary: 20 Year-Old Whistleblower Law: A Gift that Keeps on Giving

Bloomberg

December 14, 2006

Judge Rejects Guantanamo Inmate's Detention Challenge

By Jeffrey St.Onge

A judge threw out a challenge by Osama bin Laden's former driver to his detention at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, saying a new U.S. law bars federal trial courts from hearing such cases.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson in Washington today dismissed the petition by Salim Ahmed Hamdan. The ruling is the first to apply the military-tribunal law that strips courts' authority to hear detention challenges by ``enemy combatants'' through a request for a writ of habeas corpus.

Hamdan, who is accused of conspiracy, won a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that Congress hadn't authorized military tribunals to try suspected terrorists. That ruling led Congress to enact the Military Commissions Act, signed by President George W. Bush on Oct. 17. The law requires inmates to go through a military review, with a limited right of appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

DOJ_NMG_0106484

``Hamdan is to face a military commission newly designed, because of his efforts, by a Congress that finally stepped up to its responsibility, acting according to guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court,'' wrote Robertson. ``It is difficult to see how continued habeas jurisdiction could make further improvements in his tribunal.''

Robertson said Hamdan's bid for a court hearing ``is blocked by the jurisdiction-stripping language'' of the new law, adding that he has no separate constitutional right to file a habeas- corpus claim. Robertson was appointed by former President Bill Clinton.

Hundreds of Detainees

The Bush administration says the law strips hundreds of Guantanamo detainees of their right to a court hearing to challenge their confinement. The Guantanamo prison has drawn international criticism since it opened in 2002 to house suspected terrorists captured after the Sept. 11 attacks. Bush has repeatedly said he would like to close it.

After its decision in June, the Supreme Court sent Hamdan's case back to Robertson for further proceedings. Hamdan can appeal today's ruling to the D.C. Circuit, where a separate case brought by hundreds of Guantanamo Bay inmates is awaiting decision. The decision in that case is almost certain to be appealed to the Supreme Court, lawyers say.

Hamdan's lawyer, Neal Katyal, didn't immediately return a voicemail message seeking comment on the ruling.

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees have argued that military tribunals would provide fewer rights than a federal court, and that the Constitution doesn't allow the U.S. to take away their right to challenge their detention in court.

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed

Among those who will be brought to trial under the law is Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind. He and 13 other terrorism suspects, who were labeled ``high value'' and had been held in secret overseas prisons operated by the Central Intelligence Agency, were transferred to the Guantanamo Bay prison.

Thomas Wilner, a lawyer representing Guantanamo detainees in the separate case, said in an interview that Robertson's decision ``is not only significantly wrong, it misses the key argument'' based on the Supreme Court's decision that detainees have rights under legal precedent dating to the founding of the country.

Wilner said Robertson's ruling won't affect the D.C. Circuit's expected ruling on the separate Guantanamo case. That dispute involves Guantanamo detainees who haven't been charged with a crime -- the vast majority of about 430 inmates held at the U.S. naval base in Cuba.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department was pleased with Robertson's ruling.

`More Process'

``The Constitution does not provide alien enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo Bay with the constitutional right to file a petition for habeas corpus,'' she said. ``Detainees may challenge their detention before fair military tribunals with an appeal to the D.C. Circuit, and that is more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts.''

Hamdan, who is from Yemen, worked for bin Laden in three stretches from 1996 to 2001, at least occasionally driving the al-Qaeda leader and delivering weapons. Hamdan's attorneys say he was a poor man who worked for bin Laden to earn money so that he could support his family.

The government says Hamdan conspired with bin Laden and other al-Qaeda leaders to wage war against the U.S. and attack civilians.

The case is Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 04-1519, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

END

New York Times

December 14, 2006

Judge Sets Back Guantánamo Detainees

By NEIL A. LEWIS

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — For the first time, a court has affirmed that a law enacted this fall accomplishes what the White House and its Congressional supporters sought: stripping the federal judiciary of the authority to hear challenges from detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0106485

In a ruling Wednesday, Judge James Robertson of the Federal District Court here said Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a prisoner at Guantánamo, could no longer contest his detention before a federal court because, Judge Robertson said, Congress this fall explicitly eliminated his right to file a habeas corpus challenge.

The judge said the Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress in September and signed into law by President Bush the following month, was unambiguous in denying Guantánamo detainees the use of a habeas corpus statute. Like Mr. Hamdan, hundreds of other prisoners at the base have challenged their detention, in similar cases.

It was Judge Robertson who granted Mr. Hamdan's habeas petition in November 2004, abruptly halting his war crimes trial in the middle of proceedings at Guantánamo by ruling that the process was fatally flawed.

But in his decision Wednesday, the judge said circumstances had changed fundamentally with enactment of the new law. And not only is Mr. Hamdan barred from a challenge under the habeas statute, the judge said, he cannot follow the usual second avenue to bring a habeas challenge — invoking the Constitution — because it is unclear that noncitizens at Guantánamo have that right.

Mr. Hamdan is a Yemeni who was a driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan and was captured there in November 2001. He has been at the center of a debate about the Bush administration's legal tactics in fighting terrorism, his challenge occupying not only the White House but also Congress and the courts — up to the Supreme Court, which will almost certainly have to revisit the case.

The Supreme Court first ruled in the Hamdan case in June, when it repudiated the administration's efforts to put Guantánamo detainees on trial before military commissions. That 5-to-3 ruling said Mr. Bush had overstepped his constitutional bounds by establishing the commissions without Congressional authorization. Further, the justices said a previous law stripping Guantánamo detainees of habeas corpus protections did so only prospectively — that is, it did not void the several hundred habeas petitions already filed in federal courts.

In response, the Republican-controlled Congress adopted the Military Commissions Act to address, explicitly and retroactively, the question of the habeas statute's application to Guantánamo.

Judge Robertson's opinion on Wednesday said in effect that in enacting the new law, Congress and the president had undone the basis of the Supreme Court's ruling.

The judge said that although Mr. Hamdan was asserting that he was entitled to habeas protection because he had never been tried properly, he would soon "face a military commission newly designed, because of his efforts, by a Congress that finally stepped up to its responsibility, acting according to guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court."

The issue of whether Mr. Hamdan and other Guantánamo detainees have a constitutional, rather than a statutory, right to habeas corpus is almost certain to form the heart of the legal debate that will next occur in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, before an ultimate decision by the Supreme Court. The appeals court is already considering the application of the new law in dozens of other habeas cases brought by detainees.

But by the time the cases make their way through the system, Mr. Hamdan and some other prisoners may have already been tried by military commissions, making the habeas issue moot as it applies to them.

Once the Military Commissions Act was adopted this fall, senior Pentagon officials said they hoped to resume war crimes trials before the newly reconstituted commissions by next summer. Mr. Hamdan, who has maintained that he was only a driver at the bin Laden farm and not a terrorist, may well be one of the first to go before the new commissions.

END

AP

December 14, 2006

Father of Australian Guantanamo Bay detainee attacks U.S. court ruling

ADELAIDE, Australia_The father of the only Australian held at Guantanamo Bay said Thursday he is disgusted by a U.S. Federal Court decision that terror suspects imprisoned at the military base have no right to challenge their detention in the U.S. court system.

In the ruling Wednesday, U.S. District Judge James Robertson rejected a legal challenge by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for al-Qaida mastermind Osama bin Laden, and upheld the Military Commissions Act, which strips the right of enemy combatants to seek their freedom in U.S. courts.

Terry Hicks, father of 31-year-old alleged Taliban fighter David Hicks, said the ruling left his son at the whim of the U.S.

military commission that would try his case.

"I think it is disgusting that the U.S. has taken away a person's normal court appeal process in this way," he said.

But Terry Hicks said he remained hopeful that his son will be released from Guantanamo by a lawsuit in the Australian Federal Court that starts Friday in Sydney.

Hicks' lawyers accuse Attorney General Philip Ruddock and Foreign Minister Alexander Downer of failing in their constitutional duty to assist Australian citizens overseas.

The lawyers say the Federal Court should order the two ministers to request that the United States repatriate Hicks, who has been in custody for five years.

Hicks' Pentagon-appointed lawyer Maj. Michael Mori arrived in Sydney on Thursday for the case.

Mori said the question of whether Guantanamo inmates can challenge their imprisonment will probably be determined by an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We're not going to know the end result probably for another year and a half when it makes it back to the Supreme Court," Mori told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

"As we've seen over the last five years, the administration has won at the lower courts and at the middle courts, but at the Supreme Court, they've always lost and that's what I expect would happen," he added.

END

Globe and Mail

December 14, 2006

THE ARAR REPORT

Judge's findings laid foundation for new investigation (Arar)

COLIN FREEZE AND JEFF SALLOT

OTTAWA -- Now winding up his work on the Maher Arar inquiry, Mr. Justice Dennis O'Connor will not be presiding over a new judicial inquiry announced this week. Yet in many ways, he has laid the groundwork for the new probe.

While he was tasked only with probing Canadian complicity in the Syrian detention of Mr. Arar, Judge O'Connor was clearly troubled by the intertwined cases of other Canadian Arabs who were targets of an RCMP investigation before ending up in Syrian jails.

"I did not conduct anything approaching a full review," Judge O'Connor wrote in his findings, adding that this would be "an enormously time-consuming task" outside of his mandate.

But he did say there was a" pattern of investigative practices" that included officials "accepting and relying upon information that might be the product of torture." And such practices, Judge O'Connor said, "show that Canadian officials' treatment of Mr. Arar was not unique. They are indicative of systemic problems that should be addressed by the relevant agencies."

What follows is a look at how Judge O'Connor highlighted problems in the cases of the three individuals, which will now be examined by former Supreme Court judge Frank Iacobucci.

Abdullah Almalki

Mr. Almalki, a Syrian-Canadian, worked for an Afghanistan-based charity in the early 1990s before returning to Canada to start an electronic-equipment export business.

Before long, Canadian agents were inviting him out for coffee to ask him questions about Afghanistan, and whether he was exporting any equipment to the Taliban or al-Qaeda. Mr. Almalki has always insisted he never sold any equipment to Afghanistan.

After the September, 2001, attacks in the United States, Mounties began to place Mr. Almalki under a microscope. He was arrested the next year in Damascus as he flew into Syria.

Judge O'Connor found that the Mounties faxed two lists of questions to Syrian military intelligence officials while Mr. Almalki was jailed there. "Depending on his willingness to answer truthfully and depending on the answers he provides to you, a second series of questions has been prepared for him," the fax said.

Mr. Almalki spent nearly two years jailed in Syria before he was freed and allowed to return to Canada, where he has never been charged with any crime.

Ahmad El Maati

Mr. El Maati, a Toronto truck driver, has said he is not surprised that Canadian counterterrorism investigators were very interested in him after the Sept. 11 attacks.

He had once taken flying lessons. Years earlier, he and his older brother, Amer, had once served with a mujahedeen force that had fought to topple the Soviet-backed regime in Afghanistan. But, Judge O'Connor noted, Mr. El Maati has never been charged with a crime and is still presumed innocent. Mr. El Maati says he was planning to attend an arranged wedding in Syria a month after the 9/11 attacks, when he was arrested at the Damascus airport.

The O'Connor report says the Mounties were soon expressing an interest in interviewing Mr. El Maati while he was in Syrian custody, and also in Egyptian custody, to which he was transferred within weeks of his arrests. Yet the RCMP wasn't successful in following through in either country.

A censored portion of the Arar report suggests that a confession extracted from Mr. El-Maati under torture in Syria could have figured into search warrants executed by the RCMP in Canada.

Mr. El Maati, who says he was coerced into making false confessions, was released to Canada in 2004 and now lives freely.

Muyyed Nurredin

A Canadian geologist from Toronto and a former principal of an Islamic school, he was arrested by the Syrians at a land border crossing with Iraq, his country of birth.

Judge O'Connor said there are fewer links between the Nureddin case and the other cases. He was not imprisoned in Syria until after Mr. Arar was released and he was held for only a month.

"Thus, drawing parallels between what happened to Mr. Arar and Mr. Nureddin is more difficult," Judge O'Connor wrote.

END

AP

December 14, 2006

Judge Demands Answers on Katrina Housing

By MATT APUZZO

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_A federal judge called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program "a legal disaster" Wednesday and ordered officials to explain a computer system that can neither precisely count evacuees nor provide reasons why they were denied aid.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without notice, admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for between 3,600 and 5,500 storm victims.

"Let me make this clear," Leon told government attorney Michael Sitcov. "Tell FEMA that I'm expecting them to get going on this. Like immediately."

Leon ruled that FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer. Instead of explaining why funding was being cut, FEMA provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Leon said.

The judge ordered FEMA to explain those decisions so thousands of evacuees can understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal.

"I'm not looking for a doctoral dissertation," Leon said. "I'm looking for a couple of paragraphs in plain English."

Sitcov said that FEMA's computer system cannot do what the judge wants. The eight-year-old system is set up only to produce program codes, he said. The program also cannot say for certain how many evacuees in Texas were covered by Leon's order or how many people appealed the denial of their aid, Sitcov said.

"It's not as adept at doing these kinds of machinations," said Sitcov, who said the best estimate of evacuees covered by the order was 5,479.

Leon appeared bewildered and ordered FEMA officials to testify Monday about the program. He said he didn't understand why the letters couldn't be written by hand. He said 10 employees, working overtime and on weekends could translate program codes into 5,000 understandable letters in two weeks _ nearly the amount of time that has passed since his ruling.

"This is a legal disaster. People's rights are being denied," Leon said. "I don't want us to get so mired in the minutiae and the law while, in the meantime, people who need help are not getting help."

FEMA has appealed Leon's order and is hoping a higher court will block its enforcement until the appeal plays out. That ruling is unlikely before next week, and Leon said he wants the agency to start working on the problem immediately.

"Two weeks have been lost and I don't want another day to be lost," Leon said. "We've got to get moving."

Sitcov said FEMA could not comply with the order to restart the housing program because the agreements to reimburse Texas cities for rental payments have expired. Leon said he's sure local governments would be willing to make those same agreements again and said he might order Texas officials to testify Monday.

Leon also scheduled a telephone conference Friday between FEMA and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit on behalf of hurricane victims.

END

AP
December 14, 2006

Cheney visit ruling appealed

From the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration asked an appeals court Wednesday to overrule a federal judge and allow the White House to keep secret any records of visitors to Vice President Dick Cheney's residence and office.

To make the visitor records public would be an "unprecedented intrusion into the daily operations of the vice presidency," the Justice Department argued in a 57-page brief to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The government was responding to an October order, by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, to release two years of White House visitor logs to the Washington Post. The newspaper, researching the access lobbyists had to the White House, sought Secret Service records for anyone visiting Cheney and top aides and advisors.

Urbina questioned the government's argument that the logs are protected by Cheney's right to executive privilege.

END

DOJ_NMG_0106489

Boston Globe

December 14, 2006

Dukakis Testifies in Limone Trial

By Shelley Murphy
Globe Staff

Former Governor Michael S. Dukakis testified Wednesday that he carefully considered every inmate's request for clemency in the 1980s, even reviewing case files at home at night before deciding whether they should be set free.

But Dukakis said he only recalled one instance when the state's top federal prosecutor weighed in on a clemency petition — in 1983, when then US Attorney William F. Weld urged him to reject Peter J. Limone's bid for freedom.

Considering how ''unusual'' it was to get such a letter, Dukakis said he gave ''substantial'' weight to Weld's warning that Limone would ''assume charge of the day-to-day operations of organized crime in this area'' if released.

The governor said he urged the governor's council not to commute the life sentences of Limone and his codefendant, Louis Greco, in the 1980s, but obviously would have felt differently if he knew the men had been wrongfully convicted of the 1965 gangland slaying of petty thief Edward ''Teddy'' Deegan in Chelsea.

Dukakis, who served as governor from 1975 to 1978 and from 1983 to 1990, was called to the stand in a civil trial, where Limone, Joseph Salvati, and the families of Greco and Henry Tameleo, who are both dead, are seeking more than $100 million from the government for falsely imprisoning the men.

Later, on his way out of the courthouse, Dukakis said it was ''disgraceful'' that two Italian-American members of the parole board were investigated by the FBI for alleged ties to organized crime after they voted to commute Limone's sentence in 1983.

''Now that we know what was going on in the (FBI) office, we were all deceived,'' said Dukakis, referring to the racketeering conviction of former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. for his handling of longtime informants James ''Whitey'' Bulger and Stephen ''The Rifleman'' Flemmi, and to the murder indictment of former FBI agent H. Paul Rico, who died in jail while awaiting trial. ''In fact, the bureau itself was betrayed.''

Limone and Salvati spent more than 30 years in prison before they were exonerated five years ago after the revelation that secret FBI reports, never turned over at their 1968 trial, indicated they had been framed by the government's key witness, Mafia hitman Joseph ''The Animal'' Barboza. Tameleo and Greco died in prison.

Dukakis acknowledged he knew nothing about allegations that then-FBI agent Dennis Condon was aware Barboza was lying and yet vouched for his credibility during the trial.

But on the stand, Dukakis defended the integrity of Condon, who served as public safety commissioner during his administration. He later told reporters, ''There really wasn't a better public servant walking the earth, in my opinion.''

Barboza testified during the 1968 trial that Limone, who allegedly had ties to organized crime, paid him $7,500 to kill Deegan and that Tameleo, the mob's reputed consigliere, sanctioned the hit. Barboza, who was given leniency for his cooperation, claimed Salvati and Greco participated in the slaying.

In earlier testimony Wednesday, former defense attorney F. Lee Bailey testified that Barboza confided to him two years after the convictions that Rico was part of a plot to frame the four men.

Bailey said Barboza claimed that Rico told him the FBI wanted to prosecute ''high-profile'' organized crime figures and suggested he implicate Tameleo and Limone in Deegan's slaying.

''He said he was told (by Rico) to give us two and you can name two,'' said Bailey, adding that Barboza added Salvati and Greco because he disliked them.

Bailey said Barboza admitted protecting one of the true killers, his close friend Vincent ''Jimmy'' Flemmi, who was also an FBI informant. Flemmi, who died in prison in 1979, was the brother of longtime FBI informant, Stephen Flemmi.

Bailey said he agreed to represent Barboza in his recantation, but only after the mobster said he would take a lie detector test. But Bailey said the test was never given.

Barboza's possible recantation became public in 1970 when he signed an affidavit saying portions of his trial testimony were false. But later Barboza told federal prosecutors he was only pretending to recant as part of a plot to extort money from local Mafia leaders, according to court records.

Barboza was gunned down by another mobster in 1976 in San Francisco.

Rico died in January 2004, in jail, awaiting trial on charges that he helped Bulger and Stephen Flemmi orchestrate the 1981 slaying of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler.

END

Indianz.Com.

December 13, 2006

New Cobell judge has experience with DOI

The new judge for the Cobell trust fund lawsuit has experience with the Interior Department, though it hasn't always been a positive one.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson has sat on the bench since 1994, after being appointed by President Bill Clinton. In those years, he has several Indian law disputes on topics like land-into-trust, gaming and sovereignty.

But it's a recent case on federal recognition that tested Robertson's patience with the Bureau of Indian Affairs. He blasted the agency for failing to make a timely decision on the petition for the Mashpee Wampanoag Tribe.

"The people involved in making the decisions at the BIA have completely lost track of the whole concept of deadlines," Robertson said at a February 2005 hearing.

Robertson was so fed up with the inaction that he imposed deadlines on the agency. But rather than follow the order, government lawyers appealed and got it overturned.

The same scenario faces the judge as he takes on the largest class action against the government. Filed in 1996, the Cobell case has appealed nearly a dozen times as the government, during both the Clinton and Bush administrations, has sought to limit its trust responsibilities.

The effort ramped up during the Bush administration, resulting in the unprecedented removal of Judge Royce Lamberth. Government lawyers claimed he was biased, a charge they levied against two other court officials who also left the case.

Elouise Cobell, the lead plaintiff, hopes Robertson won't meet a similar end. She pledged to try and get the dispute resolved as soon as possible.

"We want to see this case resolved quickly," Cobell said last week after Robertson was assigned to the case. "We will work in good faith with Judge Robertson to end this century-long injustice that the government has done to Native people."

In his Indian law cases, Robertson has expressed sympathy for tribal plaintiffs. After being overturned on appeal in the Mashpee case, he continued to rail against the BIA and its management practices.

Robertson already knew about the federal recognition process from an earlier case he handled involving the Ramapough Mountain Tribe of New Jersey. He heard evidence of a leak to an unfriendly Congressman and alleged mishandling of documents but concluded the BIA didn't break the law by rejecting the tribe.

On land-into-trust, Robertson dealt with the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act and its application to restored tribes. He rejected an anti-casino group's attempt to block a land-into-trust acquisition for the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi Indians of Michigan.

Robertson heard more gaming-related issues in a lawsuit over membership in the Shakopee Mdewankanton Sioux Community of Minnesota. Some tribal members challenged the BIA's approval of an adoption ordinance, which would have spread casino per capita payments among more people.

In attempting to resolve the dispute, Robertson was careful not to tread on tribal rights. "The court is sensitive to the federal government's long-standing policy of encouraging tribal self-government and recognizes that this policy reflects the Indian tribes' retention of attributes of sovereignty over their members and territories," he wrote in December 2006.

But he questioned why the members who opposed the ordinance were excluded from Interior's appeals process. The case was sent back to the department for further review.

In a more recent case, Robertson heard from a small California tribe whose leaders have been embroiled in a leadership feud for several years. The dispute centered over the interpretation of a little-noticed amendment to the Indian Reorganization Act that was passed in March 2004.

Robertson refused to free the California Valley Miwok Tribe from federal oversight. The BIA refuses to recognize the tribe's governing structure and has pulled funding for the tribe's self-determination contracts due to the leadership fight.

Despite his experience, Robertson hasn't handled any trust-related cases. He came close in a lawsuit over BIA's decision to reject a lease for a hog farm on the Rosebud Sioux Reservation, but the case was transferred to a federal court in South Dakota.

DOJ_NMG_0106491

Robertson has heard a number of cases involving administrative law, which has been a central part of the Cobell lawsuit. Most of these cases involved environmental groups who challenged Interior's decision-making. One case was a challenge from a coal company.

END

AP

December 14, 2006

FBI testimony that terrorism expertise not important made public (Bassem Youssef)

By JOHN SOLOMON

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_Lawyers for a once-decorated terror-fighting FBI agent are making public hundreds of pages of testimony from the bureau's top brass declaring that terrorism expertise has been given little weight in promoting agents since the Sept . 11 , 2001, attacks.

The evidence gathered during Agent Bassem Youssef's ongoing lawsuit against the FBI includes statements from the agency's director, Robert Mueller, and many of his top supervisors on how little Middle Eastern experience, Arabic language skills or formal anti-terrorism training has played in promotion decisions.

The testimony, some of which was reported by The Associated Press in 2005, is being posted Wednesday to a Web site for the public to see. It includes:

_Mueller defending the 2003 appointment of agent Gary Bald to the top terror-fighting job on grounds that he was qualified because he ran the Baltimore office when it investigated the 2002 Washington-area sniper shootings.

"He had the sniper case, which I don't know whether it was actually documented as a domestic terrorism program, but certainly it could fall under the category of domestic terrorism. So running the office gave him some exposure to terrorism matters," Mueller testified.

_Bald, who retired earlier this year, was asked about his grasp of Middle Eastern culture and history, and testified: "I wish that I had it. It would be nice."

_The agent assigned to oversee the Sept. 11 investigation at the Pentagon acknowledged she had no formal terrorism background. "I do not have a terrorism background myself," agent Ellen Knowlton testified.

_John Lewis, a deputy assistant director for counterterrorism, testified that there was no difference in recruiting an informant to infiltrate a white supremacist group or al-Qaida. "It doesn't make any difference whether somebody's from the Middle East or a white supremacist or from Australia," he said.

Youssef, the agent suing the bureau, alleges he was passed over for several promotions that could have better utilized his skills in the war on terror. The FBI denies discriminating against him.

Youssef's lawyer said Tuesday he was making the depositions public so Americans can see the FBI answers for themselves. "The American public has a right to know what really happened inside the FBI counterterrorism division after Sept. 11," attorney Stephen Kohn said.

The documents are to be posted Wednesday to http://www.whistleblowers.org/html/inside_the_fbi.html

An FBI spokesman did not immediately return a call seeking comment Tuesday. In the past, the FBI has declined to discuss the Youssef litigation but has said the agency has fundamentally reshaped itself to ensure the field agents on the ground who work the cases have the necessary skills, training and background for fighting terrorism. It has noted it hired or redeployed more than 1,000 agents to counterterrorism and hired an additional 1,200 intelligence analysts and linguists.

Youssef was credited with improving relations with Saudi Arabia during the late 1990s as the threat from al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden grew and the bureau struggled to solve the case of the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing. He received special awards for his performance.

But after Sept. 11, Youssef repeatedly was passed over for top-level headquarters jobs in terrorism. Instead, he was offered same-rank positions in budgeting or exploiting intelligence from terrorism documents.

Louis Freeh, the former FBI director who left that job three months before the terrorist attacks, testified he believed Youssef should have gotten an important terror-fighting job in the post-Sept. 11 era

And one FBI supervisor, just-retired agent Paul Vick, testified he was concerned that Youssef's skills weren't utilized after Sept. 11 and that some colleagues had mistaken him for another agent who was Muslim and had refused certain work assignments on religious beliefs.

Youssef is Christian and never refused any assignments, his lawyer said.

END

St. Paul Pioneer Press

December 9, 2006

Judge rules against 2005 bankruptcy law; Restrictions on lawyers' advice, ads cited

BY JOHN WELBES
Pioneer Press

A portion of the new U.S. bankruptcy law unfairly restricts attorneys and violates the First Amendment, a U.S. District Court judge in Minneapolis ruled this week.

Ruling in a lawsuit that challenges the bankruptcy law's provisions, Judge James Rosenbaum noted that part of the law "forbids truthful and possibly efficacious advice" from an attorney to a client. "If this is the government's view of legal ethics, it is a form of ethics unfamiliar to the Court."

Rosenbaum's ruling, unveiled on Thursday, denied a motion by the U.S. government to dismiss the case that was brought by bankruptcy attorneys and two anonymous plaintiffs. The attorneys are from Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, a Twin Cities bankruptcy firm well-known for its advertising.

In 2005, President Bush signed the bankruptcy law that makes it harder for debt-ridden Americans to get rid of their financial obligations.

"This law was drawn up by credit card companies," Robert Milavetz, an attorney representing the plaintiffs, said Friday. "Congressmen didn't carefully read this act" before making it law, he said.

Specifically, Rosenbaum's ruling addressed a provision in the 2005 law that says attorneys can't advise their clients to take on more debt as the clients consider filing for bankruptcy. The law also dictates what attorney advertisements must say, and Rosenbaum noted that such regulation is done at the state level. He said the provisions would be unconstitutional if applied to attorneys.

The next step in the case is now up to the U.S. Department of Justice. Officials with the department couldn't be reached for comment Friday.

"I think it will go up through the appeals process," said Larry Ponoroff, dean of the law school at Tulane University in New Orleans. In its broadest sense, he said, Rosenbaum's decision "reveals how internally inconsistent and frankly poorly drafted the 2005 act is."

For the moment, Ponoroff said, bankruptcy lawyers practicing in Minnesota could take comfort in the decision if they choose to pass such information on to their clients.

END

OpEdNews.com

December 13, 2006

Opinion: Why Signing a Waiver to Avoid Vaccines Can Be Considered Abuse

By Anai Rhoads Ford

Recently, the Washington post printed an article about vaccine waivers that could jeopardise your parental rights:

"The American Academy of Pediatrics recommends that doctors ask parents who refuse to vaccinate their children to sign a waiver indicating they are aware of the risks of refusal."

Note: Despite that vaccines have been linked to asthma, autism, diabetes, and sudden infant death syndrome, the author implies that parents are being overly theatrical about the shots.

Know Your Rights

By endorsing this particular waiver, parents would essentially be signing an admittance of neglect and or "abuse" for refusing vaccines. The language contained in this waiver could put parents and caregivers in jeopardy down-the-line if they should ever find themselves in the courts due to their child's health problems, when confronted with child protective services, divorce, or just about any matter pertaining to that child that could be used against the parent(s).

Please read any waiver provided by your child's doctor carefully before signing. Instead, offer a formally written and signed letter that simply says that you do not wish to vaccinate your child. If you are unsure of the language in the waiver, buy some time by telling your doctor that you need to consult with a lawyer before signing it.

Know your rights - say no to vaccines. Your doctor will try to bully you - you have the right to refuse anything you feel is harmful to your child. If your doctor won't listen, go to another doctor who will.

Check your State's laws regarding exemption. Most States will allow you to avoid vaccinations if you have a religious or ethical reason. However - keep in mind that it is your right not to disclose your faith or your full reasons for not wanting to vaccinate your child.

Regarding School Admission

A signed document can and will be used as a legal document even in a public school. Unfortunately, private schools have a different set of rules not dictated by the government.

Do Vaccines Work?

Example One:

According to a report printed by The Lancet (21/9/1991), a polio outbreak began in Oman between the years of 1988 and 1989. This is significant because a polio outbreak occurred despite the children being vaccinated prior to the outbreak. Curiously, the region with the highest attack rate had the highest vaccine coverage, while the region with the lowest attack rate had the lowest vaccine coverage.

Example Two:

Sweden abandoned the whooping cough vaccine in 1979. Why? Out of 5,140 cases of whooping cough in 1978, it was found that 84 percent had been vaccinated at least three times. You may find this report in the BMJ 283:696-697, 1981.

Pay-outs

More than $1.1 billion in claims have been paid by the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program to parents of children affected by vaccines. On average, each family received nearly a million dollars each. Sadly, the claims by the parents had to fit in the programme's extremely narrow definitions in order to qualify for compensation.

Naughty CDC

The CDC Vaccine Advisory Committee and its members get money from vaccine manufacturers.

They own stock in vaccine companies and get paid to conduct research.

As of 2003, the CDC has had 28 licensing agreements with companies and at least one university for vaccines.

Vaccines once endorsed by the CDC were pulled off the market after infants (and even some adults) had serious reactions. People had to die for the CDC to admit wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0106494

Why Your Doctor May Not Care

Your doctor gets paid by the companies that supply the vaccines for each and every vaccine.

A 1993 federal "Immunization Initiative" gave States more than $400 million in vaccine incentives and a $100 bounty for each child vaccinated with the shots the federal government recommended.

You should know that according to the February 1981 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA), 90 percent of obstetricians and 66 percent of pediatricians refused to take the rubella vaccine, and in 1990 a British survey showed that over 50 percent of doctors in the UK rejected the Hepatitis B vaccine. (British Med Jnl, 27/1/90).

The article, entitled "Feuding Over Vaccines" by Boodman, Sandra G., was printed in the Washington Post on 08 November 2005 on page F1.

END

The Conservative Voice

Commentary: 20 Year-Old Whistleblower Law: A Gift that Keeps on Giving

by Senator Chuck Grassley

Iowans tell me they want Congress to pull back on the reins and stop overspending. As Iowa's senior U.S. Senator, I couldn't agree more. When holiday shoppers go overboard in December, they often pay the price after the New Year when the bills are due.

Many households trim spending to get back on track. But when lawmakers ring up annual deficits that drive up the national debt, the burden is shifted to future generations.

Congress resumed writing the federal budget in red ink to address compelling needs of the nation. The War on Terror, reconstruction of the U.S. Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina and homeland security added up to significant spending pressures. Combining those spending priorities with built-in spending obligations that fund essential government services and entitlements added up to annual shortfalls.

Some lawmakers believe raising taxes on American families will erase this funding gap. They seem to forget that revenue is only one side of the equation. Hiking taxes won't curb lawmakers' spending appetite. What's more, the tax cuts I worked to see enacted during the last five years have resulted in more money flowing into the U.S. Treasury due to increased economic activity. So when the new Congress convenes in January, I'll continue to serve as a voice for hard-working taxpayers if the new Democratic leadership takes aim at marginal tax rate increases and investment income.

As the 109th Congress draws to a close, a glimmer of good news brings a dose of good tidings for taxpayers this holiday season. The U.S. Justice Department reports a record $3.1 billion was recovered this year thanks to a legal tool I have advocated for the last two decades. This represents nearly a billion dollars more than any preceding 12-month recovery.

Back in 1986, I authored legislation that amended the Civil War-era False Claims Act. My whistleblower amendments empower private citizens to protect Uncle Sam from swindlers who fraudulently claim federal funds.

Through my legislation, whistleblowers are enlisted to help fight fraud against the federal government. Since passage of my qui tam amendments, the federal government has recouped $18 billion in settlements and judgments under the False Claim Act from those who sought to rip off U.S. taxpayers. Of the $3.1 billion recovered by the Justice Department in fiscal year 2006, whistleblowers were responsible for $1.3 billion. The remainder was recovered through suits initiated by the government.

Thanks to this tool, average citizens may shield from fraud their own hard-earned tax dollars which are used to fund federal programs, including Medicare, Medicaid, defense contract payments, disaster assistance and other benefits, agricultural subsidies, grants and loans.

Considering the remarkable success of my qui tam amendments at the federal level, I recently advanced a provision that will help put this anti-fraud tool to work at the state level. The provision creates an incentive for states to encourage whistleblowers to step forward with information that may help recover tax dollars lost to fraud.

The U.S. Justice Department refers to the False Claims Act as the federal government's primary weapon to fight fraud against the government.

My qui tam amendments allow private citizens to file suit on behalf of the United States against those who falsely or fraudulently claim federal payments. Individuals who knowingly submit false claims are liable for three times the government's loss plus civil penalties.

Recoveries in health care fraud, primarily in the vast Medicare and Medicaid programs, last year overwhelmingly led the way, accounting for 72 percent of the restored funds. Defense procurement fraud accounted for 20 percent of the $3.1 billion recovered under the False Claims Act.

It's regrettable the federal government is seen as a cash cow to be bilked by wrongdoers. Just as President Abraham Lincoln took aim at war profiteers during the Civil War by signing the False Claims Act into law, I'll continue to serve as a watchdog on Capitol Hill to ensure this tremendously adept tool remains available and relevant to assist in the fight against fraud in the 21st century.

END

DOJ_NMG_0106496

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.15010-000001

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.15010-000002

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.15010-000003

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, December 15, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, December 15, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061215.pdf; agnb061215.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Warns Blind Sheik's Death Could Prompt Terror Attacks...3
US Bioterror Threat Seen As Real, Increasing....4
LATimes Criticizes Lawmakers For Selective Criticism Of Dubai Ports Company....4

Homeland Response:

Pelosi Calls For New Panel To Probe Intelligence Budget....4
Pelosi Says Democrats Will Propose 100 Percent Screening Of Cargo....5
Chertoff Backs Wiretapping Program....5
Chertoff Defends Real ID....5
DHS To Announce Rail Security Proposal....6
DHS Said To Be Suspending Plans For Exit-Monitoring System....6
Industry Associations Oppose DHS Traveler Assessment System....7
NYTimes, WPost Criticize Administration For ACLU Subpoena....7
DC Area Said To Be Unprepared For Disaster....7

War News:

Bush's Iraq Strategy Expected To Include Boost In Troop Levels....7
Schoomaker Says Wars Putting Dangerous Strain On Army....10
Rice Rejects Idea Of Talks With Iran, Syria....11
Odierno Takes Charge Of US Troops In Baghdad....12
Caldwell Says US Making Progress In Training Iraqi Army....13
White House Defends Release Of Enemy Body Count....13
First Lady Criticizes Media Coverage Of Iraq....13
US Troops In Iraq, Afghanistan To Get Flame-Resistant Uniforms....13
Ethnic, Sectarian Divisions Are Barrier To Critical Oil Law Provision....13
Baghdad Kidnappings Said To Reflect Growing Lawlessness....14
Saddam's Capture Failed To Be Turning Point....14
Accused Iraqi Expatriate Feels Deserted By US....14
Female Muslim Translator Profiled For Her Service In US Military....15
Suicide Bomber Attacks Shopping Area Of Afghan Town....15
Negroponte Says Pakistan Must Deal With Tribal Leaders....15
Arlington Wreath Laying Effort Attracts Wide Following....15
Bush Error At Press Conference Noted....16

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Travel Time Legislation Sent To Bush....16
US Attorney McKay To Resign....16

Corporate Scandals:

Sycamore Networks Says It Has Not Fully Complied With DOJ, SEC Subpoenas....16
Dell Delays Filing Of Quarterly Report....16
SEC Probes Coherent's Options Practices....16
Apollo Group Says Ex-Officers Backdated....16
SEC Loosens Interpretation Of Sarbanes-Oxley Auditing Requirements....17
Wall Street Executives Reap Big Paychecks....17

Criminal Law:

DOJ Launches Criminal Probe Of Federal Oil, Gas Royalties Collection....17
Duke Lacrosse Defense Team Says Accuser Misidentified Accused....18
Judge Sets April Trial Date For Jeffs....18
Los Angeles Skid Row Fertile Ground For Fraud....18
Business Software Alliance Pirated Software "Bounty Program" To Expire....18
Chinese-Canadian Engineer Charged With Stealing Military Trade Secrets....19
Stora Enso Denies Price-Fixing Charges....19

Civil Rights:

DOJ Says Dallas County Jail Violates Inmates' Rights....20

Report Says Los Angeles County Hate Crimes On The Rise. 20
New Jersey Legislature Approves Civil Unions Bill 20
Number Of Death Sentences Falls 20

Antitrust:

DOJ Rebuts Reback On Telecom Mergers..... 21
Airline Merger Talk May Be Mostly Hype..... 21
Antitrust Waiting Period Expires On Merck-Sirna Deal..... 22
US, European Firms To Buy Stake In German Broadcaster.. 22
Hearst Expects To Complete Newspaper Acquisition Today 22
Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard 22
Bond Market Antitrust Probe Could Spawn More Suits 22
Samsung, LCD Makers Could Face Massive Antitrust Penalties 22
Japan Returns To International Acquisitions Scene..... 22

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Interior Department Approves Mohawk Casino Project..... 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Arrests College Student Over Pipe Bombs..... 23
FBI Honors Philly Labor Leader With Director's Community Leadership Award 23
Boston Columnist Calls FBI Fighting Of Civil Suit "A Disgrace." 23
Two Ecoterror Suspects Plead Guilty To Vail ELF Arson 24
FBI, Police Departments Improve Training On Islamic Culture 24
FBI Investigating Alleged Improper Work By Murphy Staff Members..... 24
FBI Searching For Fugitive Texas Official Wanted On Child Rape Charges..... 24
Florida FCI Guards Sentenced To Probation, Prison For Sex-With-Prisoners Scheme..... 24
Philadelphia Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life For Murdering Witness 25
FBI Detains Disruptive Continental Flight Passenger In Texas..... 25
US Agents' Business Cards Found Taped To Body In Mexico..... 25
US Attorney Says Cyclist's Indictment In BALCO Investigation Marks New Phase 26
In Wisconsin, 33 Charged In Cocaine-Ring Investigation..... 26
Seventeen Arrested In New York Drug Sweep..... 27
Five Pennsylvanians Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Heroin 27
DEA Says Texas Drug Ring Smuggled Proceeds In Detergent Containers 27
Five Canadians Face Charges For Roles In Drug-Smuggling Scheme 27
Marijuana Bust In New Hampshire Called Largest In State's History..... 27
Man Accused Of Transporting Tons Of Marijuana Captured In Arizona 28
DEA Agent Says California Dispensary Sells Marijuana For Nonmedical Use..... 28
Michigan Doctor Released On Bond In Painkiller Case 28
Mexican Embassy Identifies Man Killed At Hospital As Drug Cartel Member 28

Immigration:

Minneapolis Spot Known For Fake IDs Open In Spite Of Raids 28
Report About Illegals' Effect On Texas Economy Prompts Debate 29
Congress To Take Another Look At Border Fence Legislation..... 29

Tax:

Congress-Administration:

Johnson Responsive After Brain Surgery..... 29
Bipartisan House Task Force To Consider Independent Ethics Enforcer..... 31
Pelosi Says GOP To Get Only One Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills 32
Republicans Failed To Enact Environmental Priorities In 109th Congress..... 32
Fitzgerald Doesn't Disclose If Cheney Is On Witness List For Libby Trial 32
Healthcare Bill Included Special Provisions Sought By Congressional Leaders 33
Black Caucus Urges Democratic Leaders To Hire More Minorities..... 33
Chertoff Says FEMA's Post-Katrina Reform Not Done 33
Dow Reaches New Record High 33
OPEC Plans To Reduce Output Starting In February..... 34
Large Majorities Support Stricter Fuel-Efficiency Requirements..... 34
Trade Agency Clears Way For Some Steel Import Tariffs To End 34
Obama Not Interested In Being "Un-Hillary" Candidate..... 35
Commission Calls For Major Changes To US Education System 35
DARPA's Neuroscience Research Seen As Cause For Concern..... 36

DOJ_NMG_0106502

Other News:

Local Elections Test Of Support For Ahmadinejad 36
Israel Bars Haniya From Entering Gaza With Cash 37
Israeli Court Sanctions Targeted Killings 37
Lebanon's Shiites Question Hezbollah's Control 37
Survey Shows "Sharp" Decline In US Standing In Mideast 38
Propaganda Puts Pyongyang's Commitment To Talks In Question 38
Rice Announces $1 Million Fund To Assist Human Rights Activists 38
Pentagon Seeks Creation Of New African Command 39
Egypt Arrests Opposition Leader After University Protest 39
Britain Abandons BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe 39
King Abdullah's Son Rumored To Be Next Saudi Ambassador 39
Bush Holds Malaria Summit 39
US, Chinese Officials At Odds Over Yuan 40
Ban Ki-moon Pledges Stronger Ties With US As New UN Chief 40
Negroponte Says Castro Near Death 40
Lugovoi Denies Role In Poison Plot 41
Columnist Calls Chavez Victory An "Assault" On Democracy 41
Proliferation Expert Criticizes US Nuclear Policy 41
WPost Welcomes Calderon's Early Actions As President 41
Congress Urged To Grant Treaty Approval By Two-Thirds Majority 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 42

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 42

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Warns Blind Sheik's Death Could Prompt Terror Attacks. CNN's Newsroom (12/14, Phillips) reported, "We begin this hour with the developing story. The FBI has sent out a bulletin warning that the expected death of an al Qaeda spiritual leader could lead to terror attacks against the United States. … The bulletin reminds agencies that" the so-called Blind Sheik, Omar Abdel-Rahman, "has called for attacks if he dies in prison. The bulletin includes what it says was his last will and testament, distributed at an al Qaeda press conference in 1998. Part of it read, 'My brothers, if they kill me – which they will certainly do – hold my funeral and send my corpse to my family. But do not let my blood be shed in vain. Rather, extract the most violent revenge.' Law enforcement sources stress that the bulletin is just meant to make all those in law enforcement aware of the possible threat, and there is no intelligence to suggest there are any attacks being planned. We'll have more on this developing story throughout the afternoon."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Jordan) also notes, "There is no credible indication that an attack on the U.S. is imminent, said several law enforcement officials," and reports that in the bulletin, "the FBI reported to federal intelligence officials that Abdel-Rahman had been rushed from prison to a Missouri hospital two days earlier for a blood transfusion. There, doctors discovered a tumor on his liver, according to the bulletin, which was described to The Associated Press by a law enforcement official. But U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Tracy Billingsley said Abdel-Rahman's condition had stabilized, and he has since been moved back to prison." Newsday (12/15, Eisenberg) notes, "New York City Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said yesterday that the FBI had shared its assessment with his department, 'and we'll take appropriate precautions as, you know, as our intelligence indicates.'" House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King "said that it was the FBI's job to advise of developments, but 'I don't think we should be overly concerned.'"

The New York Daily News (12/15, Meek, 729K) reports Abdel-Rahman "was rushed from a federal prison hospital in Springfield, Mo., to an emergency room after he started 'throwing up blood,' according to an FBI intelligence bulletin obtained by the Daily News. While under examination…to stop bleeding in his esophagus, doctors 'discovered a small tumor on his liver,' the FBI said. Abdel-Rahman is now stable and 'is not at death's door,' a U.S. official lamented. 'The guy is sick; he's falling apart,' the official added." USA Today (12/15, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports on the bulletin, under the headline "Sheik's Declining Health Puts FBI On Alert," and the New York Times (12/14, Johnston, 1.16M) briefly reports on the alert, but does not mention the FBI. CNN's The Situation Room (12/14, Blitzer) and Fox News' Special Report with Brit Hume (12/14) also reported on the FBI bulletin, as do CNN.com (12/14, Arena), FoxNews.com (12/14, Bonisteel) and ABC News' The Blotter (12/14, Esposito, 11:31 a.m.).

DOJ_NMG_0106503

FBI, DHS See No Credible Threats During Holiday Season. ABC News' The Blotter (12/14, Esposito, 4:03 p.m.) reported, "As the height of the holiday season approaches, the FBI and Department of Homeland Security say there are no known credible terrorist attacks in the making inside the United States, but crowded stores and New Year's celebrations remain attractive targets. This was a key finding of a 'Holiday Season Security Awareness' bulletin circulated Wednesday and obtained by ABCNews.com." ABC noted, "The report cited the Dec. 6 FBI arrest of Derrick Shareef on charges of plotting to detonate hand grenades at an Illinois shopping mall during the holiday season as a reminder of the potential threat."

US Bioterror Threat Seen As Real, Increasing. Under the headline "Behind This Very Real Threat," Newsday (12/15, Eisenberg) reports, "While the U.S. food supply is among the world's safest, experts say it is vulnerable to deliberate, as well as accidental, contamination -- a reality brought home by the deaths of three people and the sickening of hundreds as a result of tainted spinach, tomatoes and a still-unidentified food source at Taco Bell. The country's exposure to deliberate sabotage is increasing, moreover, as a result of the centralization of the food supply, growing foreign imports and the system's oversight by a 'fragmented and problem-laden' national safety system, in the words of a 2003 report by the Government Accounting Office. 'The threat from agroterrorism may not be widely recognized, but the threat is real and the impact could be devastating,' said FBI Deputy Director John Pistole, speaking at a recent summit of law enforcement and agriculture officials. Noting that documents about U.S. agriculture, which had been translated into Arabic, were discovered in Afghan caves, Pistole said that, while the FBI had no specific intelligence regarding attacks, 'the absence of a communicated threat does not prove the absence of a threat.'" However, Newsday notes, although "national response plans to agroterrorism have been prepared by agencies" since 9/11, "many say that recent contamination episodes are proof that such plans are inadequate."

LATimes Criticizes Lawmakers For Selective Criticism Of Dubai Ports Company. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, 850K) says in an editorial, "Six members of Congress traveled to the Dominican Republic on Sunday for a look at the future of U.S. port security. At Puerto Caucedo, east of Santo Domingo, they examined an X-ray scanning system for cargo containers. The port performing this cutting-edge work is operated by Dubai Ports World." That is "the same company that Congress thinks can't be trusted to run U.S. ports. Earlier this year, Dubai Ports World bought a British firm that operated several ports and cargo terminals in the U.S." On Sunday, "insurance giant American International Group agreed to buy the port operations. The lawmakers who spearheaded the xenophobic attacks on Dubai Ports World have since made a lot of self-congratulatory noises, but they have yet to explain why the Dubai company can be trusted to oversee foreign ports where cargo is screened before it's shipped to the U.S., but not ports in the U.S. itself."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pelosi Calls For New Panel To Probe Intelligence Budget. USA Today (12/15, 4A, 2.27M) reports, "House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi called Thursday for creation of a congressional panel that would oversee the administration's intelligence budget." Pelosi "said the proposed intelligence oversight panel would be made up of lawmakers from the Appropriations Committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence, and would work within the Appropriations Committee. Such a panel, Pelosi said, 'makes oversight stronger and makes the American people safer.'"

The New York Times (12/15, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Advocates of the approach say it should provide some 'cross-pollination' that will lead to lawmakers' gaining more expertise and depth of knowledge about intelligence activities, giving them a greater ability to monitor operations and suggest changes." Rep. John A. Boehner, the GOP leader, "was noncommittal about the intelligence plan. He said he would 'take a look at her proposal and confer with my colleagues about it.'"

The AP (12/15, Shrader) reports that "through a series of hearings," the new committee "would examine the president's intelligence budget, prepare the classified details to the annual defense spending bill and conduct oversight of the use of appropriated funds by intelligence agencies." The AP also reports, "Pelosi's proposal does not follow the exact recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. But it moves closer to the overhaul recommended two years ago when the commission found weaknesses in how Congress monitors the 16 intelligence agencies. A Democratic member of the Sept. 11 commission -- former Rep. Timothy Roemer of Indiana -- said the change would achieve the commission's two major goals: forcing spy agencies to disclose more to Congress, which they often have ignored, and linking the expanded oversight to the power of the purse."

DOJ_NMG_0106504

The Washington Times (12/15, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that Pelosi, "who has served on both the intelligence and appropriations panels, has long advocated transparency in intelligence agencies." A "Republican appropriations aide, however, said the intelligence budgets must remain secret to prevent enemies from becoming aware of US spy programs. A transparent budget could signal to enemies, for example, large procurements such as satellite systems. The aide said 'one or two' appropriations staffers now have 'need-to-know' access."

The Washington Post (12/15, A8, Weisman, 690K) reports "appropriators, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally and the incoming chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, strongly objected to any efforts to strip them of jurisdiction over the intelligence budget. Democratic sources on the Appropriations, intelligence and Armed Services committees said last month that Pelosi was leaning toward establishing a panel to examine options for reorganizing the House along the lines suggested by the Sept. 11 commission." But "news reports on the issue emboldened commissioners and families of Sept. 11 victims to renew their push for stronger congressional oversight on intelligence. So Pelosi found a middle ground: Members of her intelligence oversight panel would come from both the intelligence and Appropriations committees, and would have the tasks of overseeing the intelligence agencies and drafting their budgets."

Pelosi Says Democrats Will Propose 100 Percent Screening Of Cargo. In an article focusing on Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi's recommendation Thursday for the creation of a new House panel to oversee US spy agencies, the AP (12/14, Shrader) reported that such a move would be "a step toward adopting all the proposals of the anti-terror Sept. 11 commission." Referring to Republican efforts to adopt the commission's recommendations, Pelosi said Democrats would "go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach US shores." The AP added, "Less than 10 percent of cargo containers arriving at seaports are physically inspected." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday that his agency expects "to have virtually all containers coming into the US screened through radiation portal monitors" by the end of next year.

Chertoff Backs Wiretapping Program. Fox News Live (12/14, 2:36 pm, Herridge) reported that DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "responded to statements made by the incoming head of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick Leahy, that the administration's war on terror, specifically warantless wiretapping program, has gone too far." Chertoff "told Fox that he welcomes a debate with the senator and others on the hill because the American people must understand the value of this tool." Chertoff was shown saying, "Are we going to use all of the weapons that we have against an enemy, which is implacable, which as recently as August was targeting us for a very serious kind of plot? Or are we going to put those weapons away and then the American public is going to live with a significantly increased risk of a terrorism attack, which could result in the deaths of thousands of people."

Fox Special Report (12/15, story 8, 0:50, Hume) reported Chertoff "responded today with a certain amount of impatience to yesterdays assertions by incoming Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Patrick Leahy that the panel would exercise greater oversight of the Bush Administration's anti-terrorist programs, including electronic surveillance, conducted sometimes without warrants. Chertoff told Fox's Catherine Herridge there is a price to be paid if that tool is taken off the table."

Chertoff Defends Real ID. CNET News.com (12/14, Broache) reported DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "defended forthcoming national ID cards" that will be required under the Real ID Act, saying they were "vital for security and consistent with privacy rights." Chertoff called the cards "an example (of) when security and privacy go hand in hand. It is a win-win for both." Chertoff cited an immigration raid Tuesday in which ICE agents "made more than 1,200 arrests related to immigration violations and unmasked criminal organizations stealing and trafficking in genuine birth certificates and Social Security cards belonging to US citizens. 'Do you think your privacy is better protected if someone can walk around with phony docs with your name and your Social Security number, or is your privacy better protected if you have the confidence that the identification relied upon is in fact reliable and uniquely tied to a single individual?' Chertoff asked rhetorically." CNET added that Chertoff "was likely trying to quell rampant skepticism about the IDs voiced by some privacy advocates, immigrants and other groups. Some have said they fear that the IDs are a stepping stone to a veritable police state, complete with ready surveillance of individuals."

DOJ_NMG_0106505

DHS To Announce Rail Security Proposal. The AP (12/14, Miller) reported a rail security proposal to be announced Friday by the Department of Homeland Security "would require railroads to inspect rail cars and keep them in secure areas when not in use." The plan "falls short of the more stringent measures proposed by Democratic lawmakers who are set to take control of Congress next month." Rep. Bennie Thompson said he was "not convinced that all of the security gaps plaguing our current hazmat transport system will be filled by this proposal." DHS's "proposal would give the Transportation Security Administration authority to inspect railroads, rail yards and mass transit rail systems, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press from a person involved in the rulemaking process." The proposal "does not match what at least nine cities have proposed — rerouting around densely populated areas trains that are carrying hazardous material."

The New York Times (12/15, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "The proposal would…clarify how government workers inspect tank cars and railyards for compliance, establish rules on the chain of custody and handoff of dangerous cargoes and set communications requirements. … An official of the Homeland Security Department provided details of the plan on the condition that he not be identified further, because it has not been published." The Times does not mention the Democratic lawmakers' rail security proposals.

DHS Said To Be Suspending Plans For Exit-Monitoring System. Describing the news as "a major blow to the Bush administration's efforts to secure borders," the New York Times (12/15, Swarns, Lipton, 1.16M) reports "domestic security officials have for now given up" on the exit portion of the US Visit program, with DHS officials conceding "in recent days…that they lack the financing and technology to meet their deadline to have exit-monitoring systems at the 50 busiest land border crossings by next December." The assessment "sent alarms to Congress, where some Republicans and Democrats warned that suspending the monitoring plan would leave the United States vulnerable." The Times adds that DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and other officials often call US Visit "a singular achievement in making the country safer. US Visit fingerprints and photographs 2 percent of the people entering the country, because Americans and most Canadians and Mexicans are exempt." However, "Efforts to determine whether visitors actually leave have faltered."

The Washington Post (12/15, A5, Hsu, 690K) reports spokesman Jarrod Agen said DHS "is looking at strategies for US-VISIT exit that are the most cost effective, and we are examining strategies for implementation at air and sea ports. We are also looking at land ports. However, there are costs associated, including the physical infrastructure as well as the economic impact, and we are in the process of evaluating all that data now.' Several homeland security officials said a final decision has yet to be made, but that, given the limited time and resources, the department intends to focus on expanding US-VISIT at airports, where the majority of visa holders exit the country."

GAO Says US Visit Entry System Aids Border Patrol, Recommends Improved Management Controls. Meanwhile, the AP (12/14) reported that a Government Accountability Office report issued Thursday found US Visit's entry system "has aided border patrol agents, but computer snafus and management shortfalls need to be resolved." GAO "investigators visited 21 border crossings and officials at every one said the US Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, which uses two fingerprints and a digital photograph to identify people, had improved their ability to process visitors and verify identities, according to the…report. … But US Customs and Border Protection officials at 12 of the 21 sites said 'computer slowdowns and freezes' hindered visitor processing and inspection times. At nine of those 12, 'computer processing problems were not always reported to CBP's computer help desk, as required by CBP guidelines,' according to the report." The report "recommended that DHS improve existing management controls for the system and develop performance measures to assess its impact at border crossings. The government watchdog agency also said DHS should describe how it will move to a biometric entry/exit capability and align US-VISIT with other border security systems being developed. In a written response, DHS officials said the computer problems are resolved, a preliminary monitoring system was established, and a working group was set up to determine how to provide detailed monitoring of all applications."

DOJ_NMG_0106506

Industry Associations Oppose DHS Traveler Assessment System. The AP (12/14, Sniffen) reported eight major US, Canadian and European travel industry associations wrote DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff Wednesday to express their concern that the government's "far-reaching and invasive" system for assessing international travelers as potential terrorists "could do significant personal harm to them, and reduce the productivity of the organizations that field business travelers." However, Chertoff defended the program Thursday "as a legal effort 'to make sure that we don't inconvenience the rights of most travelers so that we can focus more sensibly and in a more risk-managed fashion on those people that do potentially pose a threat.'" The AP added that the travel associations "join some members of Congress and privacy advocates in criticizing the system."

NYTimes, WPost Criticize Administration For ACLU Subpoena. The New York Times (12/15, 1.16M) editorials, "The Bush administration is trampling on the First Amendment and well-established criminal law by trying to use a subpoena to force the American Civil Liberties Union to hand over a classified document in its possession. The dispute is shrouded in secrecy, and very little has been made public about the document, but we do not need to know what's in it to know what's at stake: if the government prevails, it will have engaged in prior restraint — almost always a serious infringement on free speech — and it could start using subpoenas to block reporting on matters of vital public concern."

The Washington Post (12/15, A34, 690K) says in an editorial, "In the latest manifestation of its disregard for First Amendment principles, the administration has used -- misused, to be more precise -- a grand jury subpoena to retrieve 'any and all copies' of a document, marked 'secret,' obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU's request that a federal judge quash the subpoena should be granted."

DC Area Said To Be Unprepared For Disaster. The Washington Post (12/15, A34, 690K) says in an editorial, "How well is the" Washington DC region "prepared to cope with thousands of casualties and prevent the spread of lethal contagions? Not very, according to a report from the Trust for America's Health, a private watchdog group that rated every state and the District on readiness to respond to a public health crisis." The report "ranked the District and Maryland near the bottom. Maryland, for example, would suffer a chronic shortage of hospital beds in the event of even a moderate pandemic. The District lags in demonstrating that it has the organization to quickly distribute medicine and equipment to communities throughout the city during a health emergency. In all, Maryland satisfied only four of 10 measurements of preparedness, and the District met only five."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's Iraq Strategy Expected To Include Boost In Troop Levels. McClatchy (12/15, Strobel, Landay) reports, "President Bush is weighing whether to make a deeper American commitment in Iraq despite growing public unhappiness with the war, according to senior US officials and former officials familiar with Bush's high-level review. The proposed changes, with a few exceptions, conflict with the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which warned earlier this month against an open-ended commitment to Iraq and said American combat brigades could be out of Iraq by early 2008." While" some key decisions haven't been made yet, the senior officials said the emerging strategy" includes: "A shift in the primary US military mission in Iraq from combat to training an expanded Iraqi army, generally in line with the Iraq Study Group's recommendations. A possible short-term surge of as many as 40,000 more American troops to try to secure Baghdad, along with a permanent increase in the size of the US Army and the Marine Corps, which are badly strained by deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan." The strategy would also include "a revised Iraq political strategy aimed at forging a 'moderate center' of Shiite Muslim, Sunni Muslim Arab and Kurdish politicians, increased reconstruction funds and the rejection of "urgent, broad new diplomatic initiative in the Middle East to address the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and reach out to Iran and Syria," which had been suggested by the Baker commission.

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A4, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) says Bush is "leaning toward temporarily sending as many as 20,000 additional US troops to Iraq, even as the Democrats taking charge of Congress demand a drawdown of forces." The "emerging plan is facing opposition from Iraqi officials adamant that more US forces aren't the answer." Also, "US military commanders in Baghdad have drawn up plans for the country that don't require any new personnel." The Journal adds, "Although White House officials stress that no final decisions have been made, several aides involved in the internal deliberations say…Bush and senior administration officials appear receptive to calls to temporarily send 15,000 to 30,000 new US forces to Iraq to bolster the 140,000 troops there."

DOJ_NMG_0106507

Sen. John McCain, visiting Baghdad, said US commanders are discussing adding as many as 35,000 troops. The New York Times (12/15, Burns, 1.16M) reports McCain "said Thursday that American military commanders were discussing the possibility of adding as many as 10 more combat brigades -- a maximum of about 35,000 troops -- to 'bring the situation under control' while Iraq's divided political leaders seek solutions to the worsening bloodshed here." After "talks in Baghdad with Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and other top American generals," McCain "said a substantial United States troop increase was one of the strategy changes the generals were considering as they reviewed what he called 'a steadily deteriorating situation.'" He "said meetings with Iraqi government leaders showed that they, too, 'have certainly not ruled out the option of more troops.'"

The AP (12/15, Wagner) reports McCain said that "he realizes that few Americans favor deploying more US troops to Iraq, and that if such a move proved unsuccessful in the unpopular war it could hurt his presidential ambitions." But McCain "said Americans must realize that if US troops leave Iraq in chaos, groups such as al-Qaida 'will follow us home and that we will have a large conflict and greater challenges than those that we now face here in Iraq.'" Other senators, also in Iraq, appeared to concur. Sen. Joseph Lieberman said, "I feel strongly that more troops are required here." Sen. Lindsey Graham remarked, "I think it is most important to send more troops quickly. People are getting murdered and kidnapped. We need an overwhelming troop presence."

Meanwhile, USA Today (12/15, Jackson, 2.27M) reports the President "will be spending part of his holidays in 'continuous consultations' as he makes final decisions on a new Iraq war plan to be unveiled in the new year." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Thursday that Bush will seek more information from a variety of sources, including members of the Iraqi government, Pentagon and the National Security Council, which is coordinating the administration's review of its war policy."

Rumsfeld Says Troop Levels Have Always Been In Line With Commanders' Requests. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said on Fox News (12/14, Hume), "The people who decide the levels of forces on the ground are not the Secretary of Defense or the President. We hear the recommendations, but the recommendations were made by the combatant commanders and by the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. And there hasn't been a minute in the last six years when we have not had the number of troops that the combatant commanders have requested."

Asked, also on Fox News (12/14, Hume), what his "greatest regret" of his tenure is, Rumsfeld said, "I guess that one would have hoped that Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts would have been concluded more rapidly. I think that's probably unrealistic. … It's taken longer than people had anticipated. It's more difficult. And we're in that unusual situation where the Department of Defense is looked at for the situations in those countries when the reality is that we can't lose a single military battle in either country at all. Not possible."

White House Pressing Iraqis To Reduce Sadr's Power. USA Today (12/15, 13A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "The Bush administration is pressing Iraqi politicians to form a new Cabinet to reduce the power of Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American cleric whose militia is responsible for much of the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a moderate Sunni, said Thursday that President Bush told him the administration wants Iraqi politicians to form a coalition of 'moderate parties.' al-Hashimi met with Bush on Tuesday. Iraq's governing coalition includes mostly Shiite political parties and has six Cabinet ministers from al-Sadr's faction. A new coalition would reduce or eliminate al-Sadr loyalists and replace them with other Shiites, Kurds and moderate Sunni Arabs, al-Hashimi said." White House spokesman Gordon Johndroe "said the administration was not telling Iraqis what to do but the 'object of the moderate Iraqi leaders coming together is to stop the violence and create an Iraq that can govern, sustain and defend itself.' Asked whether that meant removing al-Sadr's faction from government, Johndroe said the Iraqis Bush had consulted are 'serious about taking action against those who would operate outside the rule of law.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Richter, 850K) reports that Hashimi, "who leads the Iraqi parliament's most important Sunni Arab group, said that Bush and other senior officials told him at a White House meeting this week that they believe 'for the present time, the only solution we have' is to create a new ruling alliance in hopes of strengthening a frail central government. Hashimi's comments, in an appearance at the U.S. Institute of Peace, offered new insight into the importance Bush is placing on the coalition-building effort at a time when the president and top aides are considering new strategies for Iraq. U.S. and Iraqi advocates of the approach hope it would give Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki a new freedom to take risky actions, such as trying to suppress militia violence. Maliki's freedom to act is believed to be limited by his dependence on radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Al Mahdi army is blamed for sectarian attacks. Creation of a new governing coalition also could provide a means for picking a new prime minister if Iraqi and American leaders decide Maliki must be replaced."

DOJ_NMG_0106508

Hashimi Expresses "Reservations" About Maliki's Performance. Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi was asked on PBS' NewsHour (12/14, Suarez) if he thinks Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "is doing a good job and doing a good enough job to remain in his post for the future." Hashimi said, "I do have reservations about his performances so far. And we were very frank with him in tackling various issues that are still pending. … Many, many decisions taken on the ground of non-consultation with us."

Kissinger Says "Outcome" In Iraq Not Dependent On Troop Levels. Ex-Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/14, Blitzer), "There's no sense adding more troops to the existing strategy. So it would have to be linked to whatever new the President presents. But I think it is a mistake to tie, in our thinking, the outcome in Iraq to the troop levels. The outcome in Iraq will have to depend on the degree to which we can create incentives for a political negotiation between the parties and political incentives to the outside countries to let the country develop with responsible stability."

Krauthammer Says ISG "Farce" Presents Bush With Opportunity. In his column in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "As a result of the Iraq Study Group…Bush has been given one last chance to alter course on Iraq. This did not, however, come about the way James Baker intended. It came about because the long-anticipated report turned out to be, as is widely agreed, a farce." Krauthammer says "the report has fallen so flat that the field is now clear for the president to recommend to a war-weary country something new and bold." Bush "must do two things. First, as I've been agitating for, establish a new governing coalition in Baghdad that excludes Moqtada al-Sadr, a cancer that undermines the ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government to work with us. It is encouraging that Bush has already begun such a maneuver by meeting with rival Shiite and Sunni parliamentary leaders. If we help produce a cross-sectarian government that would be an ally rather than a paralyzed semi-adversary of coalition forces, we should then undertake part two: 'Double down' our military effort. This means a surge in American troops with a specific mission: to secure Baghdad and (with the support of the Baghdad government -- a sine qua non) suppress Sadr's Mahdi Army. It is our last chance for success. Bush can thank the Iraq Study Group and its instant irrelevance for making it possible."

WSJournal Notes Iraqi Criticism Of ISG. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (12/15, A20, 2.04M) relates that while the ISG report has faced "withering criticism here in the U.S," "the more revealing reaction has been from Iraq itself: 'Unrealistic,' 'inappropriate' and 'very dangerous' are among the kinder words used by Iraq's leaders to describe the ISG's work." Iraq President Jalal Talabani "reacted strongly to the ISG's suggestion that American support for his democratically elected government be conditioned on its meeting U.S.-determined 'milestones' toward that goal. That, he said, was an 'insult to the people of Iraq.'" The Journal says the "Iraqi criticism…underscores that the ISG report was less about winning in Baghdad than about splitting political differences in Washington. As Mr. Bush re-examines Iraq policy with an eye toward announcing significant changes early next year, we trust he understands better than the ISG that a partnership with the Iraqi government is essential to any successful outcome."

Bush Said To See Parallels Between His Presidency And Truman's. The Washington Post (12/15, A3, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "He led the United States into war and saw his popularity plummet, yet some 60 years later his reputation has never been higher: It's small wonder Harry S. Truman seems to hold a special fascination for…Bush these days. That interest came into focus recently after Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) went public with an account of a meeting last Friday in which he said the president seemed to be comparing his situation to that of Truman in the late 1940s." According to" Durbin's account and another source familiar with the meeting, Bush told the gathering of congressional leaders that Truman's approach to dealing with the Cold War was not initially popular but that he was vindicated by history -- the implication being that Bush would be vindicated about Iraq as well." The Post adds, "White House aides later disputed this reading of Bush's comments, but the episode may offer a glimpse into the psychology of a president who, like Truman in his second term, seems beset by trouble and pressures on all sides and who is ready to look to history for some comfort and guidance. … By many accounts, Bush is fascinated by history and biography -- he reads extensively and meets periodically with presidential scholars -- and Truman has certainly seemed to be on his mind in recent months."

DOJ_NMG_0106509

Schoomaker Says Wars Putting Dangerous Strain On Army. The New York Times (12/15, Shanker, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "The review of Iraq policy by senior commanders appears to be headed toward a recommendation to increase the size of the American military, both to sustain a long-term commitment in Iraq and to leave the United States better positioned to deal with potential adversaries, in particular Iran and North Korea, Pentagon and military officials said Thursday." The "latest indication came when the Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, called for expanding the force by adding more active-duty troops and by making more use of the National Guard and Reserve." The Times adds, "Officials who took part in the session or who were briefed on it would not give specific figures that were being discussed for growth goals. But their descriptions revealed a broad conclusion that has received increasing support in Washington: that regardless of the exact shape of President Bush's new strategy on Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by their commitments around the globe, in particular in Iraq." That conclusion "is being punctuated by the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who officially leaves his post on Friday and who was long the champion of the idea that high technology and better intelligence could substitute for a bigger military."

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 7, 2:05, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Schoomaker wants more frequent call-ups of the Guard and Reserve, but Defense Secretary Rumsfeld has steadfastly refused, arguing the army needs to make better use of the troops it already has. With Rumsfeld on his way out, Schoomaker broke ranks and went public." Schoomaker was shown saying, "I have been recommending this all along." But NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 4, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said "Guard and Reserve advocates argue increased deployments would put increased stress on those forces. Unlike active duty, Reserve troops are not full-time soldiers and most have full-time jobs." Major General Martin Umbarger, of the National Guard, was shown saying, "Wherever those teams are, it would be pretty tough on the soldiers' families and the employers." Miklaszewski: "Army officials say tonight in the short-term, they'll create two additional brigade combat teams out of the active duty forces they already have. But in the long-term, that's not nearly enough."

ABC World News (12/14, story 5, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was a startling admission from the Army's top general today. There's been a lot of talk in Congress, and by outside experts that operations in Iraq and Afghanistan are putting a dangerous strain on the army. Today, for the first time, the Army's Chief of Staff…said the same thing." ABC (Karl) added, "The Army is stretched so thin, it could break. That was the blunt warning from the Army Chief of Staff." Schoomaker: "This is like building an airplane while it's flying. And while you're building it, people are ripping pieces off the wings." Schoomaker "did not say how much bigger the Army needs to be. There are currently 512,000 active-duty soldiers. Recruiters could only add about another 6,000 or 7,000 a year. And growing the Army is costly. $1.2 billion for troops added. The strain on the Army and the Marine Corps makes sending more troops to Iraq a tough sell here at the Pentagon. Today, he told reporters, more troops should not be sent unless there's a purpose. And that purpose should be measurable."

The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Tyson, 690K) says Schoomaker's "highly public appeal for more troops and reserve call-ups appeared to be part of an Army campaign to lobby incoming Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who is to be sworn in Monday, to approve the desired policy changes as well as a significant increase in the Army budget." Democrats "said yesterday that they plan to hold hearings on the 'urgent' and 'critical' readiness problems of the Army and Marine Corps."

The AP (12/15, Baldor) reports that though Schoomaker "didn't give an exact number, he said it would take significant time and commitment by the nation, noting some 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers could be added per year." Officials also "need greater authority to tap into the National Guard and Reserve, long ago set up as a strategic reserve but now needed as an integral part of the nation's deployed forces, Schoomaker told a commission studying possible changes in those two forces." The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Barnes, 850K) runs a similar story under the headline "Army Is Stretched Too Thin." McClatchy (12/15, Brown), meanwhile, notes Schoomaker's "recommendations were first reported on Tuesday by McClatchy Newspapers."

DOJ_NMG_0106510

Rice Rejects Idea Of Talks With Iran, Syria.

The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Kessler, Wright, 690K) reports on its front page Secretary Rice yesterday "rejected" the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the United States seek the help of Syria and Iran in Iraq, "saying the 'compensation' required by any deal might be too high." She also "argued that neither country should need incentives to foster stability in Iraq." In an interview with the Post, Rice said, "If they have an interest in a stable Iraq, they will do it anyway," noting that she "did not want to trade away Lebanese sovereignty to Syria or allow Iran to obtain a nuclear weapon as a price for peace in Iraq." Rice also said there would be "no retreat" from the administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East, a goal that was "deemphasized" by panel in its report last week but that Rice insisted was a "matter of strategic interest." She also "reiterated her commitment to pursuing peace between Palestinians and Israelis." The Post says Rice's remarks "indicated that, despite a maelstrom of criticism of Bush's policies by outside experts and Democrats, the administration's extensive review of policy in Iraq and the region will not yield major changes in its approach." Rice said that Bush could be "quite expansive" in terms of a policy review and that the new plan would be a "departure." But the president will "not radically change any of his long-term goals or commitment to Iraq, she said."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Peterson, 59K) reports on the "growing chorus, from the Iraq Study Group to Mideast experts," who are calling on President Bush to engage "archenemy" Iran's aid in stabilizing Iraq. However, "even if Mr. Bush were to set aside his approach to Iran as part of an 'axis of evil,' the question remains of whether Iran is willing to help the US out in Iraq - and if so, at what price." Bush "has spoken disparagingly" of such involvement of Iran, but the Monitor suggests that Iran may be able to leverage the perceived need for its cooperation into a softening of the U.N.'s position on its nuclear program.

Rice Seen As Having "Low Visibility" In Iraq Debate. The Financial Times (12/15, Dinmore, Luce, Wallis) reports under the headline "Rice Lying Low At The Middle East Crossroads" that "while US policy in the Middle East has stalled at multiple crossroads in the search for a 'new way forward' in Iraq," Secretary Rice "has been notable only for her low visibility." Although she is "likely to play a pivotal role in the outcome…many are asking whether she will take the risk and seize the opportunity to direct a comprehensive change of course in the region in the two years they have left." According to the Times, Rice "appears to be on the brink of ignoring the first of the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group – that she and Mr Bush launch a comprehensive 'new diplomatic offensive' by December 31," noting that in a recent interview with AFP, Rice said, "How long have American secretaries of state been shuttling back and forth trying to get a Palestinian state? Has it ever worked?"

State Department Says Prince Bandar Urged Rice Not To Engage Iran, Syria. AFP (12/15) reports Assistant Secretary McCormack said Saudi Arabia's former ambassador here recently visited Washington, "adding spice to reports he was involved in a power struggle which caused his successor to quit." The Washington Post reported Thursday that Prince Bandar bin Sultan was in the US capital recently to "counsel top officials against heeding mounting calls for talks with Iran or Syria." McCormack "reluctantly confirmed" Prince Bandar met Secretary Rice, "when pressed by reporters, but refused to divulge the substance of their conversation." AFP notes that "interestingly, the mission of Prince Bandar, current Saudi national security advisor, seems to directly conflict, on Iran, at least, with recent statements on Tehran by his successor as ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal," who abruptly resigned Monday.

White House Criticizes Bill Nelson For Visiting Syria. The AP (12/14, Riechmann), in an article published in over 40 papers and websites, including the Washington Post, reports that a day after Florida Sen. Bill Nelson (D) met with Syrian President Bashar Assad to discuss the situation in Iraq Wednesday, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow called the meeting "inappropriate," and said that together with scheduled trips to Syria by such lawmakers as Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd (D) and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter (R) "send an unhelpful, mixed message to the Syrians." Dodd countered that "members of Congress 'need to go to hotspots not just garden spots. I can't think of a more critical part of the world than the Middle East and I can't think of a more critical player in affecting events in the region for good or for bad than Syria.'"

DOJ_NMG_0106511

McClatchy (12/14, Clark) adds, "The White House on Thursday escalated its criticism" of Nelson, noting that "President Bush has accused Syria of backing the insurgents now fighting in Iraq." Nelson called his visit "a fact-finding tour of the Middle East," and cited a willingness on Assad's part to work with U.S. or Iraqi forces to secure their border. "Nelson said he viewed the talks as a 'crack in the door' for discussions to continue, but cautioned that he viewed the meeting 'with realism, not optimism.'" The piece notes that the Bush Administration's reluctance to follow the ISG's recommendation to engage Syria and Iran stems from the countries' ties to terrorist groups and to Syria's "record of meddling in Lebanon."

AFP (12/14) adds, "The White House sharply criticized" Nelson's trip "and warned Damascus not to see the visit as an indirect overture from Washington. 'Even lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region,' spokesman Tony Snow said." The AFP notes that Kerry "lent qualified support" to the ISG's calls for engagement, "saying during a visit to Cairo: 'I think it's important to begin a discussion. 'I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest,' Kerry said after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak."

The New York Times (12/15, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports that White House officials said the visit "was inappropriate and undermined democracy in the region," noting, "The visits are troublesome for the Bush administration because they come in the wake of the report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which has called for the United States to engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria. Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted such talks, and the visits by the senators could add to public pressure on the White House to change that policy." Moreover, "Specter, a moderate Republican who has often been at odds with the White House on domestic issues, said in a statement on the Senate floor this month that he had long advocated negotiating with Syria. 'We need to keep our friends close and our enemies closer,' he said." The Times suggests that the impasse over whether to engage Syria or to keep the country at a distance is symbolic of the broader U.S. policy dilemma in the region.

Kerry Calls For US Engagement With Iran, Syria. AFP (12/14) reports on Kerry's comments in Cairo urging President Bush "to kindle a dialogue with Iran and Syria in a bid to stabilize Iraq. 'I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest,' Kerry told reporters after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo. 'Syria needs to understand that and Iran needs to understand that, but I think it's important to begin a discussion.'"

Syrian Foreign Minister Backs ISG Recommendations. In a column in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K), David Ignatius writes about having asked Syrian foreign minister Walid Moallem "what positions would Syria take if it entered a dialogue with the United States about Iraq and other Middle East issues." Ignatius notes that Moallem expressed eagerness for such talks, seeing them as crucial to the region's stability, adding "Moallem's comments are the most detailed Syrian response to the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. … As we made a line-by-line review of the group's recommendations involving Syria, Moallem expressed support for nearly every item. When I asked if Syrian President Bashar al-Assad endorsed these positions, he answered: 'He is the leader. I am expressing his ideas.'" Ignatius continues to detail Moallem's views on the broader regional issues, concluding, "Is this Syrian gambit for real? Is Moallem serious in his offer to talk with America about a comprehensive package of peace with Israel, stability for Iraq and compromise in Lebanon? The answer is that there's really only one way to find out, which is to explore further the ideas the Syrian foreign minister has put on the table."

Odierno Takes Charge Of US Troops In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Army Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno "assumed command of U.S. troops at a ceremony in the capital on Thursday, vowing to pursue more than just combat to resolve the conflict in Iraq." Those who "know Odierno say the hard-charging general who plotted Hussein's capture as well as anti-insurgency operations may put more effort toward securing, rather than rebuilding, Iraq when he becomes the No. 2 U.S. commander here." Odierno "gained a reputation as an aggressive commander while leading the 4th Infantry Division in Sunni Arab-dominated parts of the country in 2003 and '04. Some military analysts have argued that the region's continued unrest can be traced to his heavy-handed methods."

DOJ_NMG_0106512

Caldwell Says US Making Progress In Training Iraqi Army. In a USA Today op-ed (12/15, 20A), Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the Multi-National Force in Iraq, says, "The Iraqi people and the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) share a vision for Iraq: a secure, stable and self-governing nation in which Iraqis find solutions to Iraqi problems. To do this, the government of Iraq must achieve national reconciliation, rebuild Iraq's infrastructure to provide basic services and — in partnership with coalition forces — defeat the terrorists and extremists seeking to sow the seeds of discord and division among the Iraqi people. The best way to achieve this last goal is to transition more authority and responsibility for Iraq's security to Iraqis. Iraqi forces have the best understanding of their culture, language and geography — all skills vital to defeating an insurgency. Once sufficiently trained, equipped and mentored, the Iraqi Security Force will be the most effective weapon against the foreign and extremist elements trying to tear apart Iraq." Today, Iraqis "are protected by a trained and equipped military and police force, one that will soon number more than 350,000. Quality is improving with quantity. Eighty percent of the Iraqi army is already operating with limited coalition support."

White House Defends Release Of Enemy Body Count. The AP (12/15) reports, "The White House expressed concern Thursday about what it believes is an impression that American forces in Iraq 'aren't doing anything, they're just targets.' In fact, said presidential spokesman Tony Snow, US troops are 'fighting the bad guys' and killing and capturing them." Snow "raised the point when asked to explain why President Bush, a day earlier, had said that 5,900 enemy forces had been killed or captured in Iraq during October, November and the first week of December. … 'There is quite often the impression...that our people aren't doing anything, they're just targets,' Snow said at his daily press briefing. 'And I think there's a certain amount of unease in the American public because they hear about deaths but they don't hear about what's going on.'"

First Lady Criticizes Media Coverage Of Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 5, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "First Lady Laura Bush had something to say about Iraq today. It was during an appearance on MSNBC. Mrs. Bush was asked by Norah O'Donnell why she thinks only two out of 10 Americans in our latest 'NBC News/Wall Street Journal' poll say they approved of the President's handing in the war in Iraq. Mr. Bush placed the blame squarely on the news media." Laura Bush: "I do know that there are a lot of good things that are happening that aren't covered and I think the drum beat in the country from the media, from the only way people know what's happening unless they have a loved one deployed there, is discouraging." Williams: "Mrs. Bush went on to say she hopes for what she called more balanced coverage in the future. The recent report from the Iraq Study Group, however, specifically found that there has been significant underreporting of the violence in Iraq."

US Troops In Iraq, Afghanistan To Get Flame-Resistant Uniforms. USA Today (12/15, Brook, 2.27M) reports Pentagon officials say "flame-resistant uniforms will be standard issue for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan by early 2007." More than "160,000 suits made of the flame-retardant fabric NOMEX will be sent to combat zones, said Thomas Edwards, assistant deputy chief of staff for Army logistics." Edwards said the Pentagon "moved quickly…because Iraqi insurgents are using homemade bombs and targeting the fuel tanks of vehicles."

Ethnic, Sectarian Divisions Are Barrier To Critical Oil Law Provision. The New York Times (12/15, Wong, 1.16M) reports Iraqi politicians and ministers "are divided along ethnic and sectarian lines over a critical provision in a proposed national oil law, according to the country's oil minister. If the differences can be bridged, the draft could be unveiled soon, the minister, Hussain al-Shahristani, said this week." The oil law, "along with security, is considered a prerequisite for attracting the foreign investment that Iraq's oil sector desperately needs. The law would set guidelines for development contracts for as many as 60 oil fields in the country, Mr. Shahristani said in an interview." The law "is also a crucial step in the process of national reconciliation, American and Iraqi officials said, because it sets out rules for the equitable distribution of the country's oil wealth. That, in turn, could ease tensions over granting greater autonomy to Iraq's regions." Although agreement "has been reached on the sharing of oil revenues, representatives of the main Sunni Arab, Shiite and Kurdish political blocs remain at odds over the issue of control over contracts to develop oil fields, Mr. Shahristani said."

DOJ_NMG_0106513

Baghdad Kidnappings Said To Reflect Growing Lawlessness. McClatchy (12/15, Dulaimy, Allam) reports that on Thursday morning, "gunmen dressed in Iraqi police and army uniforms descended on the Sinak district and kidnapped dozens of shopkeepers and bystanders in the latest of a string of mass abductions in Baghdad." The "brazen attack took place barely a mile from the heavily guarded government compound known as the Green Zone, where Iraqi officials were preparing for a weekend conference on national reconciliation." The Sinak attack "was the most notable incident on a day packed with other violence that reflects the lawlessness that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's beleaguered government appears unable to curb. Police reported the discoveries of 45 bodies in the capital Thursday, 42 in the mainly Sunni Muslim western side and three in the predominantly Shiite Muslim eastern side." Polices said a "leading Shiite politician, Adil Abdul Mahdi, escaped an apparent assassination attempt Thursday when gunmen fired on his motorcade in a majority-Sunni neighborhood, police said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "None knew who 'they' were: uniformed men firing weapons in the air and herding people into trucks, just a few hundred yards from the edge of the U.S.-guarded 'Green Zone.'" But "most had suspected such a day might come to the Sinak market of downtown Baghdad. All knew to run at first sight of the uniformed gunmen who have become signature elements of the all-too-common mass kidnappings in the capital." This time, "at least 60 people disappeared within minutes, stuffed into four delivery trucks and hauled away toward eastern Baghdad." An Interior Ministry official "reported later that at least 23 of the shopkeepers had been released unharmed in northern Baghdad, after showing their captors identity cards bearing names associated with Shiite Muslims." The fate "of previous victims of mass kidnappings has been brutal: most show up dead within days, often with signs of torture, such as drill holes."

The Washington Post (12/15, A24, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "The mass abductions, brazen even by Baghdad standards, were the latest sign of worsening insecurity in the capital. Two days ago, 70 day laborers were killed in a car bomb attack in another busy district. A month ago, gunmen who claimed to be from the Shiite-run Interior Ministry seized as many as 150 people from an agency of the Ministry of Higher Education, which is controlled by a Sunni Arab party." Thursday's "well-orchestrated kidnappings did not appear to be sectarian in nature or a reprisal attack, shopkeepers and officials said."

Iraqi Boy Wants To Escape Violence, Come To New York. ABC World News (12/14, story 6, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We are going to take 'A Closer Look,' tonight, at what it's like to grow up amid the chaos and violence in Iraq. The kidnapping and suicide bombings that we report on almost every night, are a daily reminder of the grave dangers that millions of Iraqis face every day." ABC (Harris) added Dan Azad, "who learned English while living in Texas with his aunt seven years ago, is a senior at Baghdad's ballet and music school." Outside of school, "Dan's world is small and stifling. He can hang out with his friends here. But because of the security situation, when classes are over, he's basically a prisoner in his parents' apartment." When he "graduates next spring, he's hoping, somehow, to go to college in New York City, either to study music or computers. He carries pictures of Manhattan in his cell phone."

Saddam's Capture Failed To Be Turning Point. The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 8, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "It was three years ago today that we learned American soldiers have found Saddam Hussein hiding in a dark hole beneath a mud shack near his hometown in northern Iraq, but it wasn't the turning point many had predicted." Former Coalition Provisional Authority Administrator Paul Bremer: "Ladies and gentlemen, we got him. CBS (Pitts) added, "Those three words uttered three years ago were seen by so many as both a proclamation." President Bush: "And now the former dictator of Iraq will face the justice he denied to millions." Pitts: "And a promise, the lives of Iraq's people were about to change and America's sons and daughters had accomplished the most important part of their mission." But to "war-weary Americans, however, victory is proving more elusive than a tyrant in a spider hole."

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 9, 1:45, Pinkston, 7.66M) reported, "Three years after the dictator's capture, Baghdad is the deadliest city on the face of the earth." A "new survey by an Iraqi Research Center finds 95% of the respondents believe security is worse now than it was under Saddam."

Accused Iraqi Expatriate Feels Deserted By US. The New York Times (12/15, Glanz, 1.16M) reports that of all "the Iraqi expatriates who returned to rule, rebuild and profit from their country after the invasion, none have fallen as far as Aiham Alsammarae, who was once the minister of electricity but now spends his days consumed with bitterness in a Baghdad jail as his lawyers fight multiple charges of corruption against him." Alsammarae, "an American citizen who lived in the Chicago area and built a thriving engineering firm there, is the only cabinet-level Iraqi official to be convicted and jailed for misusing money during his time in office. Four months ago, hearing that he was being accused of corruption, he walked into a Baghdad courthouse to find out if there were charges against him and was astonished to find himself placed under arrest pending trial. He has been in jail ever since." Alsammarae is "bitter because, he said, the United States has left him in his hour of need to the vagaries of an Iraqi court system that in many ways is still the opaque and frightening apparatus it was before the invasion."

DOJ_NMG_0106514

Female Muslim Translator Profiled For Her Service In US Military. In a 2,750-word, front page article, the New York Times (12/15, A1, Elliott, 1.16M) profiles Fadwa Hamdan, who "belongs to the rare class of Muslim women who have signed up to become soldiers trained in Arabic translation." Such female linguists, it notes, "play a crucial role for the American armed forces in Iraq, where civilian women often feel uncomfortable interacting with male troops."

Suicide Bomber Attacks Shopping Area Of Afghan Town. The New York Times (12/15, Wafa, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "detonated his explosives in the center of a busy shopping street in the town of Qalat in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing four civilians and wounding 22 people, the provincial police chief said." Also on Thursday, President Hamid Karzai "wound up a visit to southern Afghanistan with a speech at a boys' high school in Kandahar in which he blamed neighboring Pakistan for supporting Taliban insurgents and suicide bombers."

Negroponte Says Pakistan Must Deal With Tribal Leaders. The Washington Post (12/15, A26, Pincus, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said that with "new fighting expected to break out next spring in Afghanistan, the Pakistani government will soon have to decide what it can do about the tribal authorities who have not been living up to their agreement to prevent Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters from moving back and forth across the border." At a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters, Negroponte said, "Sooner or later, the government will have to reckon with it." But with "elections in Pakistan coming, the United States understands that President Pervez Musharraf 'has a domestic political balancing act to perform,' he added." In September, "representatives of the Pakistani government signed accords with tribal elders in North Waziristan in which those leaders agreed that they would not allow border crossings 'for any kind of militancy.' In return, Pakistani army units withdrew from that area." Negroponte said "the 'tribal authorities are not living up to the deal' and that back-and-forth travel by the Taliban and others 'causes serious problems.'"

Arlington Wreath Laying Effort Attracts Wide Following. ABC World News (12/14, story 11, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For more than a decade, a man in Maine, without much fuss and without many people paying attention, really, has been bringing thousands of holiday wreaths from Maine to Arlington Cemetery, in Virginia, to decorate the graves of soldiers. This year, people have noticed. Big-time." ABC (Donvan) added, "For 14 years, it was word-of-mouth only that each December, the truck with the wreaths would arrive. Always at dawn, always dignified. With so little notice or with so little notice or fanfare, it was practically a Christmastime secret. Not this year. This year, word got out in a big way. And hundreds of people showed up to help with the wreath-laying."

NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 11, Faw, 9.87M) reported, "Today at Arlington National Cemetery, 5,300 wreaths were distributed. Fresh Maine balsam. Grown, harvested and assembled by Maine businessman Morrill Worcester, devoted father of six. 45 years ago, on his first trip to Washington with newspaper delivery boys, he was awestruck by Arlington." Morrill Worcester: "Many people there gave the ultimate sacrifice. It's something you never forget." Faw: "So 14 years ago, Worcester, now prosperous, decided it only be fitting that Arlington get free wreaths." This year, "there's one big difference. This neighborhood operation is going nationwide, has grown 200-fold. For that, you can thank the Internet. Worcester's Website was so popular, it led to Wreaths Across America which this holiday will distribute them at over 200 veterans' cemeteries."

USA Today (12/15, 1A, Hampson, 2.27M) reports, "Every December for the past 15 years, Morrill Worcester, owner of one of the world's largest holiday wreath companies, has taken time in the midst of his busiest season to haul a truckload of wreaths to Arlington from his small Downeast Maine town of Harrington. For years, he and a small band of volunteers laid the wreaths in virtual obscurity. But in the last 12 months that has changed, thanks to a dusting of snow last year at the cemetery, an evocative photograph, a sentimental poem and a chain e-mail. And this year, Worcester went national. A new program, "Wreaths Across America," shipped a total of about 1,300 wreaths to more than 200 national cemeteries and vets' memorials in all 50 states."

DOJ_NMG_0106515

Bush Error At Press Conference Noted. The Washington Post's (12/15, A33) Al Kamen notes briefly in his "In the Loop" column that at his news conference last week, President Bush said: "I talk to families who die."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Travel Time Legislation Sent To Bush. The Washington Post (12/15, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" reports that after a "long flight through Congress, legislation that would permit Justice Department lawyers to claim time off for travel during off-duty hours has been sent to the president for his signature. Congress approved legislation in 2004 creating compensatory time off for federal employees, but the Justice Department decided it did not apply to the department's 9,000 lawyers because of a 1999 congressional restriction that limits their overtime pay. The law permits federal employees to receive time off when they travel on official business during off-duty hours, such as flying on a Sunday to attend a Monday morning meeting. Previous rules made it difficult for employees to qualify for compensation while traveling outside normal business hours." DOJ's "interpretation of the law triggered complaints inside the department. The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents about 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, worked with Congress and the department on a legislative solution."

US Attorney McKay To Resign. The AP (12/14, Johnson) reports US Attorney John McKay, "the Justice Department's top lawyer in Western Washington, said Thursday he will resign next month to return to the private sector. The announcement came the same day McKay was notified that he would not be nominated to be a federal judge in Seattle, but the timing was purely coincidental, he said. McKay had hoped to fill the position created by U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour's elevation to senior status.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sycamore Networks Says It Has Not Fully Complied With DOJ, SEC Subpoenas. The Boston Business Journal (12/14) reports, "Sycamore Networks Inc.'s stock options problems have taken a new twist." The Massachusetts firm "says it hasn't been able to comply fully with subpoenas from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission because a former employee won't cooperate. In a suit filed in Suffolk Superior Court last month, Sycamore says Katherine B. Galli, who helped manage the company's stock option program for several years, has refused to return crucial documents Sycamore needs to respond to the federal investigators."

Dell Delays Filing Of Quarterly Report. Bloomberg (12/14, Guglielmo) reports Dell "delayed filing its quarterly report for the second time this year, citing an accounting probe by government regulators." In an SEC filing, Dell said a "report for the quarter ended Nov. 3 will be filed as soon as possible." Dell "also hasn't submitted a report for the second quarter ended Aug. 4. Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins said in August the SEC has been reviewing the company's revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. Dell disclosed last month the SEC had stepped up the probe into a formal investigation. The U.S. Justice Department is also reviewing the company's accounting."

SEC Probes Coherent's Options Practices. CFO.com (12/14, Taub) reports the SEC is investigating the options granting practices of Coherent Inc., "which makes lasers for commercial and scientific uses." Coherent "assured investors that it intends to cooperate with the inquiry. As a result of the probe, however, Coherent said it will delay the filing of its annual report due to its internal review into its option practices and related accounting."

Apollo Group Says Ex-Officers Backdated. The AP (12/14) reports, "For-profit education provider Apollo Group Inc. said Thursday a special committee found that certain former officers took steps 'that may have been intended to mask failures' in the company's process for approving the grant dates for stock options. In its final findings from its review of past stock option grants, the special panel confirmed preliminary findings that recorded grant dates may not have matched the actual day stock options were granted, but instead coincided with dates on which the company's stock traded at low levels." While such backdating "itself is not illegal," failure to disclose it "can have legal and tax ramifications."

DOJ_NMG_0106516

SEC Loosens Interpretation Of Sarbanes-Oxley Auditing Requirements. The New York Times (12/14, Labaton, 1.16M) reports that the SEC, "responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals," issued a "flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection. In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that has come under attack from many companies. It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. A number of companies have asked to withdraw, and officials said the current rules discouraged companies from listing on United States exchanges if they did not have the option of withdrawing later." The SEC "also adopted a rule that would save corporations the expense of mailing financial reports and proxy statements by enabling them to communicate with the vast majority of their investors through the Internet."

In his Washington Post (12/15, D1, 690K) column, Steven Pearlstein writes, "The tough new federal regulators who were deputized to clean up the accounting industry after Enron, WorldCom and the other scandals have been busy reviewing the work and procedures of the Big Four accounting firms. And guess what? Everything is now hunky-dory. There's no need to worry any longer about channel stuffing, accounting for derivatives or backdating of stock options. The auditors have it covered. We know this because not a single member of any Big Four accounting firm has been sanctioned or censured since the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board opened its doors in 2003. In fact, from what has been made public -- not much -- one might surmise that shoddy auditing has been found exclusively at a handful of small accounting firms."

Wall Street Executives Reap Big Paychecks. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, C1, Craig, Smith, 2.04M) reports, "Record profits at Wall Street's big brokerage firms are already translating into big paychecks for the Street's chief executives, with the first out of the gate, John Mack of Morgan Stanley, hauling in an estimated $41 million. But Mr. Mack's mark, disclosed yesterday evening, is likely to be eclipsed soon by one or more of his rivals. Compensation for Lloyd Blankfein, chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., will exceed $50 million, believed to be a record for big-firm CEOs, according to a person familiar with the matter. Last year, as president of Goldman, Mr. Blankfein made $38 million." Analysts say they "expect a handful of other CEOs could hit $40 million to $50 million or higher, including James Cayne of Bear Stearns Cos., Stan O'Neal of Merrill Lynch & Co. and Richard Fuld of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. The three made $30.3 million, $35.5 million and $34.5 million, respectively, last year."

New SEC Rules Take Effect Today. The Washington Post (12/15, D1, O'Hara, 690K) reports, "Shareholders can expect a clearer picture of how much top executives are paid as new rules go into effect today, requiring companies to clearly explain their compensation practices. The new regulations mark the biggest change to corporate pay disclosure in 25 years. They will force companies to release more information about different kinds of compensation and to more clearly justify those payments." The SEC "ordered the changes this year in response to a rising backlash against annual double-digit percentage increases in executive pay. The Corporate Library said this year that pay for chief executives at more than 1,700 public companies grew 16 percent in 2005, down from 30 percent in 2004."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Launches Criminal Probe Of Federal Oil, Gas Royalties Collection. The New York Times (12/15, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property. The new investigations are still in the early stages, said Congressional officials who were briefed this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator." The probes "are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters."

DOJ_NMG_0106517

The AP (12/15, Hebert) reports, "Some members of Congress have estimated that the royalty exemptions have cost the government $2 billion. Allred put the amount at 'somewhat less than $900 million.' Congressional auditors have put the total government loss for past and potential future production under the leases as high as $10 billion."

The Federal Times (12/15, Curl) reports, "Price thresholds are typically included in federal drilling leases that Interior signs with oil companies and they determine when and how much companies must pay the government for the oil it extracts from federal properties. Price thresholds were not included in the drilling leases Interior inked with companies in 1998 and 1999, resulting in those companies not paying any royalties. At Congress' request, the department's inspector general is investigating why they were not included in those leases. A spokesman for the department said the investigation will continue and the report is still expected out in the coming weeks."

Duke Lacrosse Defense Team Says Accuser Misidentified Accused. The Washington Post/AP (12/15, A10, Scott) reports attorneys for the Duke University lacrosse players accused of rape said in court papers that their clients' accuser "misidentified her alleged attackers in a photo lineup that was 'an incoherent mass of contradiction and error.'" The defense team "filed a motion asking a judge to bar prosecutors from using the photo lineup at their clients' trial and prevent the accuser from identifying the players from the witness stand. Duke University law professor James E. Coleman Jr. said the case would be 'effectively dismissed' if the court finds the lineup inadmissible 'and rules that it is so suggestive that there can't be an in-court identification.'"

Judge Sets April Trial Date For Jeffs. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Dobner, Foy) reports polygamist leader Warren Jeffs "pleaded not guilty Thursday in state district court to two counts of rape by accomplice" for allegedly "forcing a 14-year-old girl to marry and have sex with an older cousin." The AP adds, "A trial was set for April 23. Prosecutors said the girl had no choice but to obey Jeffs, whose influence over his followers has been described as extraordinary, dictating everything from where they live to whom they should marry." The AP notes, "Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list when he was arrested Aug. 28 in a traffic stop north of Las Vegas."

The Deseret Morning News (12/15, Winslow) reports Jeffs "remains jailed in the Purgatory Correctional Facility without bail. Defense lawyers agreed on Thursday to keep him there until they deal with issues of discovery in the case. Should Jeffs ever be granted bail, the FBI filed papers in federal court stating they will take him into custody immediately." The Salt Lake Tribune (12/15, Adams) also reports on the trial, noting that he was on the FBI most wanted list. Additionally, CNN's The Situation Room (12/14, Blitzer), CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (12/14), Fox News' On the Record with Greta Van Susteren (12/14) and Fox News' Studio B with Shepard Smith (12/14) reported on the trial order.

Los Angeles Skid Row Fertile Ground For Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Winton, 850K) reports Los Angeles' "skid row has become a magnet for fraud schemes that use the area's homeless population to rip off the federal government, authorities said this week as they launched a crackdown on the activities. In just the last few months, state and federal investigators have busted two food stamp scams, one of which involved a merchant who allegedly gave homeless people 50 cents on the dollar for their stamps, then charged the entire value -- $6 million -- to the government." In November, charges were filed "against a MacArthur Park-area clinic for allegedly rounding up homeless people with Medi-Cal or Medicare cards and giving them a battery of medical tests charged to government programs. Authorities allege the bogus tests cost taxpayers at least $1.6 million and perhaps much more. Another hospital in South Los Angeles is under investigation to determine whether it recruited homeless people for short stays at federal expense, according to law enforcement sources."

Business Software Alliance Pirated Software "Bounty Program" To Expire. Investor's Business Daily (12/15, Bonasia) writes that "anyone who sees pirated software in the workplace may want to file a report by New Year's Eve, when the Business Software Alliance plans to suspend a year-old bounty program for whistle-blowers. Under the program, the BSA offers rewards of up to $200,000 for workers who provide details about pirated software being used at their company. Payouts are based on reports that lead to a settlement. The rewards program is being put on hold on New Year's Day as a way to motivate workers 'to go from thought to action' in reporting cases before the year ends, said Jenny Blank, chief of enforcement at the BSA. Blank says the program will resume; she didn't say when." The program "seems to work. Tuesday, Burlington Coat Factory paid $300,000 to settle claims it used unlicensed software from Microsoft and McAfee. The BSA also says Payless ShoeSource paid $124,057 to settle claims for unlicensed copies of software from Adobe, Borland, Internet Security Systems, McAfee and Symantec. Payless agreed to delete any unlicensed software and buy replacements. The case was reported through the BSA's online form."

DOJ_NMG_0106518

Chinese-Canadian Engineer Charged With Stealing Military Trade Secrets. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Robertson) reports, "A Chinese engineer was charged Thursday with stealing trade secrets from a Silicon Valley company that made military training software and attempting to sell them to Asian governments. Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, a Chinese national with Canadian citizenship, was indicted on 36 felony counts, including the rare charge of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government and various violations of military technology export laws." The AP notes, "Prosecutors say Meng stole the code for software made by his former employer, Quantum3D Inc., that's used to train military fighter pilots, and tried to sell it to the Royal Thai Air Force, the Royal Malaysian Air Force and a company with ties to China's military. … U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the case highlights the threat U.S. businesses face from thieves looking to sell hard-won intellectual property overseas."

The Washington Times (12/15, Seper, 88K) reports, "The indictment includes three conspiracy counts, three counts of economic espionage and attempted economic espionage, two counts of violations of the Arms Export Control Act, 12 counts of theft of trade secrets and attempted theft of trade secrets, 15 counts of foreign and interstate transportation of stolen property, and three counts of making false statements to a government agency. 'The FBI is committed to aggressively pursue those attempting to illegally obtain and export trade secrets vital to maintaining the United States' position as a world leader in innovation,' said FBI Special Agent in Charge Charlene B. Thornton, who heads the bureau's San Francisco field office. 'Today's indictment highlights the value of cooperation between law enforcement and private industry in effectively conducting these investigations,' she said."

ABC News (12/14, Ryan) noted on its Web site, "FBI counterintelligence officials have deemed China one of the biggest economic and military threats to the United States. This threat has caused the FBI to set up counterintelligence field squads in every field office across the United States to scour for cases exactly like this one. The products Meng allegedly dealt with could be found on banned U.S. export munitions lists."

Two Chinese Immigrants To US Plead Guilty To Economic Espionage. The AP (12/15, Robertson) also reports that in an unrelated case, "Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China, pleaded guilty in San Jose federal court to two counts each of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government as part of a deal with prosecutors. … They were charged with stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from their employers and attempting to smuggle them to China. The indictment alleges they planned to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies." The AP notes, "A business partner who tipped off the FBI told investigators the startup, called Supervision Inc., had received $2 million in funding from two Chinese cities, Hangzhou and Guangzhou, to develop the new microprocessor, according to an affidavit."

Stora Enso Denies Price-Fixing Charges. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/15, Dresang, 255K) reports, "The Finnish parent of Wisconsin-based Stora Enso North America denied Thursday that it conspired to fix the prices it charged for coated papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs in the United States." In a statement issued Thursday, the company said, "Stora Enso denies any wrongdoing and will enter a plea of not guilty when it appears before the court at the arraignment to respond to the indictment." The indictment "alleges that Wisconsin Rapids-based Stora Enso North America illegally set prices through an agreement with competitors from about August 2002 to June 2003. About the time U.S. antitrust authorities from the Justice Department began investigating Stora Enso in May 2004, their counterparts in the European Commission started similar probes in Europe."

DOJ_NMG_0106519

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Says Dallas County Jail Violates Inmates' Rights. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (12/15, 223K) reports a DOJ report says the "Dallas County Jail, one of the largest in the country, violates the constitutional rights of inmates by failing to provide adequate medical and mental healthcare. … Page after page of violations are detailed in a letter" from DOJ, "which also found that prisoners are not kept in safe or sanitary conditions at the detention complex, the seventh largest in the United States. Among the more egregious examples were an HIV-positive prisoner who died in October 2005 from an infection after his antibiotic was withheld for 11 days and a woman who hanged herself in January 2003. Her records included an inmate request form she filled out two days earlier."

Report Says Los Angeles County Hate Crimes On The Rise. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Rosenblatt, 850K) says reported incidents of hate crimes in Los Angeles County "increased for the first time in four years, while such incidents in schools have more than doubled from last year," according to the annual analysis by the Los Angeles County Commission on Human Relations. The report "tracked hate crimes reported to law enforcement or other agencies, but did not address which ones led to criminal charges or arrests. Conflicts between blacks and Latinos erupted on the streets, in jails and at schools, with school-based hate crimes soaring by 111%. Many of these incidents on or near campus occurred in South Los Angeles." The figure "does not include 11 of 14 large student scuffles last year. The commission did not receive reports on those incidents because it was difficult to determine if they were racially motivated."

New Jersey Legislature Approves Civil Unions Bill. The AP (12/15, Mulvihill) reports, "Ordered by New Jersey's highest court to offer marriage or its equivalent to gay couples, the Legislature voted Thursday to make New Jersey the third state to allow civil unions." Democratic Gov. Jon Corzine "said he would sign the measure, which would extend to same-sex couples all the rights and privileges available under state law to married people. The bill passed the Assembly 56-19 and the Senate 23-12."

The New York Times (12/15, Mansnerus, 1.16M) reports, "The Legislature voted on Thursday to make New Jersey the third state in the nation to recognize civil unions for same-sex couples. In doing so, it moved quickly to fulfill a court mandate to provide equal rights to gay couples but frustrated people on both sides of the emotional issue." New Jersey's "new unions, which would take effect 60 days after the governor gives the nod, would expand on the domestic partnership arrangements the state has had since 2004. Gay couples would gain benefits like adoption privileges, inheritance rights and the ability to take a partner's surname without going to court." But "gay-rights advocates continued to contend Thursday that the separate institutions were inherently unequal and promised to keep pushing for nothing short of marriage itself."

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Barry, 850K) reports the bill "was hurried through the process in 10 days, giving marriage advocates little ability to argue their case, said Lambda Legal Defense Fund attorney David Buckel, who represented seven couples who sued the state for the right to marry. 'The irony is that the court referred this matter to the legislature because it did not want to short-circuit the democratic process,' he said. 'The legislature is doing just that.'"

Number Of Death Sentences Falls. The New York Times (12/15, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the "number of death sentences in the United States has dropped to its lowest level in decades, according to recent studies, including one released Thursday that predicts the trend will continue because of publicity about cases in which people are wrongly accused of crimes." The Death Penalty Information Center, "a group based in Washington, reported that the number of death sentences, which had remained at about 300 a year in the 1990s, began to drop steadily in 1999 and has declined almost 60 percent since then." At the Justice Department, "the Bureau of Statistics reported last week that there were 128 death sentences in 2005, down from 138 the year before. While the department study does not include an estimate for 2006, the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes the death penalty and tracks cases closely, says the number for this year will be about 114." Defense lawyers, prosecutors, "and groups that study the application of the death penalty all say there are several reasons for the trend. Among them are increased publicity about cases other than murder in which DNA testing resulted in freeing people who had wrongly been convicted of crimes, producing skepticism about the reliability of verdicts; recent Supreme Court decisions requiring that juries be told when life in prison without possibility of parole is an option, and improved legal representation for capital defendants, including a sharp increase in using specialists to develop arguments for mitigation."

DOJ_NMG_0106520

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Weinstein, 850K) reports, "Executions in the U.S. declined to their lowest level in a decade this year, according to a study released Thursday by the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes capital punishment. Fifty-three people have been executed this year, with no more scheduled until 2007." That is "down from 60 last year and a significant drop from the peak of 98 executions in 1999, the Washington-based organization said in a year-end report." Two-thirds "of Americans still support capital punishment, the Gallup Poll found this year, but for the first time in two decades, it found that more Americans prefer that the penalty for murder be life without parole rather than death, by 48% to 47%, noted the Death Penalty Information Center."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Rebuts Reback On Telecom Mergers. CNET News.com (12/14, Broache) reports DOD "denied allegations that it fudged the analysis that prompted it to approve two telecommunications megamergers now under scrutiny by a federal judge. In a Thursday filing with U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan in Washington, D.C., Department of Justice lawyers took issue with accusations of wrongdoing lodged by opponents of the twin deals -- between AT&T and SBC Communications, and Verizon and MCI -- at a November 30 court hearing. T he public version of Thursday's document was redacted." Sullivan had given DOJ "the opportunity to respond to a lengthy presentation by Silicon Valley attorney Gary Reback on behalf of the Alliance for Competition in Telecommunications." Reback accused DOJ "of making up facts and ignoring critical considerations while analyzing the competitive impact of the deals. In its court filing, the Justice Department continued to defend its analysis, arguing that the allegations were 'based on mischaracterizations of relevant legal standards, misstatements of United States' positions, and misrepresentations of the factual record.' When approving the mergers, the Justice Department concluded that it needed to place limited condition s-- namely, requirements aimed at ensuring that the companies' competitors could gain access to fiber-optic connections in certain commercial buildings where Verizon and MCI or AT&T and SBC had been the only two companies supplying some types of connections."

FCC Chair Does Not Know When AT&T-BellSouth Merger Will Be Considered. The Washington Post (12/15, D3, Sipress, 690K) reports FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said he "did not know how soon it would consider AT&T's proposed $86 billion acquisition of BellSouth after the deal was left off the agenda for Wednesday's meeting because of a continuing stalemate between the commission's Republican and Democratic members." Martin, who supports the merger, "told reporters he was 'anxious' to set a date for the vote, which would create the country's largest provider of telephone, wireless and broadband services. AT&T and BellSouth have waited more than seven months for the commission to act despite Martin's efforts earlier this year to win quick approval of the transaction without conditions."

WSJournal Faults Democratic Commissioners For Delay. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A20, 2.04M) editorializes, "Democrats are back in power in Washington, and one question is whether their wilderness years taught them anything about the wisdom of restraint in regulating business. One early sign that they've learned nothing is their behind-the-scenes effort to delay, and maybe deep-six, the $80 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger. The deal has the support of Big Labor, was approved by the Justice Department without conditions in October, and would help consumers by bringing more competition to telecom amid enormous technological change and business ferment. But the merger has been held up for months at the Federal Communications Commission, thanks to the political maneuvering of the two Democratic Commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein. The pair have cited the size of the deal, the volume of public comment it has generated, and even the Justice Department's approval as reasons for delay. But what's really going on here is an old-fashioned regulatory hold up, in the armed-robbery sense of the word."

Airline Merger Talk May Be Mostly Hype. The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Marks, 59K) writes, "Wall Street is so buoyant about possible mergers" among the "last six traditional carriers" in the US airline industry that "you'd think airline consolidation was the best thing for the industry since the jet engine replaced the turbo prop. But an increasing number of analysts are questioning that assumption, and suggesting that all the merger talk may in the end be just that - talk." Aviation consultant Michael Boyd said, "We're in an environment where everyone believes the mantra that consolidation is both necessary and inevitable, but it is neither. The carriers like American, Northwest, and Continental are making money. Why do they have to merge? We have a very competitive system now." The "latest round of merger talk was sparked by United Airlines' chief executive Glenn Tilton reiterating his stance that 'consolidation is good and overdue for the industry' at a shareholder's meeting earlier this week. That prompted a series of still unconfirmed reports that United and Continental Airlines were talking about just such a deal."

DOJ_NMG_0106521

Antitrust Waiting Period Expires On Merck-Sirna Deal. The Silicon Valley/San Jose Business Journal (12/14) reports Merck and Sirna Therapeutics said the "federal regulatory antitrust waiting period has expired for Merck's $1.1 billion acquisition of Sirna. … The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the sale conditions, and the companies said consummation of the merger -- which is expected to occur in late December or early in the first quarter of 2007 -- remains subject to other customary closing conditions including approval by Sirna stockholders."

The AP (12/14) says Sirna "focuses on developing RNA interference, or gene-silencing technology. Drugs and treatments using the technology target specific genes at the root of a condition or disease, aiming to shutdown that gene, rendering the condition, such as a type of cancer, inactive."

US, European Firms To Buy Stake In German Broadcaster. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, C4, Esterl, 2.04M) reports, "The controlling shareholders of ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG have agreed to sell their stake in the German broadcaster to private-equity firms Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. of the U.S. and Permira of Europe, according to people familiar with the matter. The bid for Germany's largest television broadcaster by advertising revenue was in the range of €28 to €29, or about $37 to $38, a share, valuing ProSiebenSat.1 at a bit less than €6 billion, or about $8 billion, these people said."

Hearst Expects To Complete Newspaper Acquisition Today. Editor & Publisher (12/14) reports Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Torrance, California, Daily Breeze "on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators."

Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard. The AP (12/14) reports catheter maker Rochester Medical said it "reached a $49 million settlement with medical devices company C.R. Bard Inc. Under the terms of the agreement, Rochester Medical will dismiss C.R. Bard from a lawsuit it filed in March 2004 against C.R. Bard, Tyco International Ltd., Tyco Healthcare Group LP, Novation LLC, VHA Inc. and Premier Purchasing Partners LP. The lawsuit alleged that C.R. Bard, among others, conspired to exclude it from the market and violated antitrust laws."

Bond Market Antitrust Probe Could Spawn More Suits. Bloomberg (12/14, Rowley) reports, "The federal criminal antitrust probe into the municipal bond market that has yielded more than a dozen subpoenas of brokers, bankers and insurers may also lead to a spate of civil lawsuits by cities," according to antitrust expert Herbert Hovenkamp. Civil claims "typically follow in the wake of successful criminal price-fixing investigations by the U.S. Justice Department." Hovenkamp said that if it "turns out there is a nationwide conspiracy to fix interest rates' of investment contracts sold to local governments, 'it's got to be big.'"

Samsung, LCD Makers Could Face Massive Antitrust Penalties. Bloomberg (12/15, Cho) reports Samsung and "liquid-crystal display makers in Taiwan and Japan may face the largest antitrust penalty ever after a probe of possible price-fixing in the $69 billion industry. Fines may exceed $1 billion should authorities in the U.S., Europe, Japan and Korea uncover panel makers colluded." This week, LG.Philips LCD said it was "under investigation, spurring a two-day stock slide that erased about $1.6 billion in market value from the top five producers. Fines from the probe would undermine earnings in an industry where panel prices are forecast to slide more than 25 percent this year."

Japan Returns To International Acquisitions Scene. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A1, Morse, Singer,

DOJ_NMG_0106522

2.04M) reports, "After a long retreat from the global mergers-and-acquisitions scene in the 1990s and early 2000s, Japanese companies are once again on the prowl. With the population of Japan expected to shrink rapidly in coming years, many Japanese firms are looking to tap into growing overseas markets quickly by acquiring existing companies. So far this year, Japanese firms have bought 294 foreign companies for a total of $18.1 billion, more than in all of 2005 and double the figure in 2004." Japan's "big banks and financial conglomerates are scouting rapidly growing markets in the U.S., China and elsewhere for growth opportunities.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Department Approves Mohawk Casino Project. The New York Times (12/15, Bagli, 1.16M) reports that after "more than 10 years of delays, tribal recriminations and opposition from Atlantic City gambling interests, the effort to build a Las Vegas-style casino in the Catskills took a major step forward yesterday." The Interior Department "approved an environmental review of the St. Regis Mohawk Indian tribe's $600 million project. Proponents say the casino will bring thousands of jobs and tens of millions of dollars in revenue to a once thriving resort area known as the Borscht Belt."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Arrests College Student Over Pipe Bombs. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/15, Cato) reports ATF agents "arrested a California University of Pennsylvania student Thursday after tests showed he was storing numerous pipe bombs in his dorm room and his parents' Upper St. Clair home." Michael Blattner was charged with "unlawful possession and manufacture of destructive devices." US Magistrate Judge Francis X. Caiazza "set bond at $10,000 and ordered that Blattner undergo medical or psychiatric treatment. Blattner is being held in a Pittsburgh halfway house for observation, said Tom Stankiewicz, assistant special agent in charge of the Philadelphia ATF office. ATF agents and members of the Allegheny County Bomb Squad raided Blattner's dorm room and his parents' house Dec. 5. They collected numerous pipe bombs, materials and tools." Agents "recovered at least 22 pipe bombs from the two locations, court documents state. The explosive devices were wrapped in black electrical tape and ranged from 2 to 4 inches in length. Also seized were journals containing detailed plans for making improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. One drawing was titled 'medium pipebomb' and another 'Planted IED,' court documents show. Agents also found fragments from at least one exploded device, tools such as drills, ammunition used to create the explosive charge and shrapnel."

FBI Honors Philly Labor Leader With Director's Community Leadership Award. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/15, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "The FBI honored a local labor leader yesterday for her crime-prevention efforts in Philadelphia. Janet Hammond Ryder is vice president of labor participation for the United Way of Southeastern Pennsylvania, director for labor participation for the Philadelphia Council AFL-CIO, and cohost of the weekly Labor to Neighbor show on WURD-AM (900). Ryder received the FBI Director's Community Leadership Award for her efforts to combat poverty, violence, drugs, gangs, and crime by reinforcing the value of education for inner-city youths." The Philadelphia Daily News (12/15, 106K) also briefly reported on Ryder's award.

Boston Columnist Calls FBI Fighting Of Civil Suit "A Disgrace." In a Boston Globe (12/15, 413K) column titled "A Travesty of Justice," Brian McGrory writes, "Spend a couple of days -- or, for that matter, a couple of minutes…listening to testimony in the lawsuit brought by four wrongfully convicted men against the FBI, and a few simple questions come to mind. Why is the federal government fighting this? … Why are 40-year-old documents being kept secret? Why isn't there a single person in the Justice Department with a shred of common sense?" McGrory adds, "FBI Director Robert Mueller ought to fly to Boston, all right, but rather than offer absurd excuses to" US District Judge Nancy Gertner," he needs to extend apologies and big payouts to the men who were framed by his agency so many decades ago and the families that have survived them." McGrory contrasts the case with the Brandon Mayfield settlement and concludes, "What the FBI and the rest of the Justice Department are doing in this trial isn't just an embarrassment, but a disgrace -- and it will undoubtedly prove to be an expensive one at that."

DOJ_NMG_0106523

Two Ecoterror Suspects Plead Guilty To Vail ELF Arson. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Barnard) reports, "Two people who have admitted helping in the $12 million arson of a Vail, Colo., ski resort as part of an ecoterrorism campaign formally pleaded guilty Thursday to federal arson charges. Chelsea Dawn Gerlach and Stanislas Gregory Meyerhoff, both 29, had already pleaded guilty to some of the $20 million worth of arsons committed between 1996 and 2001 by a Eugene-based cell of the Earth Liberation Front known as the Family. Under plea deals with federal prosecutors, they agreed to have charges from the 1998 Vail arson transferred from Colorado to Oregon to be settled along with their other cases." The AP notes, "The Vail arson focused national attention on radical environmentalists who ascribed their attacks to the secretive Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, characterized by the FBI as the nation's top domestic terrorism threats. The investigation went nowhere for years until a task force found an informant who got old friends to talk about the crimes in recorded conversations.

FBI, Police Departments Improve Training On Islamic Culture. Under the headline "Shiite? Sunni? Some In US Learn Who's Who," the Christian Science Monitor (12/15, MacDonald, 59K) reports, "Some in Congress may need a primer on Islamic extremists. Five years after 9/11, three members of the House Intelligence Committee in recent interviews couldn't answer basic questions about who's Sunni and who's Shiite in the Muslim world. But other American institutions are already boning up - especially when they have a stake in doing so." The Monitor notes, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation, for instance, will emphasize Muslim culture when it expands introductory training for new agents from 18 to 21 weeks next month. In upcoming sessions, trainees will 'drill down deeper' than they have in the past, for instance, into differences between radical Shiite cultures and radical Sunni ones, says Keith Slotter, assistant director of the FBI's training division. For the first time, new agent training will also cover dynamics surrounding suicide bombing. 'When a person from another culture says something, the meaning behind the words may not be the literal translation that an agent might want to jump to,' Mr. Slotter says. 'There are so many different nuances and aspects [that] to be an effective interviewer ... you're going to need those cultural skills.' Urban police are taking similar steps."

FBI Investigating Alleged Improper Work By Murphy Staff Members. KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (12/14) reported from a broadcast story, "A federal investigation is underway after allegations surfaced against US Rep. Tim Murphy. Sources tell KDKA federal agents have begun interviewing former Murphy staffers on whether they did political work for the congressman on government time. Murphy denies the allegations. … But while neither the FBI nor the U.S. Attorney's office will confirm or deny an investigation, the probe concerns just that." KDKA added, "'There were several times when staff was asked and basically pressured into doing campaign activities,' said Jayne O'Shaughnessy, a former staffer for Murphy. Documents obtained by KDKA at least suggest that."

FBI Searching For Fugitive Texas Official Wanted On Child Rape Charges. KRGV-TV Harlingen (12/14) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "There's now a federal arrest warrant for the Hidalgo County District Clerk. The FBI and Texas Rangers have joined the search for Omar Guerrero. He's looking at charges of avoiding prosecution. Federal agents believe Guerrero has left the state and possibly the country. … The federal warrant authorizes agents to arrest Guerrero anywhere in the world." KRGV noted, "Police say Guerrero raped a 15-year-old girl."

Florida FCI Guards Sentenced To Probation, Prison For Sex-With-Prisoners Scheme. The Tallahassee Democrat (12/15, Subramanyam, 50K) reports, "Two former federal correctional officers charged in connection with a sex-with-prisoners scandal were sentenced Thursday after they pleaded guilty to mail fraud. Vincent Johnson was sentenced to one year probation and Alfred Barnes to one year in prison with three years of supervised release. Chief Judge Robert L. Hinkle dismissed all other charges. … A third officer, E. Lavon Spence, was scheduled for sentencing Thursday after pleading guilty to mail fraud." The Democrat notes, "Johnson, Barnes and Spence were among five correctional officers arrested June 21 at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout at the prison after he opened fire on federal agents. A federal agent died, and a Bureau of Prisons employee was injured." The AP (12/15, Royse) adds, "The judge said he lightened Alfred Barnes' punishment in part because he cooperated with prosecutors in the case."

DOJ_NMG_0106524

Philadelphia Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life For Murdering Witness. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/15, Shaw, 385K) reports, "Felix Summers -- the reputed South Philadelphia drug dealer authorities say was at the center of a web of witness-retaliation and drug killings in his neighborhood -- was sentenced yesterday to life in prison without parole. Summers, 25, was convicted last month in the March 1999 shooting death of Charlotte Presley, 39, a witness against him in another homicide." To the life sentence, Common Pleas Court Judge Carolyn Engel Temin added "30 to 60 months for witness retaliation," which Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega said "highlights the fact that this is not just a murder." The Inquirer notes, "Summers was also charged in the Aug. 16, 2001, shooting death of Veronica Rios, 15, a bystander who was" killed in the murder of another witness. "The FBI added Summers to its 10 Most Wanted list after Rios' slaying."

FBI Detains Disruptive Continental Flight Passenger In Texas. KHOU-TV Houston (12/14) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A passenger onboard Continental flight from Hawaii to Houston who reportedly caused some type of disturbance onboard the aircraft is in federal custody. Noboru Akao arrived at federal court downtown Thursday morning, in shackles and an orange uniform." KWTX-TV Waco (12/14) noted, "According to an FBI press release, witnesses told FBI agents the man was disruptive and combative and groped a female flight attendant during the last two-and-a-half hours of the flight. The FBI said the man trashed a lavatory and eventually was restrained with flex cuffs to curb 'his increasingly aggressive behavior.'" The Houston Chronicle (12/15, George, 530K) reports Akao "had mixed his medication during the trip, federal authorities said Thursday. … Federal prosecutor Michael Schultz declined to specify the medications in open court." The Chronicle notes, "Houston police arrested Akao on Wednesday morning and handed him over to the FBI after the flight arrived at George Bush Intercontinental Airport."

US Agents' Business Cards Found Taped To Body In Mexico. The El Paso Times (12/14) reported U.S. law enforcement agencies "were informed by their Mexican counterparts that a man found murdered in Juárez last month had the bloodied business cards of two U.S. agents taped to his forehead. The victim, who has not been identified, was dropped from a van at the Chamizal park in Juárez on the afternoon of Nov. 23. The man had the cards of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent Raul Bencomo and of a DEA agent with the first name Todd stuck to his forehead with masking tape." Officials with ICE and DEA "confirmed they were told about the cards found on the Chamizal body by Mexican authorities, but said they were not part of any investigation."

The AP (12/15, Caldwell) reports photographs of the victim "published in…the Spanish-language newsapaper El Diario de El Paso, show one of the business cards is from Raul M. Bencomo, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent. Bencomo oversaw a controversial drug informant who led authorities to the bodies of about a dozen men buried in the yard of a Juarez house in 2004. The second card, which is barely legible in the photos, is believed to be from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent." Media outlets that used the AP story include FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, and Dallas Morning News.

On its Web site, KDBC-TV, El Paso, Texas (12/15) reports, "On the front page of the Diario today... a story about a possible DEA Informant found murdered. The newspaper worries this story may have something to do with a suspicious car found in their parking lot. Diario Employees found a car with Mexican plates and the Diario logo on it in front of their building. The Mexican Woman driving it says she was sent for a job interview, but could not explain why she was driving the car or who sent her there."

Local TV Coverage. KTSM-TV, El Paso, Texas (12/14, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Juarez police say execution style murders are becoming more frequent and more gruesome. Just last month an unidentified man was found at the Chamizal Park murdered with two bloodied business cards taped to his forehead. One card belonged to an Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent, the second to a DEA agent. One of the man's fingers had also been cut off and shoved into his mouth."

KVIA-TV, El Paso, Texas (12/14, 10:00 p.m.) noted a front-page story which ran in Thursday morning's edition of El Diario. KVIA reported, "The story outlines the murder of an alleged DEA informant whose body was found mutilated and dumped in the Chamizal Park in Ciudad Juarez."

DOJ_NMG_0106525

US Attorney Says Cyclist's Indictment In BALCO Investigation Marks New Phase. There are nearly 400 media references to the grand jury indictment of former world silver medalist cyclist Tammy Thomas. Most media outlets used the AP story. The AP (12/15) reports former world silver medalist cyclist Tammy Thomas "was the latest sports figure and first athlete to be indicted for hindering the three-year-old [federal steroids] probe. She faces three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice." Kevin Ryan, the U.S. attorney for Northern California, "said Thursday's indictment, along with last month's obstruction of justice charges against track coach Trevor Graham, marks a new phase in the BALCO investigation. 'A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury,' he said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/14, 384K) reported a former world-class cyclist who "was caught up in the BALCO steroid scandal was indicted Thursday on charges of lying to a federal grand jury about her use of banned drugs. … Thomas also testified that she had never taken steroids and had never obtained steroids from anyone, according to the indictment. All the statements were lies, according to the indictment, which was handed up by a grand jury in San Francisco."

The New York Times (12/15, Wilson, 1.16M) reports the federal grand jury investigating steroid use in sports "yesterday indicted…Thomas for perjury and obstruction of justice, charging that she lied to another grand jury looking into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroids case. Thomas received a lifetime competition ban in 2002 from the United States Anti-Doping Agency after she tested positive for the previously undetectable steroid norbolethone. … Thomas…testified to a grand jury in 2003 that she had never taken performance-enhancing drugs or received them from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who worked with BALCO in Burlingame, Calif."

The New York Daily News (12/15, 729K) reports the indictment "accuses Thomas of lying when she told the grand jury in 2003 that she never used performance-enhancing drugs. It also said she lied when she said she did not receive illegal drugs from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who created the once-undetectable steroid THG. Each charge carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/15, 229K) reports a turn of events Thursday in the BALCO case "sent a chilling message to athletes connected to the inquiry: Anyone who allegedly lied to a federal grand jury investigating the use of drugs in sports could find themselves in a legal bind. Former world-class cyclist Tammy Thomas, now a law student in Michigan, became the first athlete indicted in the BALCO scandal when she was charged Thursday with three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice. She faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine."

Bloomberg (12/14) reported Thomas "declined to comment when reached by phone at her home in Lansing, Michigan. Thomas was banned for life from competitive cycling by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency in 2002 after testing positive for the steroid norbolethone. It was the second time she failed a drug test. She tested positive for elevated testosterone at the 2000 U.S. Olympic Trials."

Local TV Coverage. KTVU-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (12/14, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "The latest grand jury meeting here inside the federal building in San Francisco today indicted its first athlete for perjury. The indictment charges cyclist and former silver medallist Tammy Thomas with three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice for allegedly lying to a grand jury investigating BALCO's performance-enhancing drugs. She denied ever taking them."

KOVR-TV, Sacramento-Stockton-Modesto (12/14, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Tammy Thomas was indicted today by a federal grand jury. She is accused of hindering the [steroids] probe. Prosecutors say Thomas lied to the jury investigating a [steroid] ring which has affected many sports."

WLBT-TV, Jackson, Mississippi (12/14, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Former elite cyclist and Yazoo City native Tammy Thomas has been indicted in the government's ongoing steroid probe. Thomas is accused of three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice for allegedly lying to a federal grand jury. The grand jury was investigating a steroid ring that spanned across many sports."

In Wisconsin, 33 Charged In Cocaine-Ring Investigation. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/14, Doege, 255K) reported a federal grand jury "indicted 33 people Thursday on charges linking large-scale cocaine suppliers in Milwaukee to a tightly controlled network of dealers in Waukesha. The indictments and arrests, officials say, dried up the primary source of cocaine in the city of Waukesha while taking a handful of large-scale operators off the streets of Milwaukee. The charges result from a lengthy probe begun quietly in January 2004 by Waukesha County narcotics investigators whose work revealed that a single network of people was responsible for a large share of the cocaine finding its way into Waukesha. … 'I think that you can determine the significance of this case by the number of people arrested and the scope of their activity,' said James Bohn, assistant special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration."

DOJ_NMG_0106526

Seventeen Arrested In New York Drug Sweep. The Plattsburgh (NY) Press Republican (12/14) reported law-enforcement agencies "rounded up 17 people early Wednesday morning and charged them with numerous drug-related crimes. Most of the accused live in and around Plattsburgh and are suspected of dealing marijuana, heroin, methamphetamines, cocaine and crack. … DEA Resident Agent in Charge James T. Farnsworth said the arrests came after months of investigation and surveillance. He said it is becoming more common for people from the New York City area to move to the North Country to sell drugs because they can fetch a higher price here."

Five Pennsylvanians Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Heroin. The Times Leader (12/14) reported five people from Hazleton and Freeland "were indicted last week in connection with an alleged heroin distribution conspiracy that operated in the Hazleton area since January. … The charges stem from an investigation by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and Pennsylvania State Police."

DEA Says Texas Drug Ring Smuggled Proceeds In Detergent Containers. On its Web site, KSAT-TV, San Antonio, Texas (12/14) reports a San Antonio-based cocaine-smuggling ring "has been put out of business by the Drug Enforcement Agency, resulting in the seizure of 210 kilograms of cocaine, $4.5 million in cash and arrests of 29 people, including an elementary school teacher and an elderly woman." DEA agent Joe Arabit "said that the ring had been in operation for the past few years and had its roots in San Antonio, Floresville and Eagle Pass." The drugs "were smuggled from Mexico and distributed throughout Texas, Tennessee and Ohio, Arabit said. The proceeds from the sale of the drugs were then smuggled in containers of powdered detergent and large buckets of construction material."

Five Canadians Face Charges For Roles In Drug-Smuggling Scheme. In Calgary, the Globe and Mail (12/14) reported a long-running international smuggling operation that "used small planes to ferry illegal drugs between Alberta and Montana has been dismantled by police, who said yesterday that five Canadians face charges in connection with the plot. The nine-month investigation, dubbed Project IDEA, resulted in the seizure of $5.2-million worth of drugs, including 500 kilograms of marijuana, 30 kilograms of cocaine, 9,000 tablets of diazepam and 210 vials of ketamine." Authorities "worked with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and U.S. Immigration Customs Enforcement to crack what Insp. McCallum described as an 'independent' operation."

The Calgary Sun (12/14) reported the drugs "have a combined street value of $5.2 million and were all seized in the United States."

Marijuana Bust In New Hampshire Called Largest In State's History. In Concord, the Eagle Tribune (12/14) reported police "seized four local homes and millions of dollars worth of marijuana plants…in what officials are calling the largest bust of its kind in the state's history." Police said homes "were being used as labs to grow thousands of marijuana plants. … In all, 10 homes in nine New Hampshire towns were seized, six people were arrested and $24 million worth of marijuana was recovered. Local and state police descended on the homes simultaneously…in the culmination of an investigation that included the U.S. Attorney's Office, the state Attorney General, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Manchester's Union Leader (12/15) reports Chau Kelley, a board member with the Vietnamese Community of New Hampshire, "said a growing number of law-abiding Vietnamese immigrants in New Hampshire have become aware of organized crime rings in their midst. This week, as investigators orchestrated what may be the largest marijuana seizure in the state's history, those fears seemed to be confirmed. Law enforcement officials uncovered a massive drug ring Wednesday, confiscating $24 million worth of marijuana plants from 10 upscale homes along the Interstate 93 corridor. Most of the homeowners had Vietnamese last names."

DOJ_NMG_0106527

Man Accused Of Transporting Tons Of Marijuana Captured In Arizona. KVOA-TV, Tucson (12/15) reports on its Web site that DEA agents say they've "captured a high-profile drug runner right here in Tucson. His name is Carlos Molinares Nunez, and agents say he's responsible for moving tons and tons of marijuana through the Naco and Sasabe corridor." DEA officials "say his arrest has eliminated a significant source of supply for other drug trafficking organizations within the U.S. Molinares reportedly distributed marijuana from California to Florida."

DEA Agent Says California Dispensary Sells Marijuana For Nonmedical Use. In Oakland, the Daily Review (12/14) reported the owner and manager arrested in Tuesday's federal raid on the Local Patients Cooperative "were released on bond after their first court appearance Wednesday." According to the Daily Review, DEA agent Kenny Lee's affidavit says, "I believe that Hayward Local Patients Co-op attempts to disguise the breadth of its criminal activity by claiming that it caters exclusively to persons suffering from medical illnesses, when in fact persons without any medical condition can purchase marijuana ... at the retail establishment."

The Oakland (CA) Tribune (12/14, Richman) reported agents "arrested the two Tuesday on suspicion of conspiracy, marijuana distribution, and maintaining drug-involved premises. Drug Enforcement Administration and Internal Revenue Service agents raided the Foothill Boulevard cooperative and each suspect's home."

Michigan Doctor Released On Bond In Painkiller Case. The Toledo (OH) Blade (12/14) reported a suburban Detroit physician "accused of illegally prescribing painkillers to patients at his Toledo practice was released from federal custody…on a $500,000 property bond. U.S. District Judge James Carr allowed the release of Dr. Leo M. Ognen during a detention hearing in Toledo. … Ognen was indicted last week on drug conspiracy and drug distribution charges for writing prescriptions for millions of dollars worth of painkillers. The charges stem from a Drug Enforcement Administration investigation and search of the physician's former office…and a Toledo home owned by him and his wife."

Mexican Embassy Identifies Man Killed At Hospital As Drug Cartel Member. The El Paso Times (12/15) reports a man who "narrowly survived a street shooting in Juárez only to be followed by his attackers inside a hospital and killed Tuesday was one of the men who was videotaped unloading drugs from a crashed SUV during a standoff in Hudspeth County in January. César Alonso Gándara Reyes, 30, was first shot at...in a neighborhood near the Zaragoza Bridge on Tuesday afternoon, Juárez police said. He was transported to the Clínica Zaragoza…by someone who quickly left the hospital. While Gándara was being treated for his wounds, a group of men pretending to be police officers shot him on a gurney." According to the Times, Gándara was identified on the Mexican Embassy Web site as a member of the Escajeda family, a cell of the Juárez drug cartel. Thursday, DEA officials "said they had no information about Gándara's death."

IMMIGRATION:

Minneapolis Spot Known For Fake IDs Open In Spite Of Raids. The AP (12/14) reported a spot in Minneapolis "notorious for the sales of fake identifications was open for business this week despite the message immigration enforcers hoped to send with the recent high-profile raid on a Worthington meat packing plant. Even the New York Times reported last summer on the spot - the parking lot of the Kmart department store on Lake Street - and when a reporter for Minnesota Public Radio went there he found four young men with fake IDs to sell." A young man who spoke on condition of anonymity said the ICE raid "wouldn't slow down the trade in fake IDs because thousands of people will move in to replace those who were arrested."

Scholar Says Immigration Laws Create "Impossible Situation" For Employers. Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K) writes that while ICE's worksite immigration raids of six Swift & Co. meatpacking plants Tuesday could be seen as "perfectly justified," there is one "catch: Swift has been trying for years to comply with our poorly conceived immigration laws, coping as best it could with an impossible situation. Like a driver who finally goes through a broken traffic light, the company and its workers aren't the problem -- the system is." Jacoby continues, "Don't misunderstand: Swift is no band of saints. Everyone involved -

DOJ_NMG_0106528

- the company, its workers, the US government -- knows that the kind of compliance required to pass muster today is a charade. But it is a charade our dysfunctional immigration system has all but forced the firm and its workers to play."

Report About Illegals' Effect On Texas Economy Prompts Debate. The Washington Post (12/15, A2, Fears, 690K) reports Texas State Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn's recent finding that "Illegal immigrants not only pay their fair share in taxes, but…are also good for the economy" has "sparked "a war of words over illegal immigration" in the state. State Rep. Leo Berman, "who introduced legislation that would bar Texas from recognizing children born to illegal immigrants in American hospitals as US citizens, called the report 'outrageous.'" The Post adds, "An official state document that contradicts the idea that immigrants are a financial burden can carry considerable weight as Democrats take control of Congress, and as potential candidates consider their options in the 2008 presidential election."

Immigration Laws Said To Create "Impossible Situation" For Employers. Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K) writes that while ICE's worksite immigration raids of six Swift & Co. meatpacking plants Tuesday could be seen as "perfectly justified," there is one "catch: Swift has been trying for years to comply with our poorly conceived immigration laws, coping as best it could with an impossible situation. Like a driver who finally goes through a broken traffic light, the company and its workers aren't the problem -- the system is." Jacoby continues, "Don't misunderstand: Swift is no band of saints. Everyone involved -- the company, its workers, the US government -- knows that the kind of compliance required to pass muster today is a charade. But it is a charade our dysfunctional immigration system has all but forced the firm and its workers to play."

Congress To Take Another Look At Border Fence Legislation. Fox News (12/14, Porteus) reported on its website, "The 700-mile border fence Congress approved for construction in a session-ending deal was little more than a fast act of political cosmetics in an election year and may never come to fruition, say immigration advocates looking ahead to the Democratic-led 110th Congress." Rep. Bennie Thompson, who "will re-evaluate the border fence issue" as chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, "has said that while a physical fence may be a good idea in some urban areas, the issue is broader than a physical barrier." Fox added, "The border fence has come under fire from Democrats and pro-immigration groups as well as some Republicans who say erecting a fence isn't a substitute for comprehensive immigration reform." Meanwhile, "Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have both signaled concern about the border fence, and are looking to technology for a more politically satisfying solution."

TAX:

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Johnson Responsive After Brain Surgery. The AP (12/15, Jalonick, Raum) reports, "Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition but was described as recovering and holding his wife's hand Thursday after emergency overnight surgery to repair bleeding inside his brain. … 'He has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required,' said the physician, Adm. John Eisold. He had said earlier, 'The senator is recovering without complication.'"

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 3, 2:10, Attkisson, 7.66M) said "it's too early for a long-term prognosis," while ABC World News (12/14, story 3, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "the political prognosis has Washington preoccupied." ABC (Tapper) added, "In the political arena, Democrats worry about their paper-thin Senate majority. 51 votes to 49. If Johnson's Senate seat becomes vacant, South Dakota's Republican Governor, Mike Rounds, would likely appoint a Republican to replace him, creating a 50-50 Senate with Vice President Cheney the tie breaker. The Republicans would again control the Senate." Along similar lines, the AP (12/15, Kuhnhenn) reports this morning, "Suddenly, the Democrats' grip on the Senate looks very tenuous indeed."

The Argus Leader (12/15, Harriman) reports "incoming Sen. Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., maintained a hopeful demeanor even as speculation was at its darkest Thursday morning before news that Johnson was regaining consciousness was widely distributed. Reid said he had visited Johnson in the hospital before and after surgery. '"To me, he looked good,' Reid said in a press conference and predicted a full recovery for Johnson." USA Today (12/15, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Reid also "said he is continuing to organize for a Senate run by his party. 'There isn't a thing that has changed,' said Reid."

DOJ_NMG_0106529

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A5, Rogers, Lueck, 2.04M) notes that "if Mr. Johnson is recovering but still hospitalized when the new Congress convenes in January, Democrats would retain a 50-49 majority and be able to organize under Mr. Reid." But "dates here mean less since, unlike the House, Senate rules permit that body to reorganize at a later date in the new Congress if the balance of power changes." On its website, meanwhile, Time (12/14, Tumulty, 4.03M) pondered the possibility of Republicans filibustering the organizing resolution" in January. That scenario, says Time, presents a "truly extraordinary possibility: a chamber with a new Democratic leader, but the existing set of Republican committee chairmen. That is because, until an organizing resolution is passed, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid would have no control over the committees. "

However, politicians of both parties are refusing to speculate on that possibility. The New York Times (12/15, Zernike, 1.16M) reports "even some Republican lawmakers and aides criticized news coverage of Mr. Johnson's illness as ghoulish, saying it put too much emphasis on who would control the Senate and not enough on his health." Sen. Trent Lott "brushed off questions about procedures if the membership split 50-50," and Sen. Mitch McConnell "issued a statement titled 'The recovery of Senator Tim Johnson' -- emphasis on recovery. 'I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery,' he said. 'Our thoughts are with his wife, Barbara, and his family during this time.'" Democratic "aides said they had not received any Republican requests to discuss any power-sharing rules." On Fox News (12/14, MacCallum), Lott said, "In the end, while it may not appear like it sometimes, we are sort of a full Senate family. And we know each others' spouses, and we do have more of a bond than people realize. So we're all just shocked and hoping for the very best. … My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back and we'll go to work. You know, I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

USA Today (12/15, Harriman, Kiely, 2.27M) reports "Johnson's office was filled Thursday with flowers and cards brought by a steady stream of well-wishers rooting for the senator's recovery from brain surgery. One card was delivered by Benjamin Ready, a field representative for Republican Sen. John Thune." The White House also wished Johnson a speedy recovery. The Washington Times (12/15, Hurt, 88K), McClatchy (12/15, Talev), Bloomberg (12/15, Roberts) and CQ (12/15) run similar stories.

Meanwhile, a number of news reports suggest a hypothetical long-term incapacitation would not necessarily lead to Johnson's departure from the Senate. The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Parsons, Manier, 617K) reports, "As long as a senator is alive, there is no way to legally remove him or her from office for health reasons, experts said." And the Los Angeles Times (12/15, Hook, 850K), in a story titled "Senate Is Loath To Remove Disabled Members," says that is "an enduring tradition in one of the world's most exclusive clubs: Never has the Senate forced its members out of office because they have become physically or mentally incapable of serving." That "hands-off protocol could be a big boon to Democrats."

ABC World News (12/14, story 4, 1:45, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported "Republicans really are signaling that they're going to give" Johnson "all the time he needs to recover. They're not going to make a political issue, even if he's gone from the chamber for a long period of time. As one aide told me, 'He's family.'" The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 5, 1:20, Borger, 7.66M) also said "Republicans are staying very far away from the conversation about just who is going to control the Senate at least for now. As one Republican said to me, 'This is not the way we want to win back the Senate.'" NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 2, Reid, 9.87M), meanwhile, noted that "political scientist Sarah Binder says Johnson can keep his seat even if he becomes incapacitated." Sarah Binder: "South Dakota law, when it defines vacancy mentions vacancy caused by death, resignation, expulsion. It does not make any reference to incapacitated Senators." Reid: "In fact, since 1942, eight US Senators have been absent for months, even years, due to serious illness without resigning. One is still serving. Joe Biden of Delaware spent more than six months recovering from brain aneurysm surgery in 1988."

The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Babington, 690K) reports, "Although Johnson's illness was the talk of Washington yesterday, politicians in both parties refrained from publicly discussing how the two-term senator's illness might affect the incoming 110th Congress. A few Democratic lobbyists and their spouses were dining Wednesday night at Sesto Senso, an Italian restaurant near Dupont Circle. As they discussed Johnson's condition, they folded their hands as if praying for him, a gesture that appeared tinged with political as well as heartfelt sentiments."

DOJ_NMG_0106530

Johnson is suffering from a condition called arteriovenous malformation, or AVM. The Washington Post (12/15, A4, Brown, 690K) reports "the experience of other people who have suffered bleeding from arteriovenous malformations inside the brain suggests that…Johnson…has at least a 50-50 chance of full recovery. … Many people harbor arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) unknowingly for decades. When they bleed, 10 to 15 percent of patients die within hours, 35 percent suffer permanent disability and about 50 percent recover more or less completely." The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A5, Lueck, 2.04M), in a similar assessment titled "Senator's Chances Are Mixed For Recovery From Rare Disorder," says that "if he regains function quickly after surgery, recovery might take only a month or so. If he doesn't bounce back quickly, prospects for recovery are more variable and uncertain, but can take six months to a year." USA Today (12/15, 1A, Kiely, 2.27M) notes "patients with Johnson's condition frequently require a second operation to remove the problem blood vessels, according Sean Grady, chief of neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania." Grady "said such operations 'can pose a very high risk' depending on where the damaged blood vessels are in the brain." The New York Times and Los Angeles Times (12/15, Maugh, 850K) also run features on AVM.

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 4, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Dr. Jon Lappok, who said, "We don't know again the specifics of the Senator's situation, so we can't say anything about him, but in general, patients can make a complete and total recovery." NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 3, Williams, 9.87M) spoke to Dr. Nancy Snyderman, who said, "The first 24 hours are crucial for normal complications after any kind of brain surgery like this. I think people are really watching because this happened in the temporal lobe, the part of the brain where speech and understanding of words happen. Every minor change in the ability to understand, the ability to articulate words, those can be seen as monumental steps, not in the next couple of hours or days but in the next couple of months." The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Levey, 850K) reports that "because the senator made it through the operation without incident, his odds of survival are high, experts said. However, it is unclear whether or to what extent he might be afflicted with permanent impairment."

News stories this morning describe the senator as an assuming and independent lawmaker. The AP (12/15, Kellman) reports he is "a rare senator who almost never has sought the spotlight. Asked by a local columnist if he ever tires of being described as boring, Johnson replied: Not at all." But "long before the two-term senator's medical crisis this week, Johnson won national attention by keeping Democrats guessing about whether they could count on his vote. He bucked his party by being only one of three Democrats to vote to confirm Justice Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court. He voted to ban late-term abortions. He said yes to a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning, anathema to most in his party." And "then there was perhaps the defining vote of Johnson's career: whether to authorize the use of military force in Iraq. Johnson voted yes, though he had a very personal reason to vote no: his oldest son, Brooks. Then 32 and a staff sergeant with the Army's 101st Airborne Division, Brooks would be among the first sent to the region, Johnson knew." The New York Times (12/15, Davey, 1.16M) titles its profile of Johnson "An Unfamiliar Spotlight For An Unassuming Senator."

Bipartisan House Task Force To Consider Independent Ethics Enforcer. The AP (12/15, Werner) reports House leaders are "creating a bipartisan task force on whether to establish an independent ethics panel to police the House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said Thursday." Pelosi said Minority Leader John Boehner "has agreed to the idea. The task force has not been set up yet, but it will be expected to report back in March, she said." Pelosi "offered no details on what the outside ethics group might look like, saying that would be up to the task force." Pelosi said, "There is no question that the ethics process in the last couple of years has lost the confidence of the American people. I'm hopeful that it's possible that we can have an outside entity that will restore that confidence." The AP adds the establishment of "a permanent outside enforcement entity has been a priority of ethics reformers, but such proposals have failed to become law in the past. In March, the Senate voted 67-30 to reject creation of an Office of Public Integrity to oversee ethics violations by lawmakers." Among the "no votes were incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who will head the Senate Rules Committee, which has jurisdiction over ethics and lobbying."

DOJ_NMG_0106531

The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "Citing the mandate from voters in the midterm elections to clean up a culture of corruption," Pelosi "promised a sweeping reform agenda Thursday, including a first-ever 'outside enforcement mechanism' for congressional ethics." Other elements "unveiled this week include a ban on 'earmarks' or member projects for fiscal year 2007, a five-day congressional workweek to better process 'the people's business,' and a new oversight panel on intelligence along the lines proposed by the 9/11 Commission back in 2004." But even as House Democrats "try to burnish their image on ethics, they are being forced to work around the legal woes of their own members, including two in key positions." Rep. William Jefferson was reelected, but "Pelosi and the Democratic Steering Committee denied Mr. Jefferson his request to keep a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, pending the outcome of a federal investigation." Rep. Alan Mollohan (D) of West Virginia is also "facing a federal investigation over earmarks he sponsored and profitable real estate deals."

Congressional Page Board Chairman Wants Monthly Meetings. The AP (12/15, Thomas) reports the incoming chairman "of the congressional Page Board said Thursday he hopes the panel will meet monthly and expand its membership to help prevent another scandal." Democratic Rep. Dale Kildee, "who will become the panel's chairman when Democrats take control of the House next year, said the board should meet regularly with directors of the program's school and dormitory and those who supervise the students during their work in Congress." Kildee said, "I think it's a very, very good program and the problem with the program was not the pages — it was a member and those who should have been more vigilant when this thing broke." The AP adds Kildee said "he supports incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's call reform of the program. Pelosi said Monday she intends to introduce legislation early in the new Congress to increase oversight of the page program, require regular board meetings and add a parent of a current and a former page to the board."

Pelosi Says GOP To Get Only One Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills. The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones Newswires (12/15, Godfrey) reports incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi said House Republicans will "be given only one chance to amend or debate a plan to curb oil and gas subsidies and other Democratic priorities." Legislation "cutting subsidies to oil and gas producers is one of Democrats' top six priorities for their first 100 hours in power. Pelosi said Thursday that the oil and gas legislation along with bills cutting student loan interest rates and requiring the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for Medicare would not go through the normal legislative process." Normally, legislation is "subjected to hearings and then considered by the committees of jurisdiction before being brought to the House floor. Pelosi said Thursday that because the measures are well known and have been voted upon in the past, the bills would be brought directly to the House floor for a vote." Republicans would be "given only one chance to amend the bill through a procedural maneuver known as a motion to recommit, Pelosi said."

Republicans Failed To Enact Environmental Priorities In 109th Congress. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Boxall, 850K) reports, "If ever there was a Congress in which Republicans were positioned to remake the nation's environmental laws, it was the 109th. But by the time the session ended last week, the GOP's environmental agenda had been largely thwarted." Whether it "was rewriting the Endangered Species Act, opening up most of the nation's coastline to oil and gas drilling, or selling off public lands in the West, Republicans failed to enact a range of ambitious proposals." Though Republicans "came close to opening up Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, the goal eluded them."

Fitzgerald Doesn't Disclose If Cheney Is On Witness List For Libby Trial. The AP (12/15, Apuzzo) reports special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said "he does not expect any government officials to refuse to testify in the CIA leak trial, but he did not specifically say whether Vice President Dick Cheney or other top White House officials were on his witness list." Attorneys for Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, "meanwhile, told a judge that two unidentified reporters may resist testifying on Libby's behalf in the case. The attorneys predicted the issue would be resolved before trial, however." Cheney has "said he may be called as a witness. If so, prosecutors could ask how the White House responded to those criticisms. Cheney was upset by Wilson's comments, Fitzgerald has said, and told Libby that Plame worked for the CIA." That conversation is "a key to Fitzgerald's perjury case. Libby testified that he learned about Plame's job from a reporter." Cheney could "also help prosecutors undermine Libby's defense that he was so preoccupied with national security matters, he forgot details about the less-important Plame issue. Prosecutors argue that Plame was a key concern of the vice president, and thus would have been important to Libby." Government officials "and journalists will be the key witnesses in the trial, which is scheduled to begin next month. Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert are expected to be prosecution witnesses and Libby's lawyers said in court papers Thursday that several reporters will testify on Libby's behalf." Attorneys also said "they'd subpoenaed for the tape of Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward's interview with former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Armitage has admitted he discussed Plame's job with Woodward in 2003 but said it was a passing, inadvertent comment."

DOJ_NMG_0106532

Healthcare Bill Included Special Provisions Sought By Congressional Leaders. The New York Times (12/15, Pear, 1.16M) reports that by "slipping four sentences into a big bill passed last week, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert secured a major change in Medicare policy avidly sought by a few health insurers, in particular a multinational company with headquarters in his home state, Illinois." In the "final hours of the 109th Congress, the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, also got special treatment for a hospice in his state. The bill did not name the hospice, but specified the Medicare provider number for the intended beneficiary, the Nathan Adelson Hospice in rural Pahrump, Nev." Rep. Bill Thomas "inserted a provision earmarking $40 million for a valley fever vaccine sought by his constituents, while the Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, obtained tens of millions of dollars for hospitals in his state." The Times adds, "These examples illustrate how power is exercised in the final, chaotic hours before Congress adjourns. Obscure provisions of interest to just a few lawmakers were quietly stuffed into a grab bag of legislation, with no indication of their parentage or purpose."

Black Caucus Urges Democratic Leaders To Hire More Minorities. The Washington Times (12/15, DeBose, 88K) reports the Congressional Black Caucus "has asked Democratic leaders to hire more minorities to work for House committees and on lawmakers' staffs, saying the dearth of diversity on Capitol Hill is a problem." In a letter "to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and the leaders of the Democratic Steering Committee, the CBC said the party must increase the number of minorities working for committees and subcommittees, which will be controlled by Democrats." Outgoing CBC Chairman Melvin Watt said the "hiring of black, Hispanic, Asian and other minority staffers has 'been a major problem' for years," adding, "All you have to do is look at the composition of committees, subcommittees and leadership staffs." The Times adds, "Committee staffers who spoke with The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity said that fewer than 50 minorities are among the hundreds of committee staffers." That number "does not include staff members of the black, Hispanic or Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses."

Chertoff Says FEMA's Post-Katrina Reform Not Done. The AP (12/15, Lumpkin) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "delivered a backhanded slap Thursday at one of his agencies, saying it should not allow red tape to interfere with helping disaster victims." Chertoff, who "listed the Hurricane Katrina response as one of the 'transformative experiences' for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said there is 'a lot more work to do' even though FEMA has been 'retooled.'" Chertoff noted "there still are 'tens of thousands of people who suffer the lingering effects' of last year's hurricane." Chertoff said, "We have to make sure that FEMA does not become so enmeshed in its own bureaucratic processes sometimes that they lose sight of the need to have simple commonsense and humanity in dealing with the public."

Dow Reaches New Record High. ABC World News (12/14, story 8, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "On Wall Street, another record high. Strong, quarterly profits, reported today from investment banking companies and a drop in jobless claims boosted optimism. The Dow was up more than 99 points to close at 12,416. And on the NASDAQ, stocks were up 21 points [to close at 2,453.85]." NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 7, Williams, 9.87M) also noted "the Dow end of year rally soaring into new record territory." The Washington Post/AP (12/15, D5), USA Today and Wall Street Journal (12/15, C1, Browning, 2.04M), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Prices For Imported Goods Climb 0.2%. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, Bater, 2.04M) reports US import prices "rose for the first time in three months in November despite a drop in petroleum costs." Prices for "imported goods rose 0.2%, after falling 2.3% in October and 2.2% in September, the Labor Department said Thursday. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had expected November import prices would slip by 0.1%." In annual terms, "import prices increased 1.2% from November 2005, compared with the 6.4% a year earlier."

DOJ_NMG_0106533

OPEC Plans To Reduce Output Starting In February. The Financial Times (12/15, Crooks, Mahtani, Hoyos) reports OPEC "yesterday moved to reassert its power over oil prices by agreeing to cut production early next year in spite of rising concerns over tightening world crude markets." OPEC "ministers meeting in Abuja agreed to cut output by 500,000 barrels a day from February 1." In a statement, the cartel "said the cut was justified on the basis that there was 'more than ample crude supply, high stocks levels and increasing spare capacity' in the market."

The New York Times (12/15, Mouawad, 1.16M) adds that OPEC's planned 2 percent reduction in output is "the group's second production cut in two months and its strongest indication yet that it would seek to keep oil prices above $60 a barrel next year." OPEC "had already agreed to a 4 percent production cut in October to prop up prices." The group also "said Angola would join the group next year, becoming its first new member since 1975. Angola, Africa's fastest-growing oil exporter, is a powerful addition to OPEC."

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A2, Bahree, 2.04M) says OPEC's decision sends "a strong signal that it will try to prevent oil prices from sliding further." But "[t]he real impact of the cartel's latest output move on oil markets remains unclear. The big unknown is whether members of [OPEC] will actually implement the decision ... . Some OPEC officials say that will depend on demand in the next two months, the level of prices and the amount of oil held in inventories in major consumer countries." The Journal adds, "Oil prices rose yesterday, with light, sweet crude for January delivery up $1.14, or 1.9%, to $62.51 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange."

The Washington Post/Bloomberg (12/15, D4, Critchlow, Pals) reports OPEC "is attempting to revive prices that have slid about 21 percent from a July record of $78.40 a barrel in New York. The cuts take effect about seven weeks before the end of the Northern Hemisphere winter, when demand for heating fuels typically starts to decline."

Large Majorities Support Stricter Fuel-Efficiency Requirements. The Wall Street Journal's (12/15, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" column reports a poll's finding that "87% of Democrats, 76% of independents and 74% of Republicans back requirements for more fuel efficiency even if that raises auto prices. That complicates auto makers' ability to mount filibuster against bipartisan Senate bill, sponsored by Democrat Obama and Republican Lugar, to raise CAFE standards." But "[i]ndustry may have better luck in the House, where Democratic powers Dingell and Hoyer call CAFE outmoded; they back tax incentives for auto makers and buyers as an alternative."

Friedman Urges Bush To Return To "Green" Texas Roots. In his New York Times (12/15, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "Which politician launched the Texas wind industry? Answer: Former Gov., now President, George W. Bush." Friedman says he is baffled at "how the same man who initiated one of the most effective renewable energy programs in America, has presided over an administration that for six years has dragged its feet on alternative energy, used its regulatory powers to weaken efficiency standards for major appliances and stuck its head in the sand on global warming." Friedman writes that the only way for Bush to salvage his legacy "is to get back in touch with [his] green Texas roots and devote the rest of [his] term to REALLY ending America's oil addiction, liberating us from dependence on petro-authoritarian regimes and making America the leader in renewable energies that combat climate change."

Trade Agency Clears Way For Some Steel Import Tariffs To End. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, Hitt, Glader, Spector, 2.04M) reports, "Decisions that signal the end of many U.S. steel tariffs promise struggling auto makers a boost, and reflect a shift in the political and economic fortunes of these two pillars of the U.S. economy." Heavy-equipment makers "will also benefit from a separate ruling yesterday by the U.S. International Trade Commission that clears the way for tariffs to lapse on cut-to-length plate steel from 11 countries." The end to tariffs "on corrosion-resistant steel essential to car making from Australia, Canada, France and Japan will benefit auto makers. Tariffs remain in place for the same type of steel from Germany and South Korea." Domestic steelmakers, "which have long received favored treatment in Washington, were surprised by the ruling. In addition, they face several more ITC reviews in coming months on products such as hot-rolled steel product, pipe and tubular goods as well as concrete-reinforcing bar, which is used in construction. Some oil companies also are said to be lining up to lobby for an elimination of tariffs on pipe and tubular goods."

DOJ_NMG_0106534

Obama Not Interested In Being "Un-Hillary" Candidate. The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Pearson, 617K) reports that on the "cusp of a historic decision over whether to run for the White House, Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday that he believed he would be a 'viable candidate' for president who could move the nation beyond the generational politics that have defined the last 40 years." In a meeting with the Tribune editorial board, Obama said, "I wouldn't run if I didn't think I could win." The Tribune adds Obama "articulated a rationale for his potential candidacy, confidence in his ability to win and an assessment of potential opponents -- both Democrat and Republican." Obama said that he "would reveal his decision in January, following a two-week family vacation that returns him to his roots in Hawaii, setting an extraordinary arc for a politician who a little more than two years ago was a state senator toiling in Springfield." But Obama said "he viewed hype over his potential candidacy as 'transitory' and not something that would dictate his decision. He said he had no real concerns about his ability to put together a staff and raise the tens of millions of dollars he would need to wage a campaign against his potential opponents, including Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York." Asked for "his assessment of Clinton, Obama said, 'I think she'd be a capable president. She has gone through some battles that, in some cases unfairly, have created a perception about her that is different from how I am perceived.'" Obama said, "however, that he had no interest in being what he called 'the un-Hillary' -- a reference to serving as a standard bearer for Democrats looking for an alternative to Clinton." Speaking of "a potential match up with McCain, Obama said he was under no illusions how a GOP presidential campaign would be run against him. 'War hero against snot-nosed rookie,' Obama said."

CSMonitor Says Obama Not Ideology-Free. The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, 59K) notes in an editorial that Obama said "he's become a 'symbol' of voters' desire for 'something new.' Such self-deprecation could be sincere sentiment - or it could be skilled political rhetoric. It doesn't matter which, though, because the words of the junior senator from Illinois are true." People "don't know much about this Democratic fresh face; he's too inexperienced to have a long political track record. But they're obviously responding positively to what he symbolizes: a call to reach across the partisan and ideological divide in America." But it's "not as if Obama is stripped of ideology. He's pro-choice, pro-affirmative action, and supports 'universal' health care - traditional Democratic causes. The National Journal, a nonpartisan publication, gave him an 82.5 liberalism rating, higher than Sen. Clinton (79.8)."

Commission Calls For Major Changes To US Education System. Yesterday's report by the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce received widespread, mostly positive, newspaper coverage but little TV coverage. Most stories mentioned proposals to test tenth-graders for college readiness, to offer universal pre-kindergarten and to raise teacher salaries. The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 10, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Forget No Child Left Behind; a lot of our children are being left behind by students in other nations." The commission "blames sub-par schools, and it's calling for a major course correction." CBS (Assuras) added, the report proposes "a radical overhaul to stream all students to college" and "schools could be run by groups of teachers or private companies. All four-year-olds and all low-income three-year-olds would enroll in universal pre-K, and high school students should be prepared to pass college-level board exams by age 16."

The AP (12/15, Zuckerbrod) focused on proposals for giving exams to tenth graders to determine whether they would "go on to community college or stay in school and study for more advanced tests that could earn them a place at a four-year college;" increasing teacher pay; and placing "independent contractors in charge of operating schools."

The New York Times (12/15, Herszenhorn, 1.16M) called it "a far-reaching redesign of the United States education system that would include having schools operated by independent contractors and giving states, rather than local districts, control over school financing." The commission was noted for having "two former federal education secretaries…two former labor secretaries…and an array of other luminaries." It "rethinks American schooling from top to bottom" and "was quickly hailed by some as a potentially groundbreaking document." But "the national teachers' unions were apprehensive."

DOJ_NMG_0106535

The Washington Post (12/15, A11, Haynes, 690K) reports the commission "proposed dramatic changes that would shake up American public education in an effort to make the nation more competitive globally" at an estimated cost of "about $60 billion." The Post identified "the most controversial recommendations" as "empowering school districts to sign contracts with companies and teachers to run the schools…and forcing teachers to give up pensions in exchange for large pay increases." The Post also noted that the commission was "funded by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation and the Lumina Foundation for Education."

The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Olszewski, Rado, 617K) says the recommendations would "end America's four-year high school and replace it with a more European-style model." But "unlike in Europe…teens would be encouraged to retake the exam to be developed by each state until they pass it."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Paulson, 59K) reports that the commission warns that "many Americans are in danger of falling behind and seeing their standard of living plummet." It described major proposals while mentioning that they are "likely to encounter opposition."

Miller, Kennedy To Consider Proposals. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A4, Tomsho, 2.04M) reports the commission argues that "to preserve its living standard, the U.S. must undertake a radical overhaul of its education system." CA7 Rep. George Miller, incoming chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee, said that "some" of the proposals "should get serious attention in the next Congress." The report "also sparked immediate opposition" from "some educators" and "major teacher unions."

Bloomberg (12/15, Basken) reports, "The Gates Foundation and other sponsoring groups may pay states to help implement it." The report "faces opposition from teacher unions." But "congressional leaders from both parties, including the incoming Democratic chairman of the House and Senate education committees, Representative George Miller of California and Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, also praised the ambitiousness of the recommendations and promised to consider them." U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings "hasn't yet studied the report."

DARPA's Neuroscience Research Seen As Cause For Concern. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, Begley, 2.04M) reports the Pentagon's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or Darpa, as "part of its mission to maintain U.S. military superiority 'by sponsoring revolutionary, high-payoff research,' the agency has expanded into neuroscience. Can the folks who brought you the Internet also bring you ways to look into brains -- and do you want them to?" Darpa has "good reason to fund neuroscience. Discoveries and new technologies such as noninvasive imaging to detect what the mind is doing might help analysts, pilots and grunts process and react better to barrages of data, and allow real-time assessment of head injuries on the battlefield. Brain-computer interfaces in which thoughts are electronically translated into signals that operate a computer or prosthetic limb might improve rehab for soldiers suffering grievous injuries." But as with "other 'dual use' technologies, however, the findings and gizmos born of Darpa's brain research may well find their way into civilian life, and in ways that trouble some ethicists." Jonathan Moreno of the University of Virginia, a former adviser on biodefense to the Department of Homeland Security, said, "There are reasons to be concerned about what uses these discoveries might be put to."

OTHER NEWS:

Local Elections Test Of Support For Ahmadinejad. The AP (12/15, Karimi) reports local elections to be held in Iran today are "expected to be a first test of support for hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad since he took office more than a year ago." Ahmadinejad "could face dissatisfaction among conservatives, some of whom feel he has been too caught up in confrontations with the West and has failed to deal with Iran's struggling economy." Meanwhile, reformers are "hoping the vote will show popular support on which to rebuild." However, participation in that vote was expected to be low "since there is very little difference among the candidates, who are carefully selected by Guardian Council, an election watchdog controlled by hard-liners."

NYTimes Says Holocaust Conference Is Reminder Rogues Should Not Be Underestimated. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/15, 1.16M) says this week's conference in Iran "of Holocaust deniers and racists was, predictably, a circus of Holocaust denial and racism argued by discredited scholars and even the former Ku Klux Klan leader, David Duke. But one should never underestimate the political power of these vicious ideas, even among supposedly respectable people across the Middle East and beyond." The Times notes that Ahmadinejad's claim that the Holocaust is "a myth ginned up to justify the creation of the state of Israel" is "frightening enough," but "couple that with his calls to wipe Israel off the map and his government's -- so far unrestrained -- drive to develop the technology needed to build a nuclear weapon, and you have even more reasons to keep yourself up at night."

DOJ_NMG_0106536

Israel Bars Haniya From Entering Gaza With Cash. The New York Times (12/15, A3, Myre, 1.16M) reports in "a bizarre standoff that lasted more than seven hours on Thursday," Israel barred Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya from returning home to the Gaza Strip, "saying he was carrying tens of millions of dollars in cash that could be used for terrorist attacks." Haniya was finally allowed to cross from Egypt into the southern Gaza Strip late Thursday night, "but only after leaving the money with Hamas officials who stayed behind in Egypt." During his "lengthy wait," angry members of his Hamas party "shot up the Rafah border terminal, clashing first with Palestinian security forces on one side of the border and later with Egyptian security officials on the other side." It was not clear how much money Haniya was carrying, though the Israeli news media estimated it "at $35 million and said it had been packed in suitcases."

The Washington Post (12/15, A28, Wilson, 690K) notes the US has "threatened sanctions against any country or group that uses bank transfers to send money to Hamas," so officials have "resorted to carrying cash into Gaza in suitcases, a financing method that has embarrassed Israeli officials who hope the boycott weakens the movement and brings a change in the Palestinian government." The Financial Times (12/15, Devi) reports Haniya was "carrying $35 million in cash, believed to be part of the $350 million he raised during a regional tour that took in Iran, Syria and Qatar."

The AP (12/15, Barzak) says Thursday's "unrest was likely to strain the US-brokered deal that turned over control of the crossing to the Palestinians" last year.

Israeli Court Sanctions Targeted Killings. The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Greenberg, 617K) reports, "Sanctioning one of the most controversial tactics used by Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians, the Israeli Supreme Court on Thursday upheld the army's policy of targeted killing of militants but said the legality of each attack had to be determined case-by-case." The court "declined to issue a blanket ban on the practice, frequently used by the Israelis during six years of fighting with the Palestinians. Some human-rights groups have called the tactic execution without trial and a violation of international law." The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Wilson, 690K) says "the unanimous decision departs little from guidelines the military says it already follows in carrying out 'targeted killings,'" but "it does say commanders should allow an independent investigation to follow each assassination and recommends that the military compensate 'innocent civilians' harmed in the operation."

Lebanon's Shiites Question Hezbollah's Control. The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Blanford, 59K) reports this month's protests in Beirut are "the most visible evidence" that Hezbollah is "now the undisputed representative of the country's Shiite community. Yet some of the party's coreligionists have started to publicly question Hezbollah's political monopoly," expressing concerns that "its ambitious gambit to topple the Western-backed government is intended to benefit backers in Iran and Syria and will be detrimental to the long-term interests of Shiites." Although Shiite "voices of dissent are few," the "are gaining more attention at a time when Lebanon is serving as a battleground in the emerging struggle between Iran and its regional allies…and the Sunni-dominated Arab world led by Saudi Arabia and Egypt."

LATimes Urges US To Stay Out Of Lebanese Politics. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, 850K) editorializes, "Two weeks ago, nobody was giving odds that Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government would survive the year." However, today "Siniora doesn't look much stronger, but his government is still in business, and the protesters have little to show for their efforts." The Times notes that "while Siniora's opponents attempt to dismiss him as a US puppet," it is "imperative" that the US not "make the mistake of sacrificing a shaky but functional democracy for token gestures at assistance in Iraq" as "consensus is beginning to form around the idea that negotiations with Syria are necessary."

DOJ_NMG_0106537

Survey Shows "Sharp" Decline In US Standing In Mideast. The Washington Times (12/15, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports attitudes about the US have "deteriorated sharply" in the Middle East in the past two years, according to a new survey of five countries in the region. The survey -- conducted in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco, Jordan and Lebanon -- "without exception" found "a strong majority expressed unfavorable opinions of the United States" with the lowest level in Jordan, where only 5 percent said they had a favorable view of the US. Survey respondents "tend to distinguish between US policy and the American people, but that distinction appears to have eroded in the past four years," according to James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, for whom the survey was conducted. Zogby, who said he "first noticed a distinct shift in 2004," cautioned that in order for the US to accomplish its goals in the region "you need regional support."

Congress, Government Agencies Learning More About Islamic Culture. Separately, the Christian Science Monitor (12/15, MacDonald, 59K) reports that while "some in Congress may need a primer on Islamic extremists…other American institutions are already boning up -- especially when they have a stake in doing so." For example, the FBI "will emphasize Muslim culture when it expands introductory training for new agents from 18 to 21 weeks next month." However, "certain key sectors of US society also display a dangerous ignorance," Muslim advocates say, and "topping the list this month" is Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D) of Texas, the incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee," who in an interview with Congressional Quarterly last week "could identify the historic Sunni-Shiite split but didn't know that Al Qaeda is Sunni or that Hezbollah…is Shiite."

Propaganda Puts Pyongyang's Commitment To Talks In Question. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A8, Ramstad, 2.04M) reports North Korean "propaganda" is "putting a renewed focus on pride in the country's new nuclear capability, a sign that suggests disarmament talks next week will make little progress, Pyongyang watchers say." Brian Myers, a specialist in North Korean propaganda based in Seoul, said during the pate month, signs appeared on the streets of Pyongyang with slogans such as "Revel in the pride of being a country in the Nuclear Club," which he calls "a sign that nuclear capability has become a tool for the government to galvanize support at a time when the country is suffering food shortages and economic decay." Myers, who is "sometimes consulted by US diplomats and military officials for his observations on North Korea," told the Journal, "You really have to admire these State Department people who do these negotiations and go through these grueling talks for days and weeks -- They haven't given up on them."

Similarly, McClatchy (12/15, Johnson) says Pyongyang is "digging in its heels before crucial nuclear talks rev up Monday, raising questions over whether it wants to buy time or is ready to negotiate in earnest." The "blustery talk" from Pyongyang "may be designed to bolster a negotiating position for the talks."

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Magnier, 850K) says that North Korea "has an interest in avoiding a quick resolution," noting that "the longer it keeps the program intact, the more likely the world is to accept its status as a member of the nuclear club, as Pakistan and India discovered." Also by "extending talks beyond the 2008 US elections," it "could bring it a new negotiating partner, in the form of a new administration, that it might find easier to deal with."

Meanwhile, AFP (12/15) reports Pyongyang "may stage a second nuclear weapons test to strengthen its hand during upcoming negotiations on scrapping its nuclear program," South Korea's new defense minister warned. As a result, Kim Jang-Soo "ordered the 650,000-strong military to step up combat-readiness to deter possible aggression from the North."

Rice Announces $1 Million Fund To Assist Human Rights Activists. The AP (12/15) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday announced the State Department has established a $1 million emergency fund "to help cover such expenses as legal fees and medical bills for human rights activists." The department also "redefined US goals and expectations for international treatment of independent groups that promote democracy and human rights" in a 10-point statement of principles on NGOs. However, in "a slap at Russia, one principle says governments seeking to regulate the groups should aim to protect, not impede, their work." Russia was "not mentioned in literature the department handed out Thursday nor in Rice's brief remarks, but the United States has been concerned about a law passed this year that requires groups such as Amnesty International to register with the government."

The Washington Times (12/15, Kralev, 88K) notes that Rice also announced that, beginning next year, she will

DOJ_NMG_0106538

"bestow a Freedom Defenders Award on a foreign activist or nongovernmental organization and a Diplomacy for Freedom Award" on a US ambassador for "working to end tyranny and promote democracy."

Pentagon Seeks Creation Of New African Command. The AP (12/15, Jelinek) reports the Pentagon is recommending the creation of a new US military command for Africa," which is seen as having greater strategic importance to America since the start of the fight against terrorism." Officials say Africa also is "strategically more important because of increased efforts by China to involve itself and gain influence on the continent." Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said a proposal has been sent to President Bush.

Egypt Arrests Opposition Leader After University Protest. The New York Times (12/15, A9, El-Naggar, 1.16M) reports Egypt Thursday arrested several leading members of the Muslim Brotherhood and more than 140 student members after a campus protest, saying the group "had formed what amounted to militant squads" that planned "acts of unrest." In a statement, Interior Ministry officials charged that the brotherhood had created what it called "deterrence committees," which were "trained in the arts of combat and provided with knives, sticks and chains, and appointed to start holding strikes and demonstrations and acts of unrest in the university."

Britain Abandons BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe. The Financial Times (12/15, A1, Adams, Boxell) reports on its front page that Britain was accused Thursday night of "caving in to intense pressure from Saudi Arabia" after Tony Blair's government intervened to end a Serious Fraud Office inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE Systems. The SFO's decision to abandon its investigation into the Al Yamamah oil-for-arms contracts "came under fierce attack from opposition peers and leading international lawyers." The decision was announced by Lord Goldsmith, the attorney-general, "on a day when the UK government appeared determined to rush out all its controversial news under the cover of the publication of a long-awaited police investigation into the death" of Princess Diana. The abandonment of the inquiry is "expected to save a multibillion-pound jet fighter contract with Riyadh and safeguard thousands of jobs."

King Abdullah's Son Rumored To Be Next Saudi Ambassador. The Washington Post's (12/15, A33) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "another name has emerged as a strong contender to become the next Saudi ambassador here" -- Mishal bin Abdullah, son of the Saudi king, who now serves at the United Nations in New York.

Bush Holds Malaria Summit. AFP (12/15, Knox) reports, "US President George W. Bush designated eight African countries as new beneficiaries of US aid to battle malaria, which kills one million people annually around the world." Bush added "Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali and Zambia to his five-year, 1.2-billion-dollar President's Malaria Initiative (PMI) for Africa, bringing to 15 the number of countries covered." Bush, "speaking to US and African activists, civic leaders and government officials at a White House summit on the killer mosquito-borne disease, also proposed doubling US development aid to Africa by the end of the decade. 'This administration has doubled development aid to Africa during my presidency -- and I propose to double it again by the end of this decade,' he said." Also at the summit, First Lady Laura Bush "unveiled a 30-million-dollar plan to help African communities battle malaria by funding non-governmental organizations and civic and religious groups battling the disease."

The New York Times (12/15, Dugger, 1.16M) reports, "The top leaders of all the main malaria-fighting organizations -- from the World Health Organization to the World Bank, from the United States Agency for International Development to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to Unicef -- were at the forum, which the Bush administration titled the White House Summit on Malaria. They met for hours after the public session to plot strategy." Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, "a Vermont Democrat expected to lead the Senate appropriations subcommittee that oversees foreign aid, was at the forum and said he wanted to find a way to finance the administration's malaria program. 'We're trying to get the kind of money we spend in a day in Iraq,' he said. 'Somewhere we've got to have our priorities right. It's a moral issue.'"

The Washington Times (12/15, Carter, 88K) quotes Bush saying, "It is possible to eliminate malaria. … We know exactly what it will take to prevent and treat the disease. ... It is not going to require a miracle. It requires smart, sustained effort."

DOJ_NMG_0106539

On Fox News (12/14, MacCallum), First Lady Laura Bush discussed the problems she has seen firsthand in Africa. Mrs. Bush said, "They face many problems that developing countries face. And certainly pandemic disease is one of the worst things. Because of pandemic disease, schools don't have teachers because teachers have died, the economy is flat because workers aren't able to work because they're sick. And there are a lot of things that if we can eradicate diseases, like malaria, will help these countries in their development, in their economic development. And since malaria can be eradicated, all of us need to work together to make sure we do it."

US, Chinese Officials At Odds Over Yuan. The Washington Post (12/15, D1, Cha, 690K) reports, "US and Chinese leaders clashed publicly on the opening day of strategic economic talks, with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. pushing China to revalue its currency and Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi saying Americans do not have a full understanding of the situation. After standing by as US officials criticized her country's economic policies in the media during the past week, Wu set the tone for the meeting with assertive introductory remarks that spanned 20 typed pages and 5,000 years of Chinese history." Paulson "was equally aggressive in his follow-up speech, saying that the U.S. government's "strong view" is that China should allow its currency, the yuan, to be more flexible."

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A2, Phillips, Batson, 2.04M) reports, "In the Great Hall of the People, under a painting of Chairman Mao Zedong and other revolutionary heroes, Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi gave Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and his delegation a history lesson about her country's struggles with poverty and foreign interference. American misconceptions about the Asian country aren't 'conducive' to good relations, she said as she opened two days of talks yesterday, according to the written text of the speech." Wu "reiterated longstanding Chinese complaints that foreign critics fail to grasp the extent of her country's huge economic and social challenges, from profound poverty to the waves of rural residents pouring into cities."

Ban Ki-moon Pledges Stronger Ties With US As New UN Chief. NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 6, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There has been a big change at the top at the United Nations here in New York. A South Korean, Ban Ki-Moon has been sworn in as the eighth secretary general in the history of the UN. He is the first Asian to lead the UN in 35 years. He replaces Kofi Annan who steps down at the end of this month after 10 years on the job."

The New York Times (12/15, A5, Hoge, 1.16M) reports that addressing the General Assembly hall after taking the oath, Ban "heaped praise" on Annan, "but in a subsequent news conference, he distanced himself from Mr. Annan's plea Monday that the United States return to a more multilateral foreign policy grounded in respect for international law." However, Ban acknowledged that the relationship between the United Nations and the United States had become "strained," but said that "in such a case it is very important to discuss, to resolve the difference of opinions, and I, as secretary general, will try to harmonize so that we can expect constructive contribution and participation of the United States." The AP (12/15, Lederer), AFP (12/15, Aziakou), Loa Angeles Times (12/15, Farley), Washington Post (12/15, A27, Lynch, 690K) and Washington Times (12/15, Pisik, 88K) also report the story.

Negroponte Says Castro Near Death. In an interview with the Washington Post (12/15, A23, DeYoung, 690K), Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte said Cuban President Fidel Castro is "very ill" and will not be alive "much longer...months, not years." Meanwhile, the Post notes that in a brief speech earlier this month, Raul Castro said Cuba is willing to open negotiations with the United States "to settle the long US-Cuba disagreement," but Assistant Secretary Shannon rejected that offer this week, telling reporters that the Bush administration will deal with Cuba "only when it shows a commitment to democracy."

Embargo Opponents Hope Democratic Congress Will Ease Restriction. McClatchy (12/15, Bachelet) reports the "Democrats' capture of Congress and Cuban leader Fidel Castro's illness have dramatically altered the battle lines over Cuba policy and given new hope to opponents of US sanctions." Congressional interest in Cuba is "growing" with six Democrats and four Republicans signing up for a trip Friday to Havana organized by the House International Relations Committee. However, "few observers expect Congress to end the trade embargo on Cuba anytime soon."

Cuba Vows To Defy US Reform Efforts. The AP (12/15, Arrington) reports Cuba "vowed to defy US efforts for economic and political change" in a front-page editorial Thursday in the Communist Party's newspaper, saying the US government "should not fool themselves." The newspaper also "criticized the American diplomatic mission in Havana for distributing books, medicine, clothes and shortwave radios to Cubans," saying the US Interests Section "acts like the central barracks of the counterrevolution."

DOJ_NMG_0106540

Poll Finds 1 In 4 Cubans Satisfied With Level Of Freedom. The AP (12/15, Klug) reports a new Gallup Poll released Thursday found "about one-quarter of Cubans interviewed in the island's two biggest cities are satisfied with their freedom to choose what they do with their lives." When asked about the job performance of Cuba's leaders, "about 40 percent of those surveyed said they disapproved." Gallup conducted the survey only in two cities" because of the difficulty in getting around the island" and cautioned that the results are "not meant to be representative of Cuba's more than 11 million citizens."

Lugovoi Denies Role In Poison Plot. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A1, Cullison, 2.04M) reports on its front page that former Russian spy Andrei Lugovoi, who now finds himself at the center of the investigation in the death of Alexander Litvinenko, is "deeply offended by suggestions that he helped kill Mr. Litvinenko." In a series of recent interviews with the Journal, Lugovoi "said he is now undergoing tests for radiation poisoning" himself and calls the allegations "nonsense." He insists that his business "required him to travel to London more than a dozen times this year," during which he would visit with Litvinenko, "who at one time worked as a bodyguard for the tycoon." Although Scotland Yard detectives "have not been allowed to directly question" Lugovoi, he "says he spoke to Russian investigators for three hours, however, in the presence of British detectives," and has "waived his right to a lawyer, saying he's a victim, not a perpetrator."

Columnist Calls Chavez Victory An "Assault" On Democracy. Wall Street Journal (12/15, A21, 2.04M) columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "has for eight years been heading a devoutly anti-American government and he is widely considered the region's heir apparent to Fidel. But be prepared for the Venezuelan bad boy to become even more menacing to the US now" that he has won "legitimacy" by going "through an electoral exercise." O'Grady calls his election an "assault on Venezuelan democracy," saying the country is "not a democracy by any definition and Mr. Chávez is sure to be a thorn in the side of democrats for years to come. But legitimizing his abuse of power, in face of all the evidence, only makes things worse."

Proliferation Expert Criticizes US Nuclear Policy. Hnery Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/15, A20, 2.04M) that the Bush administration "has condoned or backed nuclear expansion in India, China, Brazil, Argentina, South Africa, Ukraine, France, Britain, Japan and Australia. Because of this and previous US winking at the nuclear fuel-making activities of key US allies, our own State Department's lawyers now eagerly insist that all nations have a right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) to make nuclear power and fuel. All that's required, they say, is that states claim their activities have some conceivable civilian application and open them to occasional international visits." Sokolski says the "risk of pursuing such egregious policies is obvious: A world full of nuclear fuel-making states, claiming they are on the right side of the NPT, only days or weeks from having bombs."

WPost Welcomes Calderon's Early Actions As President. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/15, A34, 690K) says that "when Felipe Calderon took office as Mexican president two weeks ago, the dominant question was whether he would be able to govern the country." However, the Post says Calderon has "opened his presidency with aggressiveness and skill," and "so far…has accompanied his law-and-order campaign with populist gestures: He slashed his own salary and the presidential budget and adopted some of the social spending measures championed by Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the failed presidential candidate who now seeks to destroy Mexico's democracy."

Congress Urged To Grant Treaty Approval By Two-Thirds Majority. Former State Dept. officials David Kaye and K. Russell LaMotte and illustrator Peter Hoey write in the New York Times (12/15, Kaye, Lamotte, Hoey, 1.16M) that the Democratic Congress can "help reverse the steep erosion of America's standing abroad, particularly the impression that the United States has disengaged from global problem-solving," by making "an impact in one significant area: by giving the required two-thirds majority vote to approve a raft of treaties awaiting action." The Senate, they note, now has before it "more than two dozen treaties submitted for approval by President Bush and his predecessors — some, in fact, were negotiated as long ago as the Eisenhower administration." Approving treaties "from this list," they argue, would "make a "good start" in "repair[ing] America's image now, even while the Democratic Congress and the White House battle over the future of Iraq policy."

DOJ_NMG_0106541

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Skid Row Scams Cost Taxpayers Millions."
"His Atlantic Records Shaped Pop Music."
"Believing Is Seeing."
"Senate Looks Out For Its Own."
"Breast Cancer Rates Fall."
"Army Is Stretched Too Thin."

USA Today:
"Malformation Caused Johnson's Bleeding."
"Gift Of Wreaths Touches Nation."
"Troops To Get Safer Garb."

New York Times:
"Reversing Trend, Big Drop Is Seen In Breast Cancer."
"U.S. Is Dropping Effort To Track If Visitors Leave."
"Legislators Vote For Gay Unions In New Jersey."
"From Head Scarf To Army Cap, Making A New Life."
"The Final Word On Diana's Death (Don't Bet on It)."
"Ill Senator Is Called Responsive."

Washington Post:
"Top U.S. General Says Army Will Need To Grow."
"Rice Says U.S. Won't Engage Iran, Syria."
"Some Metro Riders May Reach For Car Keys."
"Democratic Sen. Johnson In Stable Condition After Brain Surgery."
"Israeli High Court Backs Military On Its Policy Of 'Targeted Killings'."
"Kaine To Seek $500 Million In Bid To Alleviate Va.'s Traffic Ills."

Washington Times:
"'03 Sees Fall In Breast Cancer Rate."
"Minority Hiring On Hill Pushed."
"New York City Braces For Construction Chaos."
"Johnson 'Critical' After Surgery."
"Hanukkah Festivity Joins Methodist, Jewish Group."
"Israel Lets Haniyeh But Not The $35 Million."
"Computer-Free E-Mailing Attracts Low-Tech Seniors."

Detroit Free Press:
"Detroit Schools Dump 3 Tech Deals."
"Parties Aim For Primary In 2008."
"Hospitals Chase Down Million-Dollar Donors."
"Sales Rock For Instrument Of Tiger's Injury."
"US Breast Cancer Rates Fall Sharply."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Breats Cancer Decline A Shock."
"Flight Of Fancy."
"Democrats Forge Ahead As Senator Convalesces."
"Folks Wiped Off State Map Take Offense."

Houston Chronicle:
"Breast Cancer Rate Dropped With halt In Hormone Use."
"Catching Up With Tradition."
"State Discounts TAKS Cheating."
"After Tough, Inmate Is Cleared For Release."
"Close Door, Have A Seat, Pop A Cola."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing; Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing-Analysis; Senator Johnson Critical Condition; Senator Johnson Condition-Analysis; Creating A Larger Army; Living In Baghdad; Missing Climbers-Oregon; Stock Market; Princess Diana Investigation; Ahmed Urdigan Obit; Honoring The Veterans.
CBS: Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing; Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing-Analysis; Senator Johnson Critical Condition; Arteriovenous Malformation-Analysis; Senate Balance Of Power; Missing Climbers-Oregon; Creating A Larger Army; Hussein Capture 3 Year Anniversary; Iraq Deadly Place; Education Reform; Ahmed Urdigan Obit; College Students Finding God.
NBC: Breast Cancer Cases Decreases; Senator Johnson Critical Condition; Arteriorvenous Malformation-Analysis; Creating A Larger Army; Laura Bush's Interview; New UN Secretary General; Stock Market; Princess Diana Investigation; Climate Change; Missing Climbers-Oregon; Honoring Our Veterans;

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

DOJ_NMG_0106542

PRESIDENT BUSH — President and Mrs. Bush participate in a Ceremony for 2006 Recipients of the Presidential Medal of Freedom, East Room, The White House; participates in Armed Forces Full Honor Review in Honor of the Secretary of Defense, the Pentagon; participates in reception for the diplomatic corps, State Department; President and Mrs. Bush participate in Holiday Reception for the Diplomatic Corps, United States Department of State.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MEDICAL CARE _ 9:30 a.m. - 5 p.m. Brookings Institution holds a conference on the problem and potential solutions involving medical care, including antitrust rules. Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Session on changing technology, physician cuylture and variations in treatment, with Thomas Lee of Harvard Medical School, Elliott Fisher of Dartmount Medical School and Steven Shortell of the School of Public Health University of California, Berkeley. 11 a.m. Session on systemic reorganization, with James Mongan of Partners HealthCare Sytems, Denis Cortese of Mayo Clinic, and Jonathan Perlin of HCA. 12:45 p.m. Luncheon address - Leonard Schaeffer, CEO, North Bristol Partners. Keynote address - Mark McClellan. 3 p.m. Session on tools for change, with Katherine Baicker, member, Council of Economic Advisers, others. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PENTAGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9 a.m. Army Col. David Sutherland, commander of 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, will brief live from Iraq to give an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

PUBLIC DIPLOMACY _ 9:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies and Business for Diplomatic Action hold a forum with Harris Diamond of Weber Shandwick, Gary Knell of Sesame Workshop, others. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

RX DRUG ADHERENCE _ 9:30 a.m. The National Community Pharmacists Association, in partnership with Pharmacists for the Protection of Patient Care, hold a press briefing to release of new national survey on consumers' behaviors relating to prescription medication. The survey reveals that three-fourths of patients have not taken their prescriptions as directed. Location: National Press Club, Murrow Room.

CONGRESS _ 10 a.m. New York University, The Brookings Institution and RAND Corp. hold a conference on Congress' institutional barriers toward legislating for the future. Participants include former Sen. Tom Daschle, former Rep. Bill Frenzel, Paul Light of NYU, Sarah Binder of Brookings, James Dewar of RAND, and Calvin Mackenzie of Colby College. Location: Brookings Institution, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

ENERGY INITIATIVE _ 10 a.m. Former Sen. John Breaux and past US Conference of Mayors President Beverly O'Neill hold a news conference to announce a coalition of energy consumer and producer groups committed to finding new solutions to the nation's energy challenges. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

ENERGY-NRC _ 10 a.m. Energy Daily, others, hold a media breakfast with NRC Chairman Dale Klein. Location: National Press Club.

UNIONS-GOODYEAR _ 10:30 a.m. AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and USW President Leo Gerard hold a telephone briefing to discuss the ongoing strike at Goodyear. Contacts: Steve Smith, 202-637-5142.

RAILROADS-HAZARDOUS MATERIALS _ 11:15 a.m. Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and TSA Deputy Administrator Robert Jamison hold a press conference on a new rail security package targeting high risk hazardous materials in transit. Location: TSA Headquarters, East Building, Town Hall, 601 S. 12th St., Arlington, Va.

ISG _ 12 p.m. The Middle East Institute holds a panel discussion on inside perspectives on the Iraq Study Group, with Amb. David Mack, Paul Hughes and James Placke, all of whom were part of the ISG's Expert Working Group structure. Location: 1761 N St. NW.

HEALTH CARE _ 12:15 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform sponsor a briefing on the Medicare P4P provider demonstration projects, with Robert Berenson of the Urban Institute, Robert Galvin of General Electric, Alan Nelson of the American College of physicians, others. Location: Columbus Club, Union Station.

IRAN _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Center for American Progress hosts a forum, "The Coming Crisis with Iran: A Conversation About Political, Diplomatic, and Miltary Options." Featured Panelists: Thomas Pickering, U.S. Representative to the United Nations, 1989-1992, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, 1997-2001; and Flynt Leverett, Senior Fellow, New America Foundation; Sam Gardiner, Colonel, United States Air Force (retired) The event will be moderated by Joe Cirincione, Senior Vice President, Center for American Progress. Jeffrey Laurenti, Senior Fellow, The Century Foundation, will preside. The following expert white papers will be released: Gareth Smyth, Iranian Politics and Nuclear Confrontation; Barry Posen, A Nuclear Iran: A Difficult but not Impossible Policy Problem; Flynt Leverett, Dealing with Tehran: Assessing U.S. Diplomatic Options; Bruce Jentleson, Sanctions Against Iran: Key Issues; and Sam Gardiner, The End of the Summer of Diplomacy. Location: Center for American Progress, 1333 H St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0106543

RUMSFELD _ 1:15 p.m. Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld will be honored at an armed forces full honor parade. President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, Marine Corps, will attend. Location: Mall Entrance Parade Field, Pentagon.

MALARIA _ 2:30 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. Bonnie McElveen-Hunter, chairman of the American Red Cross, along with the US Agency for International Development and the US Department of State, hosts a meeting of key players in the fight against malaria and will be available for interviews. Location: American Red Cross Board of Governors Hall, 430 17th St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Warns Blind Sheik's Death Could Prompt Terror Attacks..... 3
US Bioterror Threat Seen As Real, Increasing 3
LATimes Criticizes Lawmakers For Selective Criticism Of Dubai Ports Company 3

Homeland Response:

Pelosi Calls For New Panel To Probe Intelligence Budget..... 4
Pelosi Says Democrats Will Propose 100 Percent Screening Of Cargo 4
Chertoff Backs Wiretapping Program 4
Chertoff Defends Real ID 5
DHS To Announce Rail Security Proposal 5
DHS Said To Be Suspending Plans For Exit-Monitoring System.. 5
Industry Associations Oppose DHS Traveler Assessment System 6
NYTimes, WPost Criticize Administration For ACLU Subpoena ... 6
DC Area Said To Be Unprepared For Disaster 6

War News:

Bush's Iraq Strategy Expected To Include Boost In Troop Levels 6
Schoomaker Says Wars Putting Dangerous Strain On Army 8
Rice Rejects Idea Of Talks With Iran, Syria..... 9
Odierno Takes Charge Of US Troops In Baghdad..... 11
Caldwell Says US Making Progress In Training Iraqi Army..... 11
White House Defends Release Of Enemy Body Count 11
First Lady Criticizes Media Coverage Of Iraq 11
US Troops In Iraq, Afghanistan To Get Flame-Resistant Uniforms..... 11
Ethnic, Sectarian Divisions Are Barrier To Critical Oil Law Provision 12
Baghdad Kidnappings Said To Reflect Growing Lawlessness.... 12
Saddam's Capture Failed To Be Turning Point 12
Accused Iraqi Expatriate Feels Deserted By US 13
Female Muslim Translator Profiled For Her Service In US Military..... 13
Suicide Bomber Attacks Shopping Area Of Afghan Town 13
Negroponte Says Pakistan Must Deal With Tribal Leaders..... 13
Arlington Wreath Laying Effort Attracts Wide Following 13
Bush Error At Press Conference Noted..... 14

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Travel Time Legislation Sent To Bush 14
US Attorney McKay To Resign 14

Corporate Scandals:

Sycamore Networks Says It Has Not Fully Complied With DOJ, SEC Subpoenas 14
Dell Delays Filing Of Quarterly Report..... 14
SEC Probes Coherent's Options Practices 14
Apollo Group Says Ex-Officers Backdated 14
SEC Loosens Interpretation Of Sarbanes-Oxley Auditing Requirements..... 15
Wall Street Executives Reap Big Paychecks..... 15

Criminal Law:

DOJ Launches Criminal Probe Of Federal Oil, Gas Royalties Collection 15
Duke Lacrosse Defense Team Says Accuser Misidentified Accused 16
Judge Sets April Trial Date For Jeffs 16
Los Angeles Skid Row Fertile Ground For Fraud..... 16
Business Software Alliance Pirated Software "Bounty Program" To Expire..... 16
Chinese-Canadian Engineer Charged With Stealing Military Trade Secrets 16
Stora Enso Denies Price-Fixing Charges 17

Civil Rights:

DOJ Says Dallas County Jail Violates Inmates' Rights 17
Report Says Los Angeles County Hate Crimes On The Rise 17
New Jersey Legislature Approves Civil Unions Bill 17
Number Of Death Sentences Falls 18

Antitrust:

DOJ Rebuts Reback On Telecom Mergers 18
Airline Merger Talk May Be Mostly Hype..... 19
Antitrust Waiting Period Expires On Merck-Sirna Deal 19
US, European Firms To Buy Stake In German Broadcaster..... 19
Hearst Expects To Complete Newspaper Acquisition Today..... 19
Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard 19
Bond Market Antitrust Probe Could Spawn More Suits..... 19
Samsung, LCD Makers Could Face Massive Antitrust Penalties 20
Japan Returns To International Acquisitions Scene 20

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Interior Department Approves Mohawk Casino Project..... 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Arrests College Student Over Pipe Bombs..... 20
FBI Honors Philly Labor Leader With Director's Community Leadership Award..... 20
Boston Columnist Calls FBI Fighting Of Civil Suit "A Disgrace." . 20
Two Ecoterror Suspects Plead Guilty To Vail ELF Arson..... 21
FBI, Police Departments Improve Training On Islamic Culture... 21
FBI Investigating Alleged Improper Work By Murphy Staff Members..... 21
FBI Searching For Fugitive Texas Official Wanted On Child Rape Charges..... 21
Florida FCI Guards Sentenced To Probation, Prison For Sex-With-Prisoners Scheme..... 21
Philadelphia Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life For Murdering Witness 21
FBI Detains Disruptive Continental Flight Passenger In Texas... 22
US Agents' Business Cards Found Taped To Body In Mexico... 22
US Attorney Says Cyclist's Indictment In BALCO Investigation Marks New Phase..... 22
In Wisconsin, 33 Charged In Cocaine-Ring Investigation 23
Seventeen Arrested In New York Drug Sweep 23
Five Pennsylvanians Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Heroin..... 23
DEA Says Texas Drug Ring Smuggled Proceeds In Detergent Containers..... 23
Five Canadians Face Charges For Roles In Drug-Smuggling Scheme..... 24
Marijuana Bust In New Hampshire Called Largest In State's History..... 24
Man Accused Of Transporting Tons Of Marijuana Captured In Arizona..... 24
DEA Agent Says California Dispensary Sells Marijuana For Nonmedical Use 24
Michigan Doctor Released On Bond In Painkiller Case 24
Mexican Embassy Identifies Man Killed At Hospital As Drug Cartel Member 24

Immigration:

Minneapolis Spot Known For Fake IDs Open In Spite Of Raids. 25
Report About Illegals' Effect On Texas Economy Prompts Debate 25
Congress To Take Another Look At Border Fence Legislation... 25

Tax:

Congress-Administration:

Johnson Responsive After Brain Surgery..... 26
Bipartisan House Task Force To Consider Independent Ethics Enforcer 27
Pelosi Says GOP To Get Only One Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills 28
Republicans Failed To Enact Environmental Priorities In 109th Congress..... 28
Fitzgerald Doesn't Disclose If Cheney Is On Witness List For Libby Trial..... 28
Healthcare Bill Included Special Provisions Sought By Congressional Leaders..... 29
Black Caucus Urges Democratic Leaders To Hire More Minorities..... 29
Chertoff Says FEMA's Post-Katrina Reform Not Done 29
Dow Reaches New Record High 29
OPEC Plans To Reduce Output Starting In February 29
Large Majorities Support Stricter Fuel-Efficiency Requirements. 30
Trade Agency Clears Way For Some Steel Import Tariffs To End30
Obama Not Interested In Being "Un-Hillary" Candidate..... 30
Commission Calls For Major Changes To US Education System31
DARPA's Neuroscience Research Seen As Cause For Concern32

Other News:

Local Elections Test Of Support For Ahmadinejad..... 32
Israel Bars Haniya From Entering Gaza With Cash 32
Israeli Court Sanctions Targeted Killings..... 32
Lebanon's Shiites Question Hezbollah's Control..... 33
Survey Shows "Sharp" Decline In US Standing In Mideast..... 33
Propaganda Puts Pyongyang's Commitment To Talks In Question..... 33
Rice Announces $1 Million Fund To Assist Human Rights Activists..... 34
Pentagon Seeks Creation Of New African Command..... 34
Egypt Arrests Opposition Leader After University Protest..... 34
Britain Abandons BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe..... 34
King Abdullah's Son Rumored To Be Next Saudi Ambassador.. 34
Bush Holds Malaria Summit..... 34
US, Chinese Officials At Odds Over Yuan..... 35
Ban Ki-moon Pledges Stronger Ties With US As New UN Chief 35
Negroponte Says Castro Near Death 35
Lugovoi Denies Role In Poison Plot..... 36
Columnist Calls Chavez Victory An "Assault" On Democracy..... 36
Proliferation Expert Criticizes US Nuclear Policy..... 36
WPost Welcomes Calderon's Early Actions As President 36
Congress Urged To Grant Treaty Approval By Two-Thirds Majority..... 36

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 36

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 37

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Warns Blind Sheik's Death Could Prompt Terror Attacks. CNN's Newsroom (12/14, Phillips) reported, "We begin this hour with the developing story. The FBI has sent out a bulletin warning that the expected death of an al Qaeda spiritual leader could lead to terror attacks against the United States. … The bulletin reminds agencies that" the so-called Blind Sheik, Omar Abdel-Rahman, "has called for attacks if he dies in prison. The bulletin includes what it says was his last will and testament, distributed at an al Qaeda press conference in 1998. Part of it read, 'My brothers, if they kill me – which they will certainly do – hold my funeral and send my corpse to my family. But do not let my blood be shed in vain. Rather, extract the most violent revenge.' Law enforcement sources stress that the bulletin is just meant to make all those in law enforcement aware of the possible threat, and there is no intelligence to suggest there are any attacks being planned. We'll have more on this developing story throughout the afternoon."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Jordan) also notes, "There is no credible indication that an attack on the U.S. is imminent, said several law enforcement officials," and reports that in the bulletin, "the FBI reported to federal intelligence officials that Abdel-Rahman had been rushed from prison to a Missouri hospital two days earlier for a blood transfusion. There, doctors discovered a tumor on his liver, according to the bulletin, which was described to The Associated Press by a law enforcement official. But U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Tracy Billingsley said Abdel-Rahman's condition had stabilized, and he has since been moved back to prison." Newsday (12/15, Eisenberg) notes, "New York City Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said yesterday that the FBI had shared its assessment with his department, 'and we'll take appropriate precautions as, you know, as our intelligence indicates.'" House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King "said that it was the FBI's job to advise of developments, but 'I don't think we should be overly concerned.'"

The New York Daily News (12/15, Meek, 729K) reports Abdel-Rahman "was rushed from a federal prison hospital in Springfield, Mo., to an emergency room after he started 'throwing up blood,' according to an FBI intelligence bulletin obtained by the Daily News. While under examination…to stop bleeding in his esophagus, doctors 'discovered a small tumor on his liver,' the FBI said. Abdel-Rahman is now stable and 'is not at death's door,' a U.S. official lamented. 'The guy is sick; he's falling apart,' the official added." USA Today (12/15, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports on the bulletin, under the headline "Sheik's Declining Health Puts FBI On Alert," and the New York Times (12/14, Johnston, 1.16M) briefly reports on the alert, but does not mention the FBI. CNN's The Situation Room (12/14, Blitzer) and Fox News' Special Report with Brit Hume (12/14) also reported on the FBI bulletin, as do CNN.com (12/14, Arena), FoxNews.com (12/14, Bonisteel) and ABC News' The Blotter (12/14, Esposito, 11:31 a.m.).

FBI, DHS See No Credible Threats During Holiday Season. ABC News' The Blotter (12/14, Esposito, 4:03 p.m.) reported, "As the height of the holiday season approaches, the FBI and Department of Homeland Security say there are no known credible terrorist attacks in the making inside the United States, but crowded stores and New Year's celebrations remain attractive targets. This was a key finding of a 'Holiday Season Security Awareness' bulletin circulated Wednesday and obtained by ABCNews.com." ABC noted, "The report cited the Dec. 6 FBI arrest of Derrick Shareef on charges of plotting to detonate hand grenades at an Illinois shopping mall during the holiday season as a reminder of the potential threat."

US Bioterror Threat Seen As Real, Increasing. Under the headline "Behind This Very Real Threat," Newsday (12/15, Eisenberg) reports, "While the U.S. food supply is among the world's safest, experts say it is vulnerable to deliberate, as well as accidental, contamination -- a reality brought home by the deaths of three people and the sickening of hundreds as a result of tainted spinach, tomatoes and a still-unidentified food source at Taco Bell. The country's exposure to deliberate sabotage is increasing, moreover, as a result of the centralization of the food supply, growing foreign imports and the system's oversight by a 'fragmented and problem-laden' national safety system, in the words of a 2003 report by the Government Accounting Office. 'The threat from agroterrorism may not be widely recognized, but the threat is real and the impact could be devastating,' said FBI Deputy Director John Pistole, speaking at a recent summit of law enforcement and agriculture officials. Noting that documents about U.S. agriculture, which had been translated into Arabic, were discovered in Afghan caves, Pistole said that, while the FBI had no specific intelligence regarding attacks, 'the absence of a communicated threat does not prove the absence of a threat.'" However, Newsday notes, although "national response plans to agroterrorism have been prepared by agencies" since 9/11, "many say that recent contamination episodes are proof that such plans are inadequate."

LATimes Criticizes Lawmakers For Selective Criticism Of Dubai Ports Company. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, 850K) says in an editorial, "Six members of Congress traveled to the Dominican Republic on Sunday for a look at the future of U.S. port security. At Puerto Caucedo, east of Santo Domingo, they examined an X-ray scanning system for cargo containers. The port performing this cutting-edge work is operated by Dubai Ports World." That is "the same company that Congress thinks can't be trusted to run U.S. ports. Earlier this year, Dubai Ports World bought a British firm that operated several ports and cargo terminals in the U.S." On Sunday, "insurance giant American International Group agreed to buy the port operations. The lawmakers who spearheaded the xenophobic attacks on Dubai Ports World have since made a lot of self-congratulatory noises, but they have yet to explain why the Dubai company can be trusted to oversee foreign ports where cargo is screened before it's shipped to the U.S., but not ports in the U.S. itself."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pelosi Calls For New Panel To Probe Intelligence Budget. USA Today (12/15, 4A, 2.27M) reports, "House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi called Thursday for creation of a congressional panel that would oversee the administration's intelligence budget." Pelosi "said the proposed intelligence oversight panel would be made up of lawmakers from the Appropriations Committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence, and would work within the Appropriations Committee. Such a panel, Pelosi said, 'makes oversight stronger and makes the American people safer.'"

The New York Times (12/15, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Advocates of the approach say it should provide some 'cross-pollination' that will lead to lawmakers' gaining more expertise and depth of knowledge about intelligence activities, giving them a greater ability to monitor operations and suggest changes." Rep. John A. Boehner, the GOP leader, "was noncommittal about the intelligence plan. He said he would 'take a look at her proposal and confer with my colleagues about it.'"

The AP (12/15, Shrader) reports that "through a series of hearings," the new committee "would examine the president's intelligence budget, prepare the classified details to the annual defense spending bill and conduct oversight of the use of appropriated funds by intelligence agencies." The AP also reports, "Pelosi's proposal does not follow the exact recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. But it moves closer to the overhaul recommended two years ago when the commission found weaknesses in how Congress monitors the 16 intelligence agencies. A Democratic member of the Sept. 11 commission -- former Rep. Timothy Roemer of Indiana -- said the change would achieve the commission's two major goals: forcing spy agencies to disclose more to Congress, which they often have ignored, and linking the expanded oversight to the power of the purse."

The Washington Times (12/15, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that Pelosi, "who has served on both the intelligence and appropriations panels, has long advocated transparency in intelligence agencies." A "Republican appropriations aide, however, said the intelligence budgets must remain secret to prevent enemies from becoming aware of US spy programs. A transparent budget could signal to enemies, for example, large procurements such as satellite systems. The aide said 'one or two' appropriations staffers now have 'need-to-know' access."

The Washington Post (12/15, A8, Weisman, 690K) reports "appropriators, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally and the incoming chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, strongly objected to any efforts to strip them of jurisdiction over the intelligence budget. Democratic sources on the Appropriations, intelligence and Armed Services committees said last month that Pelosi was leaning toward establishing a panel to examine options for reorganizing the House along the lines suggested by the Sept. 11 commission." But "news reports on the issue emboldened commissioners and families of Sept. 11 victims to renew their push for stronger congressional oversight on intelligence. So Pelosi found a middle ground: Members of her intelligence oversight panel would come from both the intelligence and Appropriations committees, and would have the tasks of overseeing the intelligence agencies and drafting their budgets."

Pelosi Says Democrats Will Propose 100 Percent Screening Of Cargo. In an article focusing on Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi's recommendation Thursday for the creation of a new House panel to oversee US spy agencies, the AP (12/14, Shrader) reported that such a move would be "a step toward adopting all the proposals of the anti-terror Sept. 11 commission." Referring to Republican efforts to adopt the commission's recommendations, Pelosi said Democrats would "go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach US shores." The AP added, "Less than 10 percent of cargo containers arriving at seaports are physically inspected." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday that his agency expects "to have virtually all containers coming into the US screened through radiation portal monitors" by the end of next year.

Chertoff Backs Wiretapping Program. Fox News Live (12/14, 2:36 pm, Herridge) reported that DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "responded to statements made by the incoming head of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick Leahy, that the administration's war on terror, specifically warantless wiretapping program, has gone too far." Chertoff "told Fox that he welcomes a debate with the senator and others on the hill because the American people must understand the value of this tool." Chertoff was shown saying, "Are we going to use all of the weapons that we have against an enemy, which is implacable, which as recently as August was targeting us for a very serious kind of plot? Or are we going to put those weapons away and then the American public is going to live with a significantly increased risk of a terrorism attack, which could result in the deaths of thousands of people."

DOJ_NMG_0106548

Fox Special Report (12/15, story 8, 0:50, Hume) reported Chertoff "responded today with a certain amount of impatience to yesterdays assertions by incoming Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Patrick Leahy that the panel would exercise greater oversight of the Bush Administration's anti-terrorist programs, including electronic surveillance, conducted sometimes without warrants. Chertoff told Fox's Catherine Herridge there is a price to be paid if that tool is taken off the table."

Chertoff Defends Real ID. CNET News.com (12/14, Broache) reported DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "defended forthcoming national ID cards" that will be required under the Real ID Act, saying they were "vital for security and consistent with privacy rights." Chertoff called the cards "an example (of) when security and privacy go hand in hand. It is a win-win for both." Chertoff cited an immigration raid Tuesday in which ICE agents "made more than 1,200 arrests related to immigration violations and unmasked criminal organizations stealing and trafficking in genuine birth certificates and Social Security cards belonging to US citizens. 'Do you think your privacy is better protected if someone can walk around with phony docs with your name and your Social Security number, or is your privacy better protected if you have the confidence that the identification relied upon is in fact reliable and uniquely tied to a single individual?' Chertoff asked rhetorically." CNET added that Chertoff "was likely trying to quell rampant skepticism about the IDs voiced by some privacy advocates, immigrants and other groups. Some have said they fear that the IDs are a stepping stone to a veritable police state, complete with ready surveillance of individuals."

DHS To Announce Rail Security Proposal. The AP (12/14, Miller) reported a rail security proposal to be announced Friday by the Department of Homeland Security "would require railroads to inspect rail cars and keep them in secure areas when not in use." The plan "falls short of the more stringent measures proposed by Democratic lawmakers who are set to take control of Congress next month." Rep. Bennie Thompson said he was "not convinced that all of the security gaps plaguing our current hazmat transport system will be filled by this proposal." DHS's "proposal would give the Transportation Security Administration authority to inspect railroads, rail yards and mass transit rail systems, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press from a person involved in the rulemaking process." The proposal "does not match what at least nine cities have proposed — rerouting around densely populated areas trains that are carrying hazardous material."

The New York Times (12/15, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "The proposal would…clarify how government workers inspect tank cars and railyards for compliance, establish rules on the chain of custody and handoff of dangerous cargoes and set communications requirements. … An official of the Homeland Security Department provided details of the plan on the condition that he not be identified further, because it has not been published." The Times does not mention the Democratic lawmakers' rail security proposals.

DHS Said To Be Suspending Plans For Exit-Monitoring System. Describing the news as "a major blow to the Bush administration's efforts to secure borders," the New York Times (12/15, Swarns, Lipton, 1.16M) reports "domestic security officials have for now given up" on the exit portion of the US Visit program, with DHS officials conceding "in recent days…that they lack the financing and technology to meet their deadline to have exit-monitoring systems at the 50 busiest land border crossings by next December." The assessment "sent alarms to Congress, where some Republicans and Democrats warned that suspending the monitoring plan would leave the United States vulnerable." The Times adds that DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and other officials often call US Visit "a singular achievement in making the country safer. US Visit fingerprints and photographs 2 percent of the people entering the country, because Americans and most Canadians and Mexicans are exempt." However, "Efforts to determine whether visitors actually leave have faltered."

The Washington Post (12/15, A5, Hsu, 690K) reports spokesman Jarrod Agen said DHS "is looking at strategies for US-VISIT exit that are the most cost effective, and we are examining strategies for implementation at air and sea ports. We are also looking at land ports. However, there are costs associated, including the physical infrastructure as well as the economic impact, and we are in the process of evaluating all that data now.' Several homeland security officials said a final decision has yet to be made, but that, given the limited time and resources, the department intends to focus on expanding US-VISIT at airports, where the majority of visa holders exit the country."

GAO Says US Visit Entry System Aids Border Patrol, Recommends Improved Management Controls. Meanwhile, the AP (12/14) reported that a Government Accountability Office report issued Thursday found US Visit's entry system "has aided border patrol agents, but computer snafus and management shortfalls need to be resolved." GAO "investigators visited 21 border crossings and officials at every one said the US Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, which uses two fingerprints and a digital photograph to identify people, had improved their ability to process visitors and verify identities, according to the…report. … But US Customs and Border Protection officials at 12 of the 21 sites said 'computer slowdowns and freezes' hindered visitor processing and inspection times. At nine of those 12, 'computer processing problems were not always reported to CBP's computer help desk, as required by CBP guidelines,' according to the report." The report "recommended that DHS improve existing management controls for the system and develop performance measures to assess its impact at border crossings. The government watchdog agency also said DHS should describe how it will move to a biometric entry/exit capability and align US-VISIT with other border security systems being developed. In a written response, DHS officials said the computer problems are resolved, a preliminary monitoring system was established, and a working group was set up to determine how to provide detailed monitoring of all applications."

DOJ_NMG_0106549

Industry Associations Oppose DHS Traveler Assessment System. The AP (12/14, Sniffen) reported eight major US, Canadian and European travel industry associations wrote DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff Wednesday to express their concern that the government's "far-reaching and invasive" system for assessing international travelers as potential terrorists "could do significant personal harm to them, and reduce the productivity of the organizations that field business travelers." However, Chertoff defended the program Thursday "as a legal effort 'to make sure that we don't inconvenience the rights of most travelers so that we can focus more sensibly and in a more risk-managed fashion on those people that do potentially pose a threat.'" The AP added that the travel associations "join some members of Congress and privacy advocates in criticizing the system."

NYTimes, WPost Criticize Administration For ACLU Subpoena. The New York Times (12/15, 1.16M) editorials, "The Bush administration is trampling on the First Amendment and well-established criminal law by trying to use a subpoena to force the American Civil Liberties Union to hand over a classified document in its possession. The dispute is shrouded in secrecy, and very little has been made public about the document, but we do not need to know what's in it to know what's at stake: if the government prevails, it will have engaged in prior restraint — almost always a serious infringement on free speech — and it could start using subpoenas to block reporting on matters of vital public concern."

The Washington Post (12/15, A34, 690K) says in an editorial, "In the latest manifestation of its disregard for First Amendment principles, the administration has used -- misused, to be more precise -- a grand jury subpoena to retrieve 'any and all copies' of a document, marked 'secret,' obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU's request that a federal judge quash the subpoena should be granted."

DC Area Said To Be Unprepared For Disaster. The Washington Post (12/15, A34, 690K) says in an editorial, "How well is the" Washington DC region "prepared to cope with thousands of casualties and prevent the spread of lethal contagions? Not very, according to a report from the Trust for America's Health, a private watchdog group that rated every state and the District on readiness to respond to a public health crisis." The report "ranked the District and Maryland near the bottom. Maryland, for example, would suffer a chronic shortage of hospital beds in the event of even a moderate pandemic. The District lags in demonstrating that it has the organization to quickly distribute medicine and equipment to communities throughout the city during a health emergency. In all, Maryland satisfied only four of 10 measurements of preparedness, and the District met only five."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's Iraq Strategy Expected To Include Boost In Troop Levels. McClatchy (12/15, Strobel, Landay) reports, "President Bush is weighing whether to make a deeper American commitment in Iraq despite growing public unhappiness with the war, according to senior US officials and former officials familiar with Bush's high-level review. The proposed changes, with a few exceptions, conflict with the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which warned earlier this month against an open-ended commitment to Iraq and said American combat brigades could be out of Iraq by early 2008." While" some key decisions haven't been made yet, the senior officials said the emerging strategy" includes: "A shift in the primary US military mission in Iraq from combat to training an expanded Iraqi army, generally in line with the Iraq Study Group's recommendations. A possible short-term surge of as many as 40,000 more American troops to try to secure Baghdad, along with a permanent increase in the size of the US Army and the Marine Corps, which are badly strained by deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan." The strategy would also include "a revised Iraq political strategy aimed at forging a 'moderate center' of Shiite Muslim, Sunni Muslim Arab and Kurdish politicians, increased reconstruction funds and the rejection of "urgent, broad new diplomatic initiative in the Middle East to address the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and reach out to Iran and Syria," which had been suggested by the Baker commission.

DOJ_NMG_0106550

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A4, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) says Bush is "leaning toward temporarily sending as many as 20,000 additional US troops to Iraq, even as the Democrats taking charge of Congress demand a drawdown of forces." The "emerging plan is facing opposition from Iraqi officials adamant that more US forces aren't the answer." Also, "US military commanders in Baghdad have drawn up plans for the country that don't require any new personnel." The Journal adds, "Although White House officials stress that no final decisions have been made, several aides involved in the internal deliberations say…Bush and senior administration officials appear receptive to calls to temporarily send 15,000 to 30,000 new US forces to Iraq to bolster the 140,000 troops there."

Sen. John McCain, visiting Baghdad, said US commanders are discussing adding as many as 35,000 troops. The New York Times (12/15, Burns, 1.16M) reports McCain "said Thursday that American military commanders were discussing the possibility of adding as many as 10 more combat brigades -- a maximum of about 35,000 troops -- to 'bring the situation under control' while Iraq's divided political leaders seek solutions to the worsening bloodshed here." After "talks in Baghdad with Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and other top American generals," McCain "said a substantial United States troop increase was one of the strategy changes the generals were considering as they reviewed what he called 'a steadily deteriorating situation.'" He "said meetings with Iraqi government leaders showed that they, too, 'have certainly not ruled out the option of more troops.'"

The AP (12/15, Wagner) reports McCain said that "he realizes that few Americans favor deploying more US troops to Iraq, and that if such a move proved unsuccessful in the unpopular war it could hurt his presidential ambitions." But McCain "said Americans must realize that if US troops leave Iraq in chaos, groups such as al-Qaida 'will follow us home and that we will have a large conflict and greater challenges than those that we now face here in Iraq.'" Other senators, also in Iraq, appeared to concur. Sen. Joseph Lieberman said, "I feel strongly that more troops are required here." Sen. Lindsey Graham remarked, "I think it is most important to send more troops quickly. People are getting murdered and kidnapped. We need an overwhelming troop presence."

Meanwhile, USA Today (12/15, Jackson, 2.27M) reports the President "will be spending part of his holidays in 'continuous consultations' as he makes final decisions on a new Iraq war plan to be unveiled in the new year." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Thursday that Bush will seek more information from a variety of sources, including members of the Iraqi government, Pentagon and the National Security Council, which is coordinating the administration's review of its war policy."

Rumsfeld Says Troop Levels Have Always Been In Line With Commanders' Requests. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said on Fox News (12/14, Hume), "The people who decide the levels of forces on the ground are not the Secretary of Defense or the President. We hear the recommendations, but the recommendations were made by the combatant commanders and by the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. And there hasn't been a minute in the last six years when we have not had the number of troops that the combatant commanders have requested."

Asked, also on Fox News (12/14, Hume), what his "greatest regret" of his tenure is, Rumsfeld said, "I guess that one would have hoped that Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts would have been concluded more rapidly. I think that's probably unrealistic. … It's taken longer than people had anticipated. It's more difficult. And we're in that unusual situation where the Department of Defense is looked at for the situations in those countries when the reality is that we can't lose a single military battle in either country at all. Not possible."

White House Pressing Iraqis To Reduce Sadr's Power. USA Today (12/15, 13A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "The Bush administration is pressing Iraqi politicians to form a new Cabinet to reduce the power of Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American cleric whose militia is responsible for much of the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a moderate Sunni, said Thursday that President Bush told him the administration wants Iraqi politicians to form a coalition of 'moderate parties.' al-Hashimi met with Bush on Tuesday. Iraq's governing coalition includes mostly Shiite political parties and has six Cabinet ministers from al-Sadr's faction. A new coalition would reduce or eliminate al-Sadr loyalists and replace them with other Shiites, Kurds and moderate Sunni Arabs, al-Hashimi said." White House spokesman Gordon Johndroe "said the administration was not telling Iraqis what to do but the 'object of the moderate Iraqi leaders coming together is to stop the violence and create an Iraq that can govern, sustain and defend itself.' Asked whether that meant removing al-Sadr's faction from government, Johndroe said the Iraqis Bush had consulted are 'serious about taking action against those who would operate outside the rule of law.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Richter, 850K) reports that Hashimi, "who leads the Iraqi parliament's most important Sunni Arab group, said that Bush and other senior officials told him at a White House meeting this week that they believe 'for the present time, the only solution we have' is to create a new ruling alliance in hopes of strengthening a frail central government. Hashimi's comments, in an appearance at the U.S. Institute of Peace, offered new insight into the importance Bush is placing on the coalition-building effort at a time when the president and top aides are considering new strategies for Iraq. U.S. and Iraqi advocates of the approach hope it would give Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki a new freedom to take risky actions, such as trying to suppress militia violence. Maliki's freedom to act is believed to be limited by his dependence on radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Al Mahdi army is blamed for sectarian attacks. Creation of a new governing coalition also could provide a means for picking a new prime minister if Iraqi and American leaders decide Maliki must be replaced."

DOJ_NMG_0106551

Hashimi Expresses "Reservations" About Maliki's Performance. Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi was asked on PBS' NewsHour (12/14, Suarez) if he thinks Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "is doing a good job and doing a good enough job to remain in his post for the future." Hashimi said, "I do have reservations about his performances so far. And we were very frank with him in tackling various issues that are still pending. … Many, many decisions taken on the ground of non-consultation with us."

Kissinger Says "Outcome" In Iraq Not Dependent On Troop Levels. Ex-Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/14, Blitzer), "There's no sense adding more troops to the existing strategy. So it would have to be linked to whatever new the President presents. But I think it is a mistake to tie, in our thinking, the outcome in Iraq to the troop levels. The outcome in Iraq will have to depend on the degree to which we can create incentives for a political negotiation between the parties and political incentives to the outside countries to let the country develop with responsible stability."

Krauthammer Says ISG "Farce" Presents Bush With Opportunity. In his column in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "As a result of the Iraq Study Group…Bush has been given one last chance to alter course on Iraq. This did not, however, come about the way James Baker intended. It came about because the long-anticipated report turned out to be, as is widely agreed, a farce." Krauthammer says "the report has fallen so flat that the field is now clear for the president to recommend to a war-weary country something new and bold." Bush "must do two things. First, as I've been agitating for, establish a new governing coalition in Baghdad that excludes Moqtada al-Sadr, a cancer that undermines the ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government to work with us. It is encouraging that Bush has already begun such a maneuver by meeting with rival Shiite and Sunni parliamentary leaders. If we help produce a cross-sectarian government that would be an ally rather than a paralyzed semi-adversary of coalition forces, we should then undertake part two: 'Double down' our military effort. This means a surge in American troops with a specific mission: to secure Baghdad and (with the support of the Baghdad government -- a sine qua non) suppress Sadr's Mahdi Army. It is our last chance for success. Bush can thank the Iraq Study Group and its instant irrelevance for making it possible."

WSJournal Notes Iraqi Criticism Of ISG. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (12/15, A20, 2.04M) relates that while the ISG report has faced "withering criticism here in the U.S," "the more revealing reaction has been from Iraq itself: 'Unrealistic,' 'inappropriate' and 'very dangerous' are among the kinder words used by Iraq's leaders to describe the ISG's work." Iraq President Jalal Talabani "reacted strongly to the ISG's suggestion that American support for his democratically elected government be conditioned on its meeting U.S.-determined 'milestones' toward that goal. That, he said, was an 'insult to the people of Iraq.'" The Journal says the "Iraqi criticism…underscores that the ISG report was less about winning in Baghdad than about splitting political differences in Washington. As Mr. Bush re-examines Iraq policy with an eye toward announcing significant changes early next year, we trust he understands better than the ISG that a partnership with the Iraqi government is essential to any successful outcome."

Bush Said To See Parallels Between His Presidency And Truman's. The Washington Post (12/15, A3, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "He led the United States into war and saw his popularity plummet, yet some 60 years later his reputation has never been higher: It's small wonder Harry S. Truman seems to hold a special fascination for…Bush these days. That interest came into focus recently after Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) went public with an account of a meeting last Friday in which he said the president seemed to be comparing his situation to that of Truman in the late 1940s." According to" Durbin's account and another source familiar with the meeting, Bush told the gathering of congressional leaders that Truman's approach to dealing with the Cold War was not initially popular but that he was vindicated by history -- the implication being that Bush would be vindicated about Iraq as well." The Post adds, "White House aides later disputed this reading of Bush's comments, but the episode may offer a glimpse into the psychology of a president who, like Truman in his second term, seems beset by trouble and pressures on all sides and who is ready to look to history for some comfort and guidance. … By many accounts, Bush is fascinated by history and biography -- he reads extensively and meets periodically with presidential scholars -- and Truman has certainly seemed to be on his mind in recent months."

Schoomaker Says Wars Putting Dangerous Strain On Army. The New York Times (12/15, Shanker, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "The review of Iraq policy by senior commanders appears to be headed toward a recommendation to increase the size of the American military, both to sustain a long-term commitment in Iraq and to leave the United States better positioned to deal with potential adversaries, in particular Iran and North Korea, Pentagon and military officials said Thursday." The "latest indication came when the Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, called for expanding the force by adding more active-duty troops and by making more use of the National Guard and Reserve." The Times adds, "Officials who took part in the session or who were briefed on it would not give specific figures that were being discussed for growth goals. But their descriptions revealed a broad conclusion that has received increasing support in Washington: that regardless of the exact shape of President Bush's new strategy on Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by their commitments around the globe, in particular in Iraq." That conclusion "is being punctuated by the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who officially leaves his post on Friday and who was long the champion of the idea that high technology and better intelligence could substitute for a bigger military."

DOJ_NMG_0106552

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 7, 2:05, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Schoomaker wants more frequent call-ups of the Guard and Reserve, but Defense Secretary Rumsfeld has steadfastly refused, arguing the army needs to make better use of the troops it already has. With Rumsfeld on his way out, Schoomaker broke ranks and went public." Schoomaker was shown saying, "I have been recommending this all along." But NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 4, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said "Guard and Reserve advocates argue increased deployments would put increased stress on those forces. Unlike active duty, Reserve troops are not full-time soldiers and most have full-time jobs." Major General Martin Umbarger, of the National Guard, was shown saying, "Wherever those teams are, it would be pretty tough on the soldiers' families and the employers." Miklaszewski: "Army officials say tonight in the short-term, they'll create two additional brigade combat teams out of the active duty forces they already have. But in the long-term, that's not nearly enough."

ABC World News (12/14, story 5, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was a startling admission from the Army's top general today. There's been a lot of talk in Congress, and by outside experts that operations in Iraq and Afghanistan are putting a dangerous strain on the army. Today, for the first time, the Army's Chief of Staff…said the same thing." ABC (Karl) added, "The Army is stretched so thin, it could break. That was the blunt warning from the Army Chief of Staff." Schoomaker: "This is like building an airplane while it's flying. And while you're building it, people are ripping pieces off the wings." Schoomaker "did not say how much bigger the Army needs to be. There are currently 512,000 active-duty soldiers. Recruiters could only add about another 6,000 or 7,000 a year. And growing the Army is costly. $1.2 billion for troops added. The strain on the Army and the Marine Corps makes sending more troops to Iraq a tough sell here at the Pentagon. Today, he told reporters, more troops should not be sent unless there's a purpose. And that purpose should be measurable."

The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Tyson, 690K) says Schoomaker's "highly public appeal for more troops and reserve call-ups appeared to be part of an Army campaign to lobby incoming Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who is to be sworn in Monday, to approve the desired policy changes as well as a significant increase in the Army budget." Democrats "said yesterday that they plan to hold hearings on the 'urgent' and 'critical' readiness problems of the Army and Marine Corps."

The AP (12/15, Baldor) reports that though Schoomaker "didn't give an exact number, he said it would take significant time and commitment by the nation, noting some 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers could be added per year." Officials also "need greater authority to tap into the National Guard and Reserve, long ago set up as a strategic reserve but now needed as an integral part of the nation's deployed forces, Schoomaker told a commission studying possible changes in those two forces." The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Barnes, 850K) runs a similar story under the headline "Army Is Stretched Too Thin." McClatchy (12/15, Brown), meanwhile, notes Schoomaker's "recommendations were first reported on Tuesday by McClatchy Newspapers."

Rice Rejects Idea Of Talks With Iran, Syria. The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Kessler, Wright, 690K) reports on its front page Secretary Rice yesterday "rejected" the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the United States seek the help of Syria and Iran in Iraq, "saying the 'compensation' required by any deal might be too high." She also "argued that neither country should need incentives to foster stability in Iraq." In an interview with the Post, Rice said, "If they have an interest in a stable Iraq, they will do it anyway," noting that she "did not want to trade away Lebanese sovereignty to Syria or allow Iran to obtain a nuclear weapon as a price for peace in Iraq." Rice also said there would be "no retreat" from the administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East, a goal that was "deemphasized" by panel in its report last week but that Rice insisted was a "matter of strategic interest." She also "reiterated her commitment to pursuing peace between Palestinians and Israelis." The Post says Rice's remarks "indicated that, despite a maelstrom of criticism of Bush's policies by outside experts and Democrats, the administration's extensive review of policy in Iraq and the region will not yield major changes in its approach." Rice said that Bush could be "quite expansive" in terms of a policy review and that the new plan would be a "departure." But the president will "not radically change any of his long-term goals or commitment to Iraq, she said."

DOJ_NMG_0106553

The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Peterson, 59K) reports on the "growing chorus, from the Iraq Study Group to Mideast experts," who are calling on President Bush to engage "archenemy" Iran's aid in stabilizing Iraq. However, "even if Mr. Bush were to set aside his approach to Iran as part of an 'axis of evil,' the question remains of whether Iran is willing to help the US out in Iraq - and if so, at what price." Bush "has spoken disparagingly" of such involvement of Iran, but the Monitor suggests that Iran may be able to leverage the perceived need for its cooperation into a softening of the U.N.'s position on its nuclear program.

Rice Seen As Having "Low Visibility" In Iraq Debate. The Financial Times (12/15, Dinmore, Luce, Wallis) reports under the headline "Rice Lying Low At The Middle East Crossroads" that "while US policy in the Middle East has stalled at multiple crossroads in the search for a 'new way forward' in Iraq," Secretary Rice "has been notable only for her low visibility." Although she is "likely to play a pivotal role in the outcome…many are asking whether she will take the risk and seize the opportunity to direct a comprehensive change of course in the region in the two years they have left." According to the Times, Rice "appears to be on the brink of ignoring the first of the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group – that she and Mr Bush launch a comprehensive 'new diplomatic offensive' by December 31," noting that in a recent interview with AFP, Rice said, "How long have American secretaries of state been shuttling back and forth trying to get a Palestinian state? Has it ever worked?"

State Department Says Prince Bandar Urged Rice Not To Engage Iran, Syria. AFP (12/15) reports Assistant Secretary McCormack said Saudi Arabia's former ambassador here recently visited Washington, "adding spice to reports he was involved in a power struggle which caused his successor to quit." The Washington Post reported Thursday that Prince Bandar bin Sultan was in the US capital recently to "counsel top officials against heeding mounting calls for talks with Iran or Syria." McCormack "reluctantly confirmed" Prince Bandar met Secretary Rice, "when pressed by reporters, but refused to divulge the substance of their conversation." AFP notes that "interestingly, the mission of Prince Bandar, current Saudi national security advisor, seems to directly conflict, on Iran, at least, with recent statements on Tehran by his successor as ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal," who abruptly resigned Monday.

White House Criticizes Bill Nelson For Visiting Syria. The AP (12/14, Riechmann), in an article published in over 40 papers and websites, including the Washington Post, reports that a day after Florida Sen. Bill Nelson (D) met with Syrian President Bashar Assad to discuss the situation in Iraq Wednesday, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow called the meeting "inappropriate," and said that together with scheduled trips to Syria by such lawmakers as Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd (D) and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter (R) "send an unhelpful, mixed message to the Syrians." Dodd countered that "members of Congress 'need to go to hotspots not just garden spots. I can't think of a more critical part of the world than the Middle East and I can't think of a more critical player in affecting events in the region for good or for bad than Syria.'"

McClatchy (12/14, Clark) adds, "The White House on Thursday escalated its criticism" of Nelson, noting that "President Bush has accused Syria of backing the insurgents now fighting in Iraq." Nelson called his visit "a fact-finding tour of the Middle East," and cited a willingness on Assad's part to work with U.S. or Iraqi forces to secure their border. "Nelson said he viewed the talks as a 'crack in the door' for discussions to continue, but cautioned that he viewed the meeting 'with realism, not optimism.'" The piece notes that the Bush Administration's reluctance to follow the ISG's recommendation to engage Syria and Iran stems from the countries' ties to terrorist groups and to Syria's "record of meddling in Lebanon."

AFP (12/14) adds, "The White House sharply criticized" Nelson's trip "and warned Damascus not to see the visit as an indirect overture from Washington. 'Even lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region,' spokesman Tony Snow said." The AFP notes that Kerry "lent qualified support" to the ISG's calls for engagement, "saying during a visit to Cairo: 'I think it's important to begin a discussion. 'I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest,' Kerry said after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak."

The New York Times (12/15, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports that White House officials said the visit "was inappropriate and undermined democracy in the region," noting, "The visits are troublesome for the Bush administration because they come in the wake of the report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which has called for the United States to engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria. Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted such talks, and the visits by the senators could add to public pressure on the White House to change that policy." Moreover, "Specter, a moderate Republican who has often been at odds with the White House on domestic issues, said in a statement on the Senate floor this month that he had long advocated negotiating with Syria. 'We need to keep our friends close and our enemies closer,' he said." The Times suggests that the impasse over whether to engage Syria or to keep the country at a distance is symbolic of the broader U.S. policy dilemma in the region.

Kerry Calls For US Engagement With Iran, Syria. AFP (12/14) reports on Kerry's comments in Cairo urging President Bush "to kindle a dialogue with Iran and Syria in a bid to stabilize Iraq. 'I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest,' Kerry told reporters after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo. 'Syria needs to understand that and Iran needs to understand that, but I think it's important to begin a discussion.'"

DOJ_NMG_0106554

Syrian Foreign Minister Backs ISG Recommendations. In a column in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K), David Ignatius writes about having asked Syrian foreign minister Walid Moallem "what positions would Syria take if it entered a dialogue with the United States about Iraq and other Middle East issues." Ignatius notes that Moallem expressed eagerness for such talks, seeing them as crucial to the region's stability, adding "Moallem's comments are the most detailed Syrian response to the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. … As we made a line-by-line review of the group's recommendations involving Syria, Moallem expressed support for nearly every item. When I asked if Syrian President Bashar al-Assad endorsed these positions, he answered: 'He is the leader. I am expressing his ideas.'" Ignatius continues to detail Moallem's views on the broader regional issues, concluding, "Is this Syrian gambit for real? Is Moallem serious in his offer to talk with America about a comprehensive package of peace with Israel, stability for Iraq and compromise in Lebanon? The answer is that there's really only one way to find out, which is to explore further the ideas the Syrian foreign minister has put on the table."

Odierno Takes Charge Of US Troops In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Army Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno "assumed command of U.S. troops at a ceremony in the capital on Thursday, vowing to pursue more than just combat to resolve the conflict in Iraq." Those who "know Odierno say the hard-charging general who plotted Hussein's capture as well as anti-insurgency operations may put more effort toward securing, rather than rebuilding, Iraq when he becomes the No. 2 U.S. commander here." Odierno "gained a reputation as an aggressive commander while leading the 4th Infantry Division in Sunni Arab-dominated parts of the country in 2003 and '04. Some military analysts have argued that the region's continued unrest can be traced to his heavy-handed methods."

Caldwell Says US Making Progress In Training Iraqi Army. In a USA Today op-ed (12/15, 20A), Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the Multi-National Force in Iraq, says, "The Iraqi people and the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) share a vision for Iraq: a secure, stable and self-governing nation in which Iraqis find solutions to Iraqi problems. To do this, the government of Iraq must achieve national reconciliation, rebuild Iraq's infrastructure to provide basic services and — in partnership with coalition forces — defeat the terrorists and extremists seeking to sow the seeds of discord and division among the Iraqi people. The best way to achieve this last goal is to transition more authority and responsibility for Iraq's security to Iraqis. Iraqi forces have the best understanding of their culture, language and geography — all skills vital to defeating an insurgency. Once sufficiently trained, equipped and mentored, the Iraqi Security Force will be the most effective weapon against the foreign and extremist elements trying to tear apart Iraq." Today, Iraqis "are protected by a trained and equipped military and police force, one that will soon number more than 350,000. Quality is improving with quantity. Eighty percent of the Iraqi army is already operating with limited coalition support."

White House Defends Release Of Enemy Body Count. The AP (12/15) reports, "The White House expressed concern Thursday about what it believes is an impression that American forces in Iraq 'aren't doing anything, they're just targets.' In fact, said presidential spokesman Tony Snow, US troops are 'fighting the bad guys' and killing and capturing them." Snow "raised the point when asked to explain why President Bush, a day earlier, had said that 5,900 enemy forces had been killed or captured in Iraq during October, November and the first week of December. … 'There is quite often the impression...that our people aren't doing anything, they're just targets,' Snow said at his daily press briefing. 'And I think there's a certain amount of unease in the American public because they hear about deaths but they don't hear about what's going on.'"

First Lady Criticizes Media Coverage Of Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 5, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "First Lady Laura Bush had something to say about Iraq today. It was during an appearance on MSNBC. Mrs. Bush was asked by Norah O'Donnell why she thinks only two out of 10 Americans in our latest 'NBC News/Wall Street Journal' poll say they approved of the President's handing in the war in Iraq. Mr. Bush placed the blame squarely on the news media." Laura Bush: "I do know that there are a lot of good things that are happening that aren't covered and I think the drum beat in the country from the media, from the only way people know what's happening unless they have a loved one deployed there, is discouraging." Williams: "Mrs. Bush went on to say she hopes for what she called more balanced coverage in the future. The recent report from the Iraq Study Group, however, specifically found that there has been significant underreporting of the violence in Iraq."

US Troops In Iraq, Afghanistan To Get Flame-Resistant Uniforms. USA Today (12/15, Brook, 2.27M)

DOJ_NMG_0106555

reports Pentagon officials say "flame-resistant uniforms will be standard issue for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan by early 2007." More than "160,000 suits made of the flame-retardant fabric NOMEX will be sent to combat zones, said Thomas Edwards, assistant deputy chief of staff for Army logistics." Edwards said the Pentagon "moved quickly…because Iraqi insurgents are using homemade bombs and targeting the fuel tanks of vehicles."

Ethnic, Sectarian Divisions Are Barrier To Critical Oil Law Provision. The New York Times (12/15, Wong, 1.16M) reports Iraqi politicians and ministers "are divided along ethnic and sectarian lines over a critical provision in a proposed national oil law, according to the country's oil minister. If the differences can be bridged, the draft could be unveiled soon, the minister, Hussain al-Shahristani, said this week." The oil law, "along with security, is considered a prerequisite for attracting the foreign investment that Iraq's oil sector desperately needs. The law would set guidelines for development contracts for as many as 60 oil fields in the country, Mr. Shahristani said in an interview." The law "is also a crucial step in the process of national reconciliation, American and Iraqi officials said, because it sets out rules for the equitable distribution of the country's oil wealth. That, in turn, could ease tensions over granting greater autonomy to Iraq's regions." Although agreement "has been reached on the sharing of oil revenues, representatives of the main Sunni Arab, Shiite and Kurdish political blocs remain at odds over the issue of control over contracts to develop oil fields, Mr. Shahristani said."

Baghdad Kidnappings Said To Reflect Growing Lawlessness. McClatchy (12/15, Dulaimy, Allam) reports that on Thursday morning, "gunmen dressed in Iraqi police and army uniforms descended on the Sinak district and kidnapped dozens of shopkeepers and bystanders in the latest of a string of mass abductions in Baghdad." The "brazen attack took place barely a mile from the heavily guarded government compound known as the Green Zone, where Iraqi officials were preparing for a weekend conference on national reconciliation." The Sinak attack "was the most notable incident on a day packed with other violence that reflects the lawlessness that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's beleaguered government appears unable to curb. Police reported the discoveries of 45 bodies in the capital Thursday, 42 in the mainly Sunni Muslim western side and three in the predominantly Shiite Muslim eastern side." Polices said a "leading Shiite politician, Adil Abdul Mahdi, escaped an apparent assassination attempt Thursday when gunmen fired on his motorcade in a majority-Sunni neighborhood, police said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "None knew who 'they' were: uniformed men firing weapons in the air and herding people into trucks, just a few hundred yards from the edge of the U.S.-guarded 'Green Zone.'" But "most had suspected such a day might come to the Sinak market of downtown Baghdad. All knew to run at first sight of the uniformed gunmen who have become signature elements of the all-too-common mass kidnappings in the capital." This time, "at least 60 people disappeared within minutes, stuffed into four delivery trucks and hauled away toward eastern Baghdad." An Interior Ministry official "reported later that at least 23 of the shopkeepers had been released unharmed in northern Baghdad, after showing their captors identity cards bearing names associated with Shiite Muslims." The fate "of previous victims of mass kidnappings has been brutal: most show up dead within days, often with signs of torture, such as drill holes."

The Washington Post (12/15, A24, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "The mass abductions, brazen even by Baghdad standards, were the latest sign of worsening insecurity in the capital. Two days ago, 70 day laborers were killed in a car bomb attack in another busy district. A month ago, gunmen who claimed to be from the Shiite-run Interior Ministry seized as many as 150 people from an agency of the Ministry of Higher Education, which is controlled by a Sunni Arab party." Thursday's "well-orchestrated kidnappings did not appear to be sectarian in nature or a reprisal attack, shopkeepers and officials said."

Iraqi Boy Wants To Escape Violence, Come To New York. ABC World News (12/14, story 6, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We are going to take 'A Closer Look,' tonight, at what it's like to grow up amid the chaos and violence in Iraq. The kidnapping and suicide bombings that we report on almost every night, are a daily reminder of the grave dangers that millions of Iraqis face every day." ABC (Harris) added Dan Azad, "who learned English while living in Texas with his aunt seven years ago, is a senior at Baghdad's ballet and music school." Outside of school, "Dan's world is small and stifling. He can hang out with his friends here. But because of the security situation, when classes are over, he's basically a prisoner in his parents' apartment." When he "graduates next spring, he's hoping, somehow, to go to college in New York City, either to study music or computers. He carries pictures of Manhattan in his cell phone."

Saddam's Capture Failed To Be Turning Point. The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 8, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "It was three years ago today that we learned American soldiers have found Saddam Hussein hiding in a dark hole beneath a mud shack near his hometown in northern Iraq, but it wasn't the turning point many had predicted." Former Coalition Provisional Authority

DOJ_NMG_0106556

Administrator Paul Bremer: "Ladies and gentlemen, we got him. CBS (Pitts) added, "Those three words uttered three years ago were seen by so many as both a proclamation." President Bush: "And now the former dictator of Iraq will face the justice he denied to millions." Pitts: "And a promise, the lives of Iraq's people were about to change and America's sons and daughters had accomplished the most important part of their mission." But to "war-weary Americans, however, victory is proving more elusive than a tyrant in a spider hole."

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 9, 1:45, Pinkston, 7.66M) reported, "Three years after the dictator's capture, Baghdad is the deadliest city on the face of the earth." A "new survey by an Iraqi Research Center finds 95% of the respondents believe security is worse now than it was under Saddam."

Accused Iraqi Expatriate Feels Deserted By US. The New York Times (12/15, Glanz, 1.16M) reports that of all "the Iraqi expatriates who returned to rule, rebuild and profit from their country after the invasion, none have fallen as far as Aiham Alsammarae, who was once the minister of electricity but now spends his days consumed with bitterness in a Baghdad jail as his lawyers fight multiple charges of corruption against him." Alsammarae, "an American citizen who lived in the Chicago area and built a thriving engineering firm there, is the only cabinet-level Iraqi official to be convicted and jailed for misusing money during his time in office. Four months ago, hearing that he was being accused of corruption, he walked into a Baghdad courthouse to find out if there were charges against him and was astonished to find himself placed under arrest pending trial. He has been in jail ever since." Alsammarae is "bitter because, he said, the United States has left him in his hour of need to the vagaries of an Iraqi court system that in many ways is still the opaque and frightening apparatus it was before the invasion."

Female Muslim Translator Profiled For Her Service In US Military. In a 2,750-word, front page article, the New York Times (12/15, A1, Elliott, 1.16M) profiles Fadwa Hamdan, who "belongs to the rare class of Muslim women who have signed up to become soldiers trained in Arabic translation." Such female linguists, it notes, "play a crucial role for the American armed forces in Iraq, where civilian women often feel uncomfortable interacting with male troops."

Suicide Bomber Attacks Shopping Area Of Afghan Town. The New York Times (12/15, Wafa, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "detonated his explosives in the center of a busy shopping street in the town of Qalat in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing four civilians and wounding 22 people, the provincial police chief said." Also on Thursday, President Hamid Karzai "wound up a visit to southern Afghanistan with a speech at a boys' high school in Kandahar in which he blamed neighboring Pakistan for supporting Taliban insurgents and suicide bombers."

Negroponte Says Pakistan Must Deal With Tribal Leaders. The Washington Post (12/15, A26, Pincus, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said that with "new fighting expected to break out next spring in Afghanistan, the Pakistani government will soon have to decide what it can do about the tribal authorities who have not been living up to their agreement to prevent Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters from moving back and forth across the border." At a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters, Negroponte said, "Sooner or later, the government will have to reckon with it." But with "elections in Pakistan coming, the United States understands that President Pervez Musharraf 'has a domestic political balancing act to perform,' he added." In September, "representatives of the Pakistani government signed accords with tribal elders in North Waziristan in which those leaders agreed that they would not allow border crossings 'for any kind of militancy.' In return, Pakistani army units withdrew from that area." Negroponte said "the 'tribal authorities are not living up to the deal' and that back-and-forth travel by the Taliban and others 'causes serious problems.'"

Arlington Wreath Laying Effort Attracts Wide Following. ABC World News (12/14, story 11, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For more than a decade, a man in Maine, without much fuss and without many people paying attention, really, has been bringing thousands of holiday wreaths from Maine to Arlington Cemetery, in Virginia, to decorate the graves of soldiers. This year, people have noticed. Big-time." ABC (Donvan) added, "For 14 years, it was word-of-mouth only that each December, the truck with the wreaths would arrive. Always at dawn, always dignified. With so little notice or with so little notice or fanfare, it was practically a Christmastime secret. Not this year. This year, word got out in a big way. And hundreds of people showed up to help with the wreath-laying."

NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 11, Faw, 9.87M) reported, "Today at Arlington National Cemetery, 5,300 wreaths were distributed. Fresh Maine balsam. Grown, harvested and assembled by Maine businessman Morrill Worcester, devoted father of six. 45 years ago, on his first trip to Washington with newspaper delivery boys, he was awestruck by Arlington." Morrill Worcester: "Many people there gave the ultimate sacrifice. It's something you never forget." Faw: "So 14 years ago, Worcester, now prosperous, decided it only be fitting that Arlington get free wreaths." This year, "there's one big difference. This neighborhood operation is going nationwide, has grown 200-fold. For that, you can thank the Internet. Worcester's Website was so popular, it led to Wreaths Across America which this holiday will distribute them at over 200 veterans' cemeteries."

DOJ_NMG_0106557

USA Today (12/15, 1A, Hampson, 2.27M) reports, "Every December for the past 15 years, Morrill Worcester, owner of one of the world's largest holiday wreath companies, has taken time in the midst of his busiest season to haul a truckload of wreaths to Arlington from his small Downeast Maine town of Harrington. For years, he and a small band of volunteers laid the wreaths in virtual obscurity. But in the last 12 months that has changed, thanks to a dusting of snow last year at the cemetery, an evocative photograph, a sentimental poem and a chain e-mail. And this year, Worcester went national. A new program, "Wreaths Across America," shipped a total of about 1,300 wreaths to more than 200 national cemeteries and vets' memorials in all 50 states."

Bush Error At Press Conference Noted. The Washington Post's (12/15, A33) Al Kamen notes briefly in his "In the Loop" column that at his news conference last week, President Bush said: "I talk to families who die."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorney Travel Time Legislation Sent To Bush. The Washington Post (12/15, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" reports that after a "long flight through Congress, legislation that would permit Justice Department lawyers to claim time off for travel during off-duty hours has been sent to the president for his signature. Congress approved legislation in 2004 creating compensatory time off for federal employees, but the Justice Department decided it did not apply to the department's 9,000 lawyers because of a 1999 congressional restriction that limits their overtime pay. The law permits federal employees to receive time off when they travel on official business during off-duty hours, such as flying on a Sunday to attend a Monday morning meeting. Previous rules made it difficult for employees to qualify for compensation while traveling outside normal business hours." DOJ's "interpretation of the law triggered complaints inside the department. The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents about 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, worked with Congress and the department on a legislative solution."

US Attorney McKay To Resign. The AP (12/14, Johnson) reports US Attorney John McKay, "the Justice Department's top lawyer in Western Washington, said Thursday he will resign next month to return to the private sector. The announcement came the same day McKay was notified that he would not be nominated to be a federal judge in Seattle, but the timing was purely coincidental, he said. McKay had hoped to fill the position created by U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour's elevation to senior status.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sycamore Networks Says It Has Not Fully Complied With DOJ, SEC Subpoenas. The Boston Business Journal (12/14) reports, "Sycamore Networks Inc.'s stock options problems have taken a new twist." The Massachusetts firm "says it hasn't been able to comply fully with subpoenas from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission because a former employee won't cooperate. In a suit filed in Suffolk Superior Court last month, Sycamore says Katherine B. Galli, who helped manage the company's stock option program for several years, has refused to return crucial documents Sycamore needs to respond to the federal investigators."

Dell Delays Filing Of Quarterly Report. Bloomberg (12/14, Guglielmo) reports Dell "delayed filing its quarterly report for the second time this year, citing an accounting probe by government regulators." In an SEC filing, Dell said a "report for the quarter ended Nov. 3 will be filed as soon as possible." Dell "also hasn't submitted a report for the second quarter ended Aug. 4. Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins said in August the SEC has been reviewing the company's revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. Dell disclosed last month the SEC had stepped up the probe into a formal investigation. The U.S. Justice Department is also reviewing the company's accounting."

SEC Probes Coherent's Options Practices. CFO.com (12/14, Taub) reports the SEC is investigating the options granting practices of Coherent Inc., "which makes lasers for commercial and scientific uses." Coherent "assured investors that it intends to cooperate with the inquiry. As a result of the probe, however, Coherent said it will delay the filing of its annual report due to its internal review into its option practices and related accounting."

Apollo Group Says Ex-Officers Backdated. The AP (12/14) reports, "For-profit education provider Apollo Group Inc. said Thursday a special committee found that certain former officers took steps 'that may have been intended to mask failures' in the company's process for approving the grant dates for stock options. In its final findings from its review of past stock option grants, the special panel confirmed preliminary findings that recorded grant dates may not have matched the actual day stock options were granted, but instead coincided with dates on which the company's stock traded at low levels." While such backdating "itself is not illegal," failure to disclose it "can have legal and tax ramifications."

DOJ_NMG_0106558

SEC Loosens Interpretation Of Sarbanes-Oxley Auditing Requirements. The New York Times (12/14, Labaton, 1.16M) reports that the SEC, "responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals," issued a "flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection. In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that has come under attack from many companies. It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. A number of companies have asked to withdraw, and officials said the current rules discouraged companies from listing on United States exchanges if they did not have the option of withdrawing later." The SEC "also adopted a rule that would save corporations the expense of mailing financial reports and proxy statements by enabling them to communicate with the vast majority of their investors through the Internet."

In his Washington Post (12/15, D1, 690K) column, Steven Pearlstein writes, "The tough new federal regulators who were deputized to clean up the accounting industry after Enron, WorldCom and the other scandals have been busy reviewing the work and procedures of the Big Four accounting firms. And guess what? Everything is now hunky-dory. There's no need to worry any longer about channel stuffing, accounting for derivatives or backdating of stock options. The auditors have it covered. We know this because not a single member of any Big Four accounting firm has been sanctioned or censured since the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board opened its doors in 2003. In fact, from what has been made public -- not much -- one might surmise that shoddy auditing has been found exclusively at a handful of small accounting firms."

Wall Street Executives Reap Big Paychecks. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, C1, Craig, Smith, 2.04M) reports, "Record profits at Wall Street's big brokerage firms are already translating into big paychecks for the Street's chief executives, with the first out of the gate, John Mack of Morgan Stanley, hauling in an estimated $41 million. But Mr. Mack's mark, disclosed yesterday evening, is likely to be eclipsed soon by one or more of his rivals. Compensation for Lloyd Blankfein, chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., will exceed $50 million, believed to be a record for big-firm CEOs, according to a person familiar with the matter. Last year, as president of Goldman, Mr. Blankfein made $38 million." Analysts say they "expect a handful of other CEOs could hit $40 million to $50 million or higher, including James Cayne of Bear Stearns Cos., Stan O'Neal of Merrill Lynch & Co. and Richard Fuld of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. The three made $30.3 million, $35.5 million and $34.5 million, respectively, last year."

New SEC Rules Take Effect Today. The Washington Post (12/15, D1, O'Hara, 690K) reports, "Shareholders can expect a clearer picture of how much top executives are paid as new rules go into effect today, requiring companies to clearly explain their compensation practices. The new regulations mark the biggest change to corporate pay disclosure in 25 years. They will force companies to release more information about different kinds of compensation and to more clearly justify those payments." The SEC "ordered the changes this year in response to a rising backlash against annual double-digit percentage increases in executive pay. The Corporate Library said this year that pay for chief executives at more than 1,700 public companies grew 16 percent in 2005, down from 30 percent in 2004."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Launches Criminal Probe Of Federal Oil, Gas Royalties Collection. The New York Times (12/15, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property. The new investigations are still in the early stages, said Congressional officials who were briefed this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator." The probes "are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters."

The AP (12/15, Hebert) reports, "Some members of Congress have estimated that the royalty exemptions have cost the government $2 billion. Allred put the amount at 'somewhat less than $900 million.' Congressional auditors have put the total government loss for past and potential future production under the leases as high as $10 billion."

The Federal Times (12/15, Curl) reports, "Price thresholds are typically included in federal drilling leases that Interior signs with oil companies and they determine when and how much companies must pay the government for the oil it extracts from federal properties. Price thresholds were not included in the drilling leases Interior inked with companies in 1998 and 1999, resulting in those companies not paying any royalties. At Congress' request, the department's inspector general is investigating why they were not included in those leases. A spokesman for the department said the investigation will continue and the report is still expected out in the coming weeks."

DOJ_NMG_0106559

Duke Lacrosse Defense Team Says Accuser Misidentified Accused. The Washington Post/AP (12/15, A10, Scott) reports attorneys for the Duke University lacrosse players accused of rape said in court papers that their clients' accuser "misidentified her alleged attackers in a photo lineup that was 'an incoherent mass of contradiction and error.'" The defense team "filed a motion asking a judge to bar prosecutors from using the photo lineup at their clients' trial and prevent the accuser from identifying the players from the witness stand. Duke University law professor James E. Coleman Jr. said the case would be 'effectively dismissed' if the court finds the lineup inadmissible 'and rules that it is so suggestive that there can't be an in-court identification.'"

Judge Sets April Trial Date For Jeffs. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Dobner, Foy) reports polygamist leader Warren Jeffs "pleaded not guilty Thursday in state district court to two counts of rape by accomplice" for allegedly "forcing a 14-year-old girl to marry and have sex with an older cousin." The AP adds, "A trial was set for April 23. Prosecutors said the girl had no choice but to obey Jeffs, whose influence over his followers has been described as extraordinary, dictating everything from where they live to whom they should marry." The AP notes, "Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list when he was arrested Aug. 28 in a traffic stop north of Las Vegas."

The Deseret Morning News (12/15, Winslow) reports Jeffs "remains jailed in the Purgatory Correctional Facility without bail. Defense lawyers agreed on Thursday to keep him there until they deal with issues of discovery in the case. Should Jeffs ever be granted bail, the FBI filed papers in federal court stating they will take him into custody immediately." The Salt Lake Tribune (12/15, Adams) also reports on the trial, noting that he was on the FBI most wanted list. Additionally, CNN's The Situation Room (12/14, Blitzer), CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (12/14), Fox News' On the Record with Greta Van Susteren (12/14) and Fox News' Studio B with Shepard Smith (12/14) reported on the trial order.

Los Angeles Skid Row Fertile Ground For Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Winton, 850K) reports Los Angeles' "skid row has become a magnet for fraud schemes that use the area's homeless population to rip off the federal government, authorities said this week as they launched a crackdown on the activities. In just the last few months, state and federal investigators have busted two food stamp scams, one of which involved a merchant who allegedly gave homeless people 50 cents on the dollar for their stamps, then charged the entire value -- $6 million -- to the government." In November, charges were filed "against a MacArthur Park-area clinic for allegedly rounding up homeless people with Medi-Cal or Medicare cards and giving them a battery of medical tests charged to government programs. Authorities allege the bogus tests cost taxpayers at least $1.6 million and perhaps much more. Another hospital in South Los Angeles is under investigation to determine whether it recruited homeless people for short stays at federal expense, according to law enforcement sources."

Business Software Alliance Pirated Software "Bounty Program" To Expire. Investor's Business Daily (12/15, Bonasia) writes that "anyone who sees pirated software in the workplace may want to file a report by New Year's Eve, when the Business Software Alliance plans to suspend a year-old bounty program for whistle-blowers. Under the program, the BSA offers rewards of up to $200,000 for workers who provide details about pirated software being used at their company. Payouts are based on reports that lead to a settlement. The rewards program is being put on hold on New Year's Day as a way to motivate workers 'to go from thought to action' in reporting cases before the year ends, said Jenny Blank, chief of enforcement at the BSA. Blank says the program will resume; she didn't say when." The program "seems to work. Tuesday, Burlington Coat Factory paid $300,000 to settle claims it used unlicensed software from Microsoft and McAfee. The BSA also says Payless ShoeSource paid $124,057 to settle claims for unlicensed copies of software from Adobe, Borland, Internet Security Systems, McAfee and Symantec. Payless agreed to delete any unlicensed software and buy replacements. The case was reported through the BSA's online form."

Chinese-Canadian Engineer Charged With Stealing Military Trade Secrets. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Robertson) reports, "A Chinese engineer was charged Thursday with stealing trade secrets from a Silicon Valley company that made military training software and attempting to sell them to Asian governments. Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, a Chinese national with Canadian citizenship, was indicted on 36 felony counts, including the rare charge of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government and various violations of military technology export laws." The AP notes, "Prosecutors say Meng stole the code for software made by his former employer, Quantum3D Inc., that's used to train military fighter pilots, and tried to sell it to the Royal Thai Air Force, the Royal Malaysian Air Force and a company with ties to China's military. … U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the case highlights the threat U.S. businesses face from thieves looking to sell hard-won intellectual property overseas."

DOJ_NMG_0106560

The Washington Times (12/15, Seper, 88K) reports, "The indictment includes three conspiracy counts, three counts of economic espionage and attempted economic espionage, two counts of violations of the Arms Export Control Act, 12 counts of theft of trade secrets and attempted theft of trade secrets, 15 counts of foreign and interstate transportation of stolen property, and three counts of making false statements to a government agency. 'The FBI is committed to aggressively pursue those attempting to illegally obtain and export trade secrets vital to maintaining the United States' position as a world leader in innovation,' said FBI Special Agent in Charge Charlene B. Thornton, who heads the bureau's San Francisco field office. 'Today's indictment highlights the value of cooperation between law enforcement and private industry in effectively conducting these investigations,' she said."

ABC News (12/14, Ryan) noted on its Web site, "FBI counterintelligence officials have deemed China one of the biggest economic and military threats to the United States. This threat has caused the FBI to set up counterintelligence field squads in every field office across the United States to scour for cases exactly like this one. The products Meng allegedly dealt with could be found on banned U.S. export munitions lists."

Two Chinese Immigrants To US Plead Guilty To Economic Espionage. The AP (12/15, Robertson) also reports that in an unrelated case, "Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China, pleaded guilty in San Jose federal court to two counts each of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government as part of a deal with prosecutors. … They were charged with stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from their employers and attempting to smuggle them to China. The indictment alleges they planned to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies." The AP notes, "A business partner who tipped off the FBI told investigators the startup, called Supervision Inc., had received $2 million in funding from two Chinese cities, Hangzhou and Guangzhou, to develop the new microprocessor, according to an affidavit."

Stora Enso Denies Price-Fixing Charges. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/15, Dresang, 255K) reports, "The Finnish parent of Wisconsin-based Stora Enso North America denied Thursday that it conspired to fix the prices it charged for coated papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs in the United States." In a statement issued Thursday, the company said, "Stora Enso denies any wrongdoing and will enter a plea of not guilty when it appears before the court at the arraignment to respond to the indictment." The indictment "alleges that Wisconsin Rapids-based Stora Enso North America illegally set prices through an agreement with competitors from about August 2002 to June 2003. About the time U.S. antitrust authorities from the Justice Department began investigating Stora Enso in May 2004, their counterparts in the European Commission started similar probes in Europe."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Says Dallas County Jail Violates Inmates' Rights. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (12/15, 223K) reports a DOJ report says the "Dallas County Jail, one of the largest in the country, violates the constitutional rights of inmates by failing to provide adequate medical and mental healthcare. … Page after page of violations are detailed in a letter" from DOJ, "which also found that prisoners are not kept in safe or sanitary conditions at the detention complex, the seventh largest in the United States. Among the more egregious examples were an HIV-positive prisoner who died in October 2005 from an infection after his antibiotic was withheld for 11 days and a woman who hanged herself in January 2003. Her records included an inmate request form she filled out two days earlier."

Report Says Los Angeles County Hate Crimes On The Rise. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Rosenblatt, 850K) says reported incidents of hate crimes in Los Angeles County "increased for the first time in four years, while such incidents in schools have more than doubled from last year," according to the annual analysis by the Los Angeles County Commission on Human Relations. The report "tracked hate crimes reported to law enforcement or other agencies, but did not address which ones led to criminal charges or arrests. Conflicts between blacks and Latinos erupted on the streets, in jails and at schools, with school-based hate crimes soaring by 111%. Many of these incidents on or near campus occurred in South Los Angeles." The figure "does not include 11 of 14 large student scuffles last year. The commission did not receive reports on those incidents because it was difficult to determine if they were racially motivated."

New Jersey Legislature Approves Civil Unions Bill. The AP (12/15, Mulvihill) reports, "Ordered by New Jersey's highest court to offer marriage or its equivalent to gay couples, the Legislature voted Thursday to make New Jersey the third state to allow civil unions." Democratic Gov. Jon Corzine "said he would sign the measure, which would extend to same-sex couples all the rights and privileges available under state law to married people. The bill passed the Assembly 56-19 and the Senate 23-12."

The New York Times (12/15, Mansnerus, 1.16M) reports, "The Legislature voted on Thursday to make New Jersey the third state in the nation to recognize civil unions for same-sex couples. In doing so, it moved quickly to fulfill a court mandate to provide equal rights to gay couples but frustrated people on both sides of the emotional issue." New Jersey's "new unions, which would take effect 60 days after the governor gives the nod, would expand on the domestic partnership arrangements the state has had since 2004. Gay couples would gain benefits like adoption privileges, inheritance rights and the ability to take a partner's surname without going to court." But "gay-rights advocates continued to contend Thursday that the separate institutions were inherently unequal and promised to keep pushing for nothing short of marriage itself."

DOJ_NMG_0106561

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Barry, 850K) reports the bill "was hurried through the process in 10 days, giving marriage advocates little ability to argue their case, said Lambda Legal Defense Fund attorney David Buckel, who represented seven couples who sued the state for the right to marry. 'The irony is that the court referred this matter to the legislature because it did not want to short-circuit the democratic process,' he said. 'The legislature is doing just that.'"

Number Of Death Sentences Falls. The New York Times (12/15, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the "number of death sentences in the United States has dropped to its lowest level in decades, according to recent studies, including one released Thursday that predicts the trend will continue because of publicity about cases in which people are wrongly accused of crimes." The Death Penalty Information Center, "a group based in Washington, reported that the number of death sentences, which had remained at about 300 a year in the 1990s, began to drop steadily in 1999 and has declined almost 60 percent since then." At the Justice Department, "the Bureau of Statistics reported last week that there were 128 death sentences in 2005, down from 138 the year before. While the department study does not include an estimate for 2006, the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes the death penalty and tracks cases closely, says the number for this year will be about 114." Defense lawyers, prosecutors, "and groups that study the application of the death penalty all say there are several reasons for the trend. Among them are increased publicity about cases other than murder in which DNA testing resulted in freeing people who had wrongly been convicted of crimes, producing skepticism about the reliability of verdicts; recent Supreme Court decisions requiring that juries be told when life in prison without possibility of parole is an option, and improved legal representation for capital defendants, including a sharp increase in using specialists to develop arguments for mitigation."

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Weinstein, 850K) reports, "Executions in the U.S. declined to their lowest level in a decade this year, according to a study released Thursday by the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes capital punishment. Fifty-three people have been executed this year, with no more scheduled until 2007." That is "down from 60 last year and a significant drop from the peak of 98 executions in 1999, the Washington-based organization said in a year-end report." Two-thirds "of Americans still support capital punishment, the Gallup Poll found this year, but for the first time in two decades, it found that more Americans prefer that the penalty for murder be life without parole rather than death, by 48% to 47%, noted the Death Penalty Information Center."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Rebuts Reback On Telecom Mergers. CNET News.com (12/14, Broache) reports DOD "denied allegations that it fudged the analysis that prompted it to approve two telecommunications megamergers now under scrutiny by a federal judge. In a Thursday filing with U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan in Washington, D.C., Department of Justice lawyers took issue with accusations of wrongdoing lodged by opponents of the twin deals -- between AT&T and SBC Communications, and Verizon and MCI -- at a November 30 court hearing. T he public version of Thursday's document was redacted." Sullivan had given DOJ "the opportunity to respond to a lengthy presentation by Silicon Valley attorney Gary Reback on behalf of the Alliance for Competition in Telecommunications." Reback accused DOJ "of making up facts and ignoring critical considerations while analyzing the competitive impact of the deals. In its court filing, the Justice Department continued to defend its analysis, arguing that the allegations were 'based on mischaracterizations of relevant legal standards, misstatements of United States' positions, and misrepresentations of the factual record.' When approving the mergers, the Justice Department concluded that it needed to place limited condition s-- namely, requirements aimed at ensuring that the companies' competitors could gain access to fiber-optic connections in certain commercial buildings where Verizon and MCI or AT&T and SBC had been the only two companies supplying some types of connections."

FCC Chair Does Not Know When AT&T-BellSouth Merger Will Be Considered. The Washington Post (12/15, D3, Sipress, 690K) reports FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said he "did not know how soon it would consider AT&T's proposed $86 billion acquisition of BellSouth after the deal was left off the agenda for Wednesday's meeting because of a continuing stalemate between the commission's Republican and Democratic members." Martin, who supports the merger, "told reporters he was 'anxious' to set a date for the vote, which would create the country's largest provider of telephone, wireless and broadband services. AT&T and BellSouth have waited more than seven months for the commission to act despite Martin's efforts earlier this year to win quick approval of the transaction without conditions."

DOJ_NMG_0106562

WSJournal Faults Democratic Commissioners For Delay. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A20, 2.04M) editorializes, "Democrats are back in power in Washington, and one question is whether their wilderness years taught them anything about the wisdom of restraint in regulating business. One early sign that they've learned nothing is their behind-the-scenes effort to delay, and maybe deep-six, the $80 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger. The deal has the support of Big Labor, was approved by the Justice Department without conditions in October, and would help consumers by bringing more competition to telecom amid enormous technological change and business ferment. But the merger has been held up for months at the Federal Communications Commission, thanks to the political maneuvering of the two Democratic Commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein. The pair have cited the size of the deal, the volume of public comment it has generated, and even the Justice Department's approval as reasons for delay. But what's really going on here is an old-fashioned regulatory hold up, in the armed-robbery sense of the word."

Airline Merger Talk May Be Mostly Hype. The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Marks, 59K) writes, "Wall Street is so buoyant about possible mergers" among the "last six traditional carriers" in the US airline industry that "you'd think airline consolidation was the best thing for the industry since the jet engine replaced the turbo prop. But an increasing number of analysts are questioning that assumption, and suggesting that all the merger talk may in the end be just that - talk." Aviation consultant Michael Boyd said, "We're in an environment where everyone believes the mantra that consolidation is both necessary and inevitable, but it is neither. The carriers like American, Northwest, and Continental are making money. Why do they have to merge? We have a very competitive system now." The "latest round of merger talk was sparked by United Airlines' chief executive Glenn Tilton reiterating his stance that 'consolidation is good and overdue for the industry' at a shareholder's meeting earlier this week. That prompted a series of still unconfirmed reports that United and Continental Airlines were talking about just such a deal."

Antitrust Waiting Period Expires On Merck-Sirna Deal. The Silicon Valley/San Jose Business Journal (12/14) reports Merck and Sirna Therapeutics said the "federal regulatory antitrust waiting period has expired for Merck's $1.1 billion acquisition of Sirna. … The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the sale conditions, and the companies said consummation of the merger -- which is expected to occur in late December or early in the first quarter of 2007 -- remains subject to other customary closing conditions including approval by Sirna stockholders."

The AP (12/14) says Sirna "focuses on developing RNA interference, or gene-silencing technology. Drugs and treatments using the technology target specific genes at the root of a condition or disease, aiming to shutdown that gene, rendering the condition, such as a type of cancer, inactive."

US, European Firms To Buy Stake In German Broadcaster. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, C4, Esterl, 2.04M) reports, "The controlling shareholders of ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG have agreed to sell their stake in the German broadcaster to private-equity firms Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. of the U.S. and Permira of Europe, according to people familiar with the matter. The bid for Germany's largest television broadcaster by advertising revenue was in the range of €28 to €29, or about $37 to $38, a share, valuing ProSiebenSat.1 at a bit less than €6 billion, or about $8 billion, these people said."

Hearst Expects To Complete Newspaper Acquisition Today. Editor & Publisher (12/14) reports Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Torrance, California, Daily Breeze "on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators."

Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard. The AP (12/14) reports catheter maker Rochester Medical said it "reached a $49 million settlement with medical devices company C.R. Bard Inc. Under the terms of the agreement, Rochester Medical will dismiss C.R. Bard from a lawsuit it filed in March 2004 against C.R. Bard, Tyco International Ltd., Tyco Healthcare Group LP, Novation LLC, VHA Inc. and Premier Purchasing Partners LP. The lawsuit alleged that C.R. Bard, among others, conspired to exclude it from the market and violated antitrust laws."

Bond Market Antitrust Probe Could Spawn More Suits. Bloomberg (12/14, Rowley) reports, "The federal criminal antitrust probe into the municipal bond market that has yielded more than a dozen subpoenas of brokers, bankers and insurers may also lead to a spate of civil lawsuits by cities," according to antitrust expert Herbert Hovenkamp. Civil claims "typically follow in the wake of successful criminal price-fixing investigations by the U.S. Justice Department." Hovenkamp said that if it "turns out there is a nationwide conspiracy to fix interest rates' of investment contracts sold to local governments, 'it's got to be big.'"

DOJ_NMG_0106563

Samsung, LCD Makers Could Face Massive Antitrust Penalties. Bloomberg (12/15, Cho) reports Samsung and "liquid-crystal display makers in Taiwan and Japan may face the largest antitrust penalty ever after a probe of possible price-fixing in the $69 billion industry. Fines may exceed $1 billion should authorities in the U.S., Europe, Japan and Korea uncover panel makers colluded." This week, LG.Philips LCD said it was "under investigation, spurring a two-day stock slide that erased about $1.6 billion in market value from the top five producers. Fines from the probe would undermine earnings in an industry where panel prices are forecast to slide more than 25 percent this year."

Japan Returns To International Acquisitions Scene. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A1, Morse, Singer, 2.04M) reports, "After a long retreat from the global mergers-and-acquisitions scene in the 1990s and early 2000s, Japanese companies are once again on the prowl. With the population of Japan expected to shrink rapidly in coming years, many Japanese firms are looking to tap into growing overseas markets quickly by acquiring existing companies. So far this year, Japanese firms have bought 294 foreign companies for a total of $18.1 billion, more than in all of 2005 and double the figure in 2004." Japan's "big banks and financial conglomerates are scouting rapidly growing markets in the U.S., China and elsewhere for growth opportunities.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Department Approves Mohawk Casino Project. The New York Times (12/15, Bagli, 1.16M) reports that after "more than 10 years of delays, tribal recriminations and opposition from Atlantic City gambling interests, the effort to build a Las Vegas-style casino in the Catskills took a major step forward yesterday." The Interior Department "approved an environmental review of the St. Regis Mohawk Indian tribe's $600 million project. Proponents say the casino will bring thousands of jobs and tens of millions of dollars in revenue to a once thriving resort area known as the Borscht Belt."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Arrests College Student Over Pipe Bombs. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/15, Cato) reports ATF agents "arrested a California University of Pennsylvania student Thursday after tests showed he was storing numerous pipe bombs in his dorm room and his parents' Upper St. Clair home." Michael Blattner was charged with "unlawful possession and manufacture of destructive devices." US Magistrate Judge Francis X. Caiazza "set bond at $10,000 and ordered that Blattner undergo medical or psychiatric treatment. Blattner is being held in a Pittsburgh halfway house for observation, said Tom Stankiewicz, assistant special agent in charge of the Philadelphia ATF office. ATF agents and members of the Allegheny County Bomb Squad raided Blattner's dorm room and his parents' house Dec. 5. They collected numerous pipe bombs, materials and tools." Agents "recovered at least 22 pipe bombs from the two locations, court documents state. The explosive devices were wrapped in black electrical tape and ranged from 2 to 4 inches in length. Also seized were journals containing detailed plans for making improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. One drawing was titled 'medium pipebomb' and another 'Planted IED,' court documents show. Agents also found fragments from at least one exploded device, tools such as drills, ammunition used to create the explosive charge and shrapnel."

FBI Honors Philly Labor Leader With Director's Community Leadership Award. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/15, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "The FBI honored a local labor leader yesterday for her crime-prevention efforts in Philadelphia. Janet Hammond Ryder is vice president of labor participation for the United Way of Southeastern Pennsylvania, director for labor participation for the Philadelphia Council AFL-CIO, and cohost of the weekly Labor to Neighbor show on WURD-AM (900). Ryder received the FBI Director's Community Leadership Award for her efforts to combat poverty, violence, drugs, gangs, and crime by reinforcing the value of education for inner-city youths." The Philadelphia Daily News (12/15, 106K) also briefly reported on Ryder's award.

Boston Columnist Calls FBI Fighting Of Civil Suit "A Disgrace." In a Boston Globe (12/15, 413K) column titled "A Travesty of Justice," Brian McGrory writes, "Spend a couple of days -- or, for that matter, a couple of minutes…listening to testimony in the lawsuit brought by four wrongfully convicted men against the FBI, and a few simple questions come to mind. Why is the federal government fighting this? … Why are 40-year-old documents being kept secret? Why isn't there a single person in the Justice Department with a shred of common sense?" McGrory adds, "FBI Director Robert Mueller ought to fly to Boston, all right, but rather than offer absurd excuses to" US District Judge Nancy Gertner," he needs to extend apologies and big payouts to the men who were framed by his agency so many decades ago and the families that have survived them." McGrory contrasts the case with the Brandon Mayfield settlement and concludes, "What the FBI and the rest of the Justice Department are doing in this trial isn't just an embarrassment, but a disgrace -- and it will undoubtedly prove to be an expensive one at that."

DOJ_NMG_0106564

Two Ecoterror Suspects Plead Guilty To Vail ELF Arson. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/15, Barnard) reports, "Two people who have admitted helping in the $12 million arson of a Vail, Colo., ski resort as part of an ecoterrorism campaign formally pleaded guilty Thursday to federal arson charges. Chelsea Dawn Gerlach and Stanislas Gregory Meyerhoff, both 29, had already pleaded guilty to some of the $20 million worth of arsons committed between 1996 and 2001 by a Eugene-based cell of the Earth Liberation Front known as the Family. Under plea deals with federal prosecutors, they agreed to have charges from the 1998 Vail arson transferred from Colorado to Oregon to be settled along with their other cases." The AP notes, "The Vail arson focused national attention on radical environmentalists who ascribed their attacks to the secretive Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, characterized by the FBI as the nation's top domestic terrorism threats. The investigation went nowhere for years until a task force found an informant who got old friends to talk about the crimes in recorded conversations.

FBI, Police Departments Improve Training On Islamic Culture. Under the headline "Shiite? Sunni? Some In US Learn Who's Who," the Christian Science Monitor (12/15, MacDonald, 59K) reports, "Some in Congress may need a primer on Islamic extremists. Five years after 9/11, three members of the House Intelligence Committee in recent interviews couldn't answer basic questions about who's Sunni and who's Shiite in the Muslim world. But other American institutions are already boning up - especially when they have a stake in doing so." The Monitor notes, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation, for instance, will emphasize Muslim culture when it expands introductory training for new agents from 18 to 21 weeks next month. In upcoming sessions, trainees will 'drill down deeper' than they have in the past, for instance, into differences between radical Shiite cultures and radical Sunni ones, says Keith Slotter, assistant director of the FBI's training division. For the first time, new agent training will also cover dynamics surrounding suicide bombing. 'When a person from another culture says something, the meaning behind the words may not be the literal translation that an agent might want to jump to,' Mr. Slotter says. 'There are so many different nuances and aspects [that] to be an effective interviewer ... you're going to need those cultural skills.' Urban police are taking similar steps."

FBI Investigating Alleged Improper Work By Murphy Staff Members. KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (12/14) reported from a broadcast story, "A federal investigation is underway after allegations surfaced against US Rep. Tim Murphy. Sources tell KDKA federal agents have begun interviewing former Murphy staffers on whether they did political work for the congressman on government time. Murphy denies the allegations. … But while neither the FBI nor the U.S. Attorney's office will confirm or deny an investigation, the probe concerns just that." KDKA added, "'There were several times when staff was asked and basically pressured into doing campaign activities,' said Jayne O'Shaughnessy, a former staffer for Murphy. Documents obtained by KDKA at least suggest that."

FBI Searching For Fugitive Texas Official Wanted On Child Rape Charges. KRGV-TV Harlingen (12/14) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "There's now a federal arrest warrant for the Hidalgo County District Clerk. The FBI and Texas Rangers have joined the search for Omar Guerrero. He's looking at charges of avoiding prosecution. Federal agents believe Guerrero has left the state and possibly the country. … The federal warrant authorizes agents to arrest Guerrero anywhere in the world." KRGV noted, "Police say Guerrero raped a 15-year-old girl."

Florida FCI Guards Sentenced To Probation, Prison For Sex-With-Prisoners Scheme. The Tallahassee Democrat (12/15, Subramanyam, 50K) reports, "Two former federal correctional officers charged in connection with a sex-with-prisoners scandal were sentenced Thursday after they pleaded guilty to mail fraud. Vincent Johnson was sentenced to one year probation and Alfred Barnes to one year in prison with three years of supervised release. Chief Judge Robert L. Hinkle dismissed all other charges. … A third officer, E. Lavon Spence, was scheduled for sentencing Thursday after pleading guilty to mail fraud." The Democrat notes, "Johnson, Barnes and Spence were among five correctional officers arrested June 21 at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout at the prison after he opened fire on federal agents. A federal agent died, and a Bureau of Prisons employee was injured." The AP (12/15, Royse) adds, "The judge said he lightened Alfred Barnes' punishment in part because he cooperated with prosecutors in the case."

Philadelphia Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life For Murdering Witness. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/15, Shaw, 385K) reports, "Felix Summers -- the reputed South Philadelphia drug dealer authorities say was at the center of a web of witness-retaliation and drug killings in his neighborhood -- was sentenced yesterday to life in prison without parole. Summers, 25, was convicted last month in the March 1999 shooting death of Charlotte Presley, 39, a witness against him in another homicide." To the life sentence, Common Pleas Court Judge Carolyn Engel Temin added "30 to 60 months for witness retaliation," which Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega said "highlights the fact that this is not just a murder." The Inquirer notes, "Summers was also charged in the Aug. 16, 2001, shooting death of Veronica Rios, 15, a bystander who was" killed in the murder of another witness. "The FBI added Summers to its 10 Most Wanted list after Rios' slaying."

DOJ_NMG_0106565

FBI Detains Disruptive Continental Flight Passenger In Texas. KHOU-TV Houston (12/14) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A passenger onboard Continental flight from Hawaii to Houston who reportedly caused some type of disturbance onboard the aircraft is in federal custody. Noboru Akao arrived at federal court downtown Thursday morning, in shackles and an orange uniform." KWTX-TV Waco (12/14) noted, "According to an FBI press release, witnesses told FBI agents the man was disruptive and combative and groped a female flight attendant during the last two-and-a-half hours of the flight. The FBI said the man trashed a lavatory and eventually was restrained with flex cuffs to curb 'his increasingly aggressive behavior.'" The Houston Chronicle (12/15, George, 530K) reports Akao "had mixed his medication during the trip, federal authorities said Thursday. … Federal prosecutor Michael Schultz declined to specify the medications in open court." The Chronicle notes, "Houston police arrested Akao on Wednesday morning and handed him over to the FBI after the flight arrived at George Bush Intercontinental Airport."

US Agents' Business Cards Found Taped To Body In Mexico. The El Paso Times (12/14) reported U.S. law enforcement agencies "were informed by their Mexican counterparts that a man found murdered in Juárez last month had the bloodied business cards of two U.S. agents taped to his forehead. The victim, who has not been identified, was dropped from a van at the Chamizal park in Juárez on the afternoon of Nov. 23. The man had the cards of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent Raul Bencomo and of a DEA agent with the first name Todd stuck to his forehead with masking tape." Officials with ICE and DEA "confirmed they were told about the cards found on the Chamizal body by Mexican authorities, but said they were not part of any investigation."

The AP (12/15, Caldwell) reports photographs of the victim "published in…the Spanish-language newsapaper El Diario de El Paso, show one of the business cards is from Raul M. Bencomo, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent. Bencomo oversaw a controversial drug informant who led authorities to the bodies of about a dozen men buried in the yard of a Juarez house in 2004. The second card, which is barely legible in the photos, is believed to be from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent." Media outlets that used the AP story include FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, and Dallas Morning News.

On its Web site, KDBC-TV, El Paso, Texas (12/15) reports, "On the front page of the Diario today... a story about a possible DEA Informant found murdered. The newspaper worries this story may have something to do with a suspicious car found in their parking lot. Diario Employees found a car with Mexican plates and the Diario logo on it in front of their building. The Mexican Woman driving it says she was sent for a job interview, but could not explain why she was driving the car or who sent her there."

Local TV Coverage. KTSM-TV, El Paso, Texas (12/14, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Juarez police say execution style murders are becoming more frequent and more gruesome. Just last month an unidentified man was found at the Chamizal Park murdered with two bloodied business cards taped to his forehead. One card belonged to an Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent, the second to a DEA agent. One of the man's fingers had also been cut off and shoved into his mouth."

KVIA-TV, El Paso, Texas (12/14, 10:00 p.m.) noted a front-page story which ran in Thursday morning's edition of El Diario. KVIA reported, "The story outlines the murder of an alleged DEA informant whose body was found mutilated and dumped in the Chamizal Park in Ciudad Juarez."

US Attorney Says Cyclist's Indictment In BALCO Investigation Marks New Phase. There are nearly 400 media references to the grand jury indictment of former world silver medalist cyclist Tammy Thomas. Most media outlets used the AP story. The AP (12/15) reports former world silver medalist cyclist Tammy Thomas "was the latest sports figure and first athlete to be indicted for hindering the three-year-old [federal steroids] probe. She faces three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice." Kevin Ryan, the U.S. attorney for Northern California, "said Thursday's indictment, along with last month's obstruction of justice charges against track coach Trevor Graham, marks a new phase in the BALCO investigation. 'A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury,' he said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/14, 384K) reported a former world-class cyclist who "was caught up in the BALCO steroid scandal was indicted Thursday on charges of lying to a federal grand jury about her use of banned drugs. … Thomas also testified that she had never taken steroids and had never obtained steroids from anyone, according to the indictment. All the statements were lies, according to the indictment, which was handed up by a grand jury in San Francisco."

DOJ_NMG_0106566

The New York Times (12/15, Wilson, 1.16M) reports the federal grand jury investigating steroid use in sports "yesterday indicted…Thomas for perjury and obstruction of justice, charging that she lied to another grand jury looking into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroids case. Thomas received a lifetime competition ban in 2002 from the United States Anti-Doping Agency after she tested positive for the previously undetectable steroid norbolethone. … Thomas…testified to a grand jury in 2003 that she had never taken performance-enhancing drugs or received them from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who worked with BALCO in Burlingame, Calif."

The New York Daily News (12/15, 729K) reports the indictment "accuses Thomas of lying when she told the grand jury in 2003 that she never used performance-enhancing drugs. It also said she lied when she said she did not receive illegal drugs from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who created the once-undetectable steroid THG. Each charge carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/15, 229K) reports a turn of events Thursday in the BALCO case "sent a chilling message to athletes connected to the inquiry: Anyone who allegedly lied to a federal grand jury investigating the use of drugs in sports could find themselves in a legal bind. Former world-class cyclist Tammy Thomas, now a law student in Michigan, became the first athlete indicted in the BALCO scandal when she was charged Thursday with three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice. She faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine."

Bloomberg (12/14) reported Thomas "declined to comment when reached by phone at her home in Lansing, Michigan. Thomas was banned for life from competitive cycling by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency in 2002 after testing positive for the steroid norbolethone. It was the second time she failed a drug test. She tested positive for elevated testosterone at the 2000 U.S. Olympic Trials."

Local TV Coverage. KTVU-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (12/14, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "The latest grand jury meeting here inside the federal building in San Francisco today indicted its first athlete for perjury. The indictment charges cyclist and former silver medallist Tammy Thomas with three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice for allegedly lying to a grand jury investigating BALCO's performance-enhancing drugs. She denied ever taking them."

KOVR-TV, Sacramento-Stockton-Modesto (12/14, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Tammy Thomas was indicted today by a federal grand jury. She is accused of hindering the [steroids] probe. Prosecutors say Thomas lied to the jury investigating a [steroid] ring which has affected many sports."

WLBT-TV, Jackson, Mississippi (12/14, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Former elite cyclist and Yazoo City native Tammy Thomas has been indicted in the government's ongoing steroid probe. Thomas is accused of three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice for allegedly lying to a federal grand jury. The grand jury was investigating a steroid ring that spanned across many sports."

In Wisconsin, 33 Charged In Cocaine-Ring Investigation. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/14, Doege, 255K) reported a federal grand jury "indicted 33 people Thursday on charges linking large-scale cocaine suppliers in Milwaukee to a tightly controlled network of dealers in Waukesha. The indictments and arrests, officials say, dried up the primary source of cocaine in the city of Waukesha while taking a handful of large-scale operators off the streets of Milwaukee. The charges result from a lengthy probe begun quietly in January 2004 by Waukesha County narcotics investigators whose work revealed that a single network of people was responsible for a large share of the cocaine finding its way into Waukesha. … 'I think that you can determine the significance of this case by the number of people arrested and the scope of their activity,' said James Bohn, assistant special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration."

Seventeen Arrested In New York Drug Sweep. The Plattsburgh (NY) Press Republican (12/14) reported law-enforcement agencies "rounded up 17 people early Wednesday morning and charged them with numerous drug-related crimes. Most of the accused live in and around Plattsburgh and are suspected of dealing marijuana, heroin, methamphetamines, cocaine and crack. … DEA Resident Agent in Charge James T. Farnsworth said the arrests came after months of investigation and surveillance. He said it is becoming more common for people from the New York City area to move to the North Country to sell drugs because they can fetch a higher price here."

Five Pennsylvanians Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Heroin. The Times Leader (12/14) reported five people from Hazleton and Freeland "were indicted last week in connection with an alleged heroin distribution conspiracy that operated in the Hazleton area since January. … The charges stem from an investigation by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and Pennsylvania State Police."

DEA Says Texas Drug Ring Smuggled Proceeds In Detergent Containers. On its Web site, KSAT-TV, San Antonio, Texas (12/14) reports a San

DOJ_NMG_0106567

Antonio-based cocaine-smuggling ring "has been put out of business by the Drug Enforcement Agency, resulting in the seizure of 210 kilograms of cocaine, $4.5 million in cash and arrests of 29 people, including an elementary school teacher and an elderly woman." DEA agent Joe Arabit "said that the ring had been in operation for the past few years and had its roots in San Antonio, Floresville and Eagle Pass." The drugs "were smuggled from Mexico and distributed throughout Texas, Tennessee and Ohio, Arabit said. The proceeds from the sale of the drugs were then smuggled in containers of powdered detergent and large buckets of construction material."

Five Canadians Face Charges For Roles In Drug-Smuggling Scheme. In Calgary, the Globe and Mail (12/14) reported a long-running international smuggling operation that "used small planes to ferry illegal drugs between Alberta and Montana has been dismantled by police, who said yesterday that five Canadians face charges in connection with the plot. The nine-month investigation, dubbed Project IDEA, resulted in the seizure of $5.2-million worth of drugs, including 500 kilograms of marijuana, 30 kilograms of cocaine, 9,000 tablets of diazepam and 210 vials of ketamine." Authorities "worked with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and U.S. Immigration Customs Enforcement to crack what Insp. McCallum described as an 'independent' operation."

The Calgary Sun (12/14) reported the drugs "have a combined street value of $5.2 million and were all seized in the United States."

Marijuana Bust In New Hampshire Called Largest In State's History. In Concord, the Eagle Tribune (12/14) reported police "seized four local homes and millions of dollars worth of marijuana plants…in what officials are calling the largest bust of its kind in the state's history." Police said homes "were being used as labs to grow thousands of marijuana plants. … In all, 10 homes in nine New Hampshire towns were seized, six people were arrested and $24 million worth of marijuana was recovered. Local and state police descended on the homes simultaneously…in the culmination of an investigation that included the U.S. Attorney's Office, the state Attorney General, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Manchester's Union Leader (12/15) reports Chau Kelley, a board member with the Vietnamese Community of New Hampshire, "said a growing number of law-abiding Vietnamese immigrants in New Hampshire have become aware of organized crime rings in their midst. This week, as investigators orchestrated what may be the largest marijuana seizure in the state's history, those fears seemed to be confirmed. Law enforcement officials uncovered a massive drug ring Wednesday, confiscating $24 million worth of marijuana plants from 10 upscale homes along the Interstate 93 corridor. Most of the homeowners had Vietnamese last names."

Man Accused Of Transporting Tons Of Marijuana Captured In Arizona. KVOA-TV, Tucson (12/15) reports on its Web site that DEA agents say they've "captured a high-profile drug runner right here in Tucson. His name is Carlos Molinares Nunez, and agents say he's responsible for moving tons and tons of marijuana through the Naco and Sasabe corridor." DEA officials "say his arrest has eliminated a significant source of supply for other drug trafficking organizations within the U.S. Molinares reportedly distributed marijuana from California to Florida."

DEA Agent Says California Dispensary Sells Marijuana For Nonmedical Use. In Oakland, the Daily Review (12/14) reported the owner and manager arrested in Tuesday's federal raid on the Local Patients Cooperative "were released on bond after their first court appearance Wednesday." According to the Daily Review, DEA agent Kenny Lee's affidavit says, "I believe that Hayward Local Patients Co-op attempts to disguise the breadth of its criminal activity by claiming that it caters exclusively to persons suffering from medical illnesses, when in fact persons without any medical condition can purchase marijuana ... at the retail establishment."

The Oakland (CA) Tribune (12/14, Richman) reported agents "arrested the two Tuesday on suspicion of conspiracy, marijuana distribution, and maintaining drug-involved premises. Drug Enforcement Administration and Internal Revenue Service agents raided the Foothill Boulevard cooperative and each suspect's home."

Michigan Doctor Released On Bond In Painkiller Case. The Toledo (OH) Blade (12/14) reported a suburban Detroit physician "accused of illegally prescribing painkillers to patients at his Toledo practice was released from federal custody…on a $500,000 property bond. U.S. District Judge James Carr allowed the release of Dr. Leo M. Ognen during a detention hearing in Toledo. … Ognen was indicted last week on drug conspiracy and drug distribution charges for writing prescriptions for millions of dollars worth of painkillers. The charges stem from a Drug Enforcement Administration investigation and search of the physician's former office…and a Toledo home owned by him and his wife."

Mexican Embassy Identifies Man Killed At Hospital As Drug Cartel Member. The El Paso

DOJ_NMG_0106568

Times (12/15) reports a man who "narrowly survived a street shooting in Juárez only to be followed by his attackers inside a hospital and killed Tuesday was one of the men who was videotaped unloading drugs from a crashed SUV during a standoff in Hudspeth County in January. César Alonso Gándara Reyes, 30, was first shot at...in a neighborhood near the Zaragoza Bridge on Tuesday afternoon, Juárez police said. He was transported to the Clínica Zaragoza…by someone who quickly left the hospital. While Gándara was being treated for his wounds, a group of men pretending to be police officers shot him on a gurney." According to the Times, Gándara was identified on the Mexican Embassy Web site as a member of the Escajeda family, a cell of the Juárez drug cartel. Thursday, DEA officials "said they had no information about Gándara's death."

IMMIGRATION:

Minneapolis Spot Known For Fake IDs Open In Spite Of Raids. The AP (12/14) reported a spot in Minneapolis "notorious for the sales of fake identifications was open for business this week despite the message immigration enforcers hoped to send with the recent high-profile raid on a Worthington meat packing plant. Even the New York Times reported last summer on the spot - the parking lot of the Kmart department store on Lake Street - and when a reporter for Minnesota Public Radio went there he found four young men with fake IDs to sell." A young man who spoke on condition of anonymity said the ICE raid "wouldn't slow down the trade in fake IDs because thousands of people will move in to replace those who were arrested."

Scholar Says Immigration Laws Create "Impossible Situation" For Employers. Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K) writes that while ICE's worksite immigration raids of six Swift & Co. meatpacking plants Tuesday could be seen as "perfectly justified," there is one "catch: Swift has been trying for years to comply with our poorly conceived immigration laws, coping as best it could with an impossible situation. Like a driver who finally goes through a broken traffic light, the company and its workers aren't the problem -- the system is." Jacoby continues, "Don't misunderstand: Swift is no band of saints. Everyone involved -- the company, its workers, the US government -- knows that the kind of compliance required to pass muster today is a charade. But it is a charade our dysfunctional immigration system has all but forced the firm and its workers to play."

Report About Illegals' Effect On Texas Economy Prompts Debate. The Washington Post (12/15, A2, Fears, 690K) reports Texas State Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn's recent finding that "Illegal immigrants not only pay their fair share in taxes, but…are also good for the economy" has "sparked "a war of words over illegal immigration" in the state. State Rep. Leo Berman, "who introduced legislation that would bar Texas from recognizing children born to illegal immigrants in American hospitals as US citizens, called the report 'outrageous.'" The Post adds, "An official state document that contradicts the idea that immigrants are a financial burden can carry considerable weight as Democrats take control of Congress, and as potential candidates consider their options in the 2008 presidential election."

Immigration Laws Said To Create "Impossible Situation" For Employers. Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/15, A35, 690K) writes that while ICE's worksite immigration raids of six Swift & Co. meatpacking plants Tuesday could be seen as "perfectly justified," there is one "catch: Swift has been trying for years to comply with our poorly conceived immigration laws, coping as best it could with an impossible situation. Like a driver who finally goes through a broken traffic light, the company and its workers aren't the problem -- the system is." Jacoby continues, "Don't misunderstand: Swift is no band of saints. Everyone involved -- the company, its workers, the US government -- knows that the kind of compliance required to pass muster today is a charade. But it is a charade our dysfunctional immigration system has all but forced the firm and its workers to play."

Congress To Take Another Look At Border Fence Legislation. Fox News (12/14, Porteus) reported on its website, "The 700-mile border fence Congress approved for construction in a session-ending deal was little more than a fast act of political cosmetics in an election year and may never come to fruition, say immigration advocates looking ahead to the Democratic-led 110th Congress." Rep. Bennie Thompson, who "will re-evaluate the border fence issue" as chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, "has said that while a physical fence may be a good idea in some urban areas, the issue is broader than a physical barrier." Fox added, "The border fence has come under fire from Democrats and pro-immigration groups as well as some Republicans who say erecting a fence isn't a substitute for comprehensive immigration reform." Meanwhile, "Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have both signaled concern about the border fence, and are looking to technology for a more politically satisfying solution."

TAX:

DOJ_NMG_0106569

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Johnson Responsive After Brain Surgery. The AP (12/15, Jalonick, Raum) reports, "Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition but was described as recovering and holding his wife's hand Thursday after emergency overnight surgery to repair bleeding inside his brain. … 'He has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required,' said the physician, Adm. John Eisold. He had said earlier, 'The senator is recovering without complication.'"

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 3, 2:10, Attkisson, 7.66M) said "it's too early for a long-term prognosis," while ABC World News (12/14, story 3, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "the political prognosis has Washington preoccupied." ABC (Tapper) added, "In the political arena, Democrats worry about their paper-thin Senate majority. 51 votes to 49. If Johnson's Senate seat becomes vacant, South Dakota's Republican Governor, Mike Rounds, would likely appoint a Republican to replace him, creating a 50-50 Senate with Vice President Cheney the tie breaker. The Republicans would again control the Senate." Along similar lines, the AP (12/15, Kuhnhenn) reports this morning, "Suddenly, the Democrats' grip on the Senate looks very tenuous indeed."

The Argus Leader (12/15, Harriman) reports "incoming Sen. Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., maintained a hopeful demeanor even as speculation was at its darkest Thursday morning before news that Johnson was regaining consciousness was widely distributed. Reid said he had visited Johnson in the hospital before and after surgery. '"To me, he looked good,' Reid said in a press conference and predicted a full recovery for Johnson." USA Today (12/15, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Reid also "said he is continuing to organize for a Senate run by his party. 'There isn't a thing that has changed,' said Reid."

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A5, Rogers, Lueck, 2.04M) notes that "if Mr. Johnson is recovering but still hospitalized when the new Congress convenes in January, Democrats would retain a 50-49 majority and be able to organize under Mr. Reid." But "dates here mean less since, unlike the House, Senate rules permit that body to reorganize at a later date in the new Congress if the balance of power changes." On its website, meanwhile, Time (12/14, Tumulty, 4.03M) pondered the possibility of Republicans filibustering the organizing resolution" in January. That scenario, says Time, presents a "truly extraordinary possibility: a chamber with a new Democratic leader, but the existing set of Republican committee chairmen. That is because, until an organizing resolution is passed, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid would have no control over the committees. "

However, politicians of both parties are refusing to speculate on that possibility. The New York Times (12/15, Zernike, 1.16M) reports "even some Republican lawmakers and aides criticized news coverage of Mr. Johnson's illness as ghoulish, saying it put too much emphasis on who would control the Senate and not enough on his health." Sen. Trent Lott "brushed off questions about procedures if the membership split 50-50," and Sen. Mitch McConnell "issued a statement titled 'The recovery of Senator Tim Johnson' -- emphasis on recovery. 'I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery,' he said. 'Our thoughts are with his wife, Barbara, and his family during this time.'" Democratic "aides said they had not received any Republican requests to discuss any power-sharing rules." On Fox News (12/14, MacCallum), Lott said, "In the end, while it may not appear like it sometimes, we are sort of a full Senate family. And we know each others' spouses, and we do have more of a bond than people realize. So we're all just shocked and hoping for the very best. … My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back and we'll go to work. You know, I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

USA Today (12/15, Harriman, Kiely, 2.27M) reports "Johnson's office was filled Thursday with flowers and cards brought by a steady stream of well-wishers rooting for the senator's recovery from brain surgery. One card was delivered by Benjamin Ready, a field representative for Republican Sen. John Thune." The White House also wished Johnson a speedy recovery. The Washington Times (12/15, Hurt, 88K), McClatchy (12/15, Talev), Bloomberg (12/15, Roberts) and CQ (12/15) run similar stories.

Meanwhile, a number of news reports suggest a hypothetical long-term incapacitation would not necessarily lead to Johnson's departure from the Senate. The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Parsons, Manier, 617K) reports, "As long as a senator is alive, there is no way to legally remove him or her from office for health reasons, experts said." And the Los Angeles Times (12/15, Hook, 850K), in a story titled "Senate Is Loath To Remove Disabled Members," says that is "an enduring tradition in one of the world's most exclusive clubs: Never has the Senate forced its members out of office because they have become physically or mentally incapable of serving." That "hands-off protocol could be a big boon to Democrats."

ABC World News (12/14, story 4, 1:45, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported "Republicans really are signaling that they're going to give" Johnson "all the time he needs to recover. They're not going to make a political issue, even if he's gone from the chamber for a long period of time. As one aide told me, 'He's family.'" The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 5, 1:20, Borger, 7.66M) also said "Republicans are staying very far away from the conversation about just who is going to control the Senate at least for now. As one Republican said to me, 'This is not the way we want to win back the Senate.'" NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 2, Reid, 9.87M), meanwhile, noted that "political scientist Sarah Binder says Johnson can keep his seat even if he becomes incapacitated." Sarah Binder: "South Dakota law, when it defines vacancy mentions vacancy caused by death, resignation, expulsion. It does not make any reference to incapacitated Senators." Reid: "In fact, since 1942, eight US Senators have been absent for months, even years, due to serious illness without resigning. One is still serving. Joe Biden of Delaware spent more than six months recovering from brain aneurysm surgery in 1988."

DOJ_NMG_0106570

The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Babington, 690K) reports, "Although Johnson's illness was the talk of Washington yesterday, politicians in both parties refrained from publicly discussing how the two-term senator's illness might affect the incoming 110th Congress. A few Democratic lobbyists and their spouses were dining Wednesday night at Sesto Senso, an Italian restaurant near Dupont Circle. As they discussed Johnson's condition, they folded their hands as if praying for him, a gesture that appeared tinged with political as well as heartfelt sentiments."

Johnson is suffering from a condition called arteriovenous malformation, or AVM. The Washington Post (12/15, A4, Brown, 690K) reports "the experience of other people who have suffered bleeding from arteriovenous malformations inside the brain suggests that…Johnson…has at least a 50-50 chance of full recovery. … Many people harbor arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) unknowingly for decades. When they bleed, 10 to 15 percent of patients die within hours, 35 percent suffer permanent disability and about 50 percent recover more or less completely." The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A5, Lueck, 2.04M), in a similar assessment titled "Senator's Chances Are Mixed For Recovery From Rare Disorder," says that "if he regains function quickly after surgery, recovery might take only a month or so. If he doesn't bounce back quickly, prospects for recovery are more variable and uncertain, but can take six months to a year." USA Today (12/15, 1A, Kiely, 2.27M) notes "patients with Johnson's condition frequently require a second operation to remove the problem blood vessels, according Sean Grady, chief of neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania." Grady "said such operations 'can pose a very high risk' depending on where the damaged blood vessels are in the brain." The New York Times and Los Angeles Times (12/15, Maugh, 850K) also run features on AVM.

The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 4, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Dr. Jon Lappok, who said, "We don't know again the specifics of the Senator's situation, so we can't say anything about him, but in general, patients can make a complete and total recovery." NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 3, Williams, 9.87M) spoke to Dr. Nancy Snyderman, who said, "The first 24 hours are crucial for normal complications after any kind of brain surgery like this. I think people are really watching because this happened in the temporal lobe, the part of the brain where speech and understanding of words happen. Every minor change in the ability to understand, the ability to articulate words, those can be seen as monumental steps, not in the next couple of hours or days but in the next couple of months." The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Levey, 850K) reports that "because the senator made it through the operation without incident, his odds of survival are high, experts said. However, it is unclear whether or to what extent he might be afflicted with permanent impairment."

News stories this morning describe the senator as an assuming and independent lawmaker. The AP (12/15, Kellman) reports he is "a rare senator who almost never has sought the spotlight. Asked by a local columnist if he ever tires of being described as boring, Johnson replied: Not at all." But "long before the two-term senator's medical crisis this week, Johnson won national attention by keeping Democrats guessing about whether they could count on his vote. He bucked his party by being only one of three Democrats to vote to confirm Justice Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court. He voted to ban late-term abortions. He said yes to a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning, anathema to most in his party." And "then there was perhaps the defining vote of Johnson's career: whether to authorize the use of military force in Iraq. Johnson voted yes, though he had a very personal reason to vote no: his oldest son, Brooks. Then 32 and a staff sergeant with the Army's 101st Airborne Division, Brooks would be among the first sent to the region, Johnson knew." The New York Times (12/15, Davey, 1.16M) titles its profile of Johnson "An Unfamiliar Spotlight For An Unassuming Senator."

Bipartisan House Task Force To Consider Independent Ethics Enforcer. The AP (12/15, Werner) reports House leaders are "creating a bipartisan task force on whether to establish an independent ethics panel to police the House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said Thursday." Pelosi said Minority Leader John Boehner "has agreed to the idea. The task force has not been set up yet, but it will be expected to report back in March, she said." Pelosi "offered no details on what the outside ethics group might look like, saying that would be up to the task force." Pelosi said, "There is no question that the ethics process in the last couple of years has lost the confidence of the American people. I'm hopeful that it's possible that we can have an outside entity that will restore that confidence." The AP adds the establishment of "a permanent outside enforcement entity has been a priority of ethics reformers, but such proposals have failed to become law in the past. In March, the Senate voted 67-30 to reject creation of an Office of Public Integrity to oversee ethics violations by lawmakers." Among the "no votes were incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who will head the Senate Rules Committee, which has jurisdiction over ethics and lobbying."

DOJ_NMG_0106571

The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "Citing the mandate from voters in the midterm elections to clean up a culture of corruption," Pelosi "promised a sweeping reform agenda Thursday, including a first-ever 'outside enforcement mechanism' for congressional ethics." Other elements "unveiled this week include a ban on 'earmarks' or member projects for fiscal year 2007, a five-day congressional workweek to better process 'the people's business,' and a new oversight panel on intelligence along the lines proposed by the 9/11 Commission back in 2004." But even as House Democrats "try to burnish their image on ethics, they are being forced to work around the legal woes of their own members, including two in key positions." Rep. William Jefferson was reelected, but "Pelosi and the Democratic Steering Committee denied Mr. Jefferson his request to keep a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, pending the outcome of a federal investigation." Rep. Alan Mollohan (D) of West Virginia is also "facing a federal investigation over earmarks he sponsored and profitable real estate deals."

Congressional Page Board Chairman Wants Monthly Meetings. The AP (12/15, Thomas) reports the incoming chairman "of the congressional Page Board said Thursday he hopes the panel will meet monthly and expand its membership to help prevent another scandal." Democratic Rep. Dale Kildee, "who will become the panel's chairman when Democrats take control of the House next year, said the board should meet regularly with directors of the program's school and dormitory and those who supervise the students during their work in Congress." Kildee said, "I think it's a very, very good program and the problem with the program was not the pages — it was a member and those who should have been more vigilant when this thing broke." The AP adds Kildee said "he supports incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's call reform of the program. Pelosi said Monday she intends to introduce legislation early in the new Congress to increase oversight of the page program, require regular board meetings and add a parent of a current and a former page to the board."

Pelosi Says GOP To Get Only One Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills. The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones Newswires (12/15, Godfrey) reports incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi said House Republicans will "be given only one chance to amend or debate a plan to curb oil and gas subsidies and other Democratic priorities." Legislation "cutting subsidies to oil and gas producers is one of Democrats' top six priorities for their first 100 hours in power. Pelosi said Thursday that the oil and gas legislation along with bills cutting student loan interest rates and requiring the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for Medicare would not go through the normal legislative process." Normally, legislation is "subjected to hearings and then considered by the committees of jurisdiction before being brought to the House floor. Pelosi said Thursday that because the measures are well known and have been voted upon in the past, the bills would be brought directly to the House floor for a vote." Republicans would be "given only one chance to amend the bill through a procedural maneuver known as a motion to recommit, Pelosi said."

Republicans Failed To Enact Environmental Priorities In 109th Congress. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Boxall, 850K) reports, "If ever there was a Congress in which Republicans were positioned to remake the nation's environmental laws, it was the 109th. But by the time the session ended last week, the GOP's environmental agenda had been largely thwarted." Whether it "was rewriting the Endangered Species Act, opening up most of the nation's coastline to oil and gas drilling, or selling off public lands in the West, Republicans failed to enact a range of ambitious proposals." Though Republicans "came close to opening up Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, the goal eluded them."

Fitzgerald Doesn't Disclose If Cheney Is On Witness List For Libby Trial. The AP (12/15, Apuzzo) reports special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said "he does not expect any government officials to refuse to testify in the CIA leak trial, but he did not specifically say whether Vice President Dick Cheney or other top White House officials were on his witness list." Attorneys for Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, "meanwhile, told a judge that two unidentified reporters may resist testifying on Libby's behalf in the case. The attorneys predicted the issue would be resolved before trial, however." Cheney has "said he may be called as a witness. If so, prosecutors could ask how the White House responded to those criticisms. Cheney was upset by Wilson's comments, Fitzgerald has said, and told Libby that Plame worked for the CIA." That conversation is "a key to Fitzgerald's perjury case. Libby testified that he learned about Plame's job from a reporter." Cheney could "also help prosecutors undermine Libby's defense that he was so preoccupied with national security matters, he forgot details about the less-important Plame issue. Prosecutors argue that Plame was a key concern of the vice president, and thus would have been important to Libby." Government officials "and journalists will be the key witnesses in the trial, which is scheduled to begin next month. Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert are expected to be prosecution witnesses and Libby's lawyers said in court papers Thursday that several reporters will testify on Libby's behalf." Attorneys also said "they'd subpoenaed for the tape of Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward's interview with former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Armitage has admitted he discussed Plame's job with Woodward in 2003 but said it was a passing, inadvertent comment."

DOJ_NMG_0106572

Healthcare Bill Included Special Provisions Sought By Congressional Leaders. The New York Times (12/15, Pear, 1.16M) reports that by "slipping four sentences into a big bill passed last week, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert secured a major change in Medicare policy avidly sought by a few health insurers, in particular a multinational company with headquarters in his home state, Illinois." In the "final hours of the 109th Congress, the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, also got special treatment for a hospice in his state. The bill did not name the hospice, but specified the Medicare provider number for the intended beneficiary, the Nathan Adelson Hospice in rural Pahrump, Nev." Rep. Bill Thomas "inserted a provision earmarking $40 million for a valley fever vaccine sought by his constituents, while the Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, obtained tens of millions of dollars for hospitals in his state." The Times adds, "These examples illustrate how power is exercised in the final, chaotic hours before Congress adjourns. Obscure provisions of interest to just a few lawmakers were quietly stuffed into a grab bag of legislation, with no indication of their parentage or purpose."

Black Caucus Urges Democratic Leaders To Hire More Minorities. The Washington Times (12/15, DeBose, 88K) reports the Congressional Black Caucus "has asked Democratic leaders to hire more minorities to work for House committees and on lawmakers' staffs, saying the dearth of diversity on Capitol Hill is a problem." In a letter "to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and the leaders of the Democratic Steering Committee, the CBC said the party must increase the number of minorities working for committees and subcommittees, which will be controlled by Democrats." Outgoing CBC Chairman Melvin Watt said the "hiring of black, Hispanic, Asian and other minority staffers has 'been a major problem' for years," adding, "All you have to do is look at the composition of committees, subcommittees and leadership staffs." The Times adds, "Committee staffers who spoke with The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity said that fewer than 50 minorities are among the hundreds of committee staffers." That number "does not include staff members of the black, Hispanic or Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses."

Chertoff Says FEMA's Post-Katrina Reform Not Done. The AP (12/15, Lumpkin) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "delivered a backhanded slap Thursday at one of his agencies, saying it should not allow red tape to interfere with helping disaster victims." Chertoff, who "listed the Hurricane Katrina response as one of the 'transformative experiences' for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said there is 'a lot more work to do' even though FEMA has been 'retooled.'" Chertoff noted "there still are 'tens of thousands of people who suffer the lingering effects' of last year's hurricane." Chertoff said, "We have to make sure that FEMA does not become so enmeshed in its own bureaucratic processes sometimes that they lose sight of the need to have simple commonsense and humanity in dealing with the public."

Dow Reaches New Record High. ABC World News (12/14, story 8, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "On Wall Street, another record high. Strong, quarterly profits, reported today from investment banking companies and a drop in jobless claims boosted optimism. The Dow was up more than 99 points to close at 12,416. And on the NASDAQ, stocks were up 21 points [to close at 2,453.85]." NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 7, Williams, 9.87M) also noted "the Dow end of year rally soaring into new record territory." The Washington Post/AP (12/15, D5), USA Today and Wall Street Journal (12/15, C1, Browning, 2.04M), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Prices For Imported Goods Climb 0.2%. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, Bater, 2.04M) reports US import prices "rose for the first time in three months in November despite a drop in petroleum costs." Prices for "imported goods rose 0.2%, after falling 2.3% in October and 2.2% in September, the Labor Department said Thursday. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had expected November import prices would slip by 0.1%." In annual terms, "import prices increased 1.2% from November 2005, compared with the 6.4% a year earlier."

OPEC Plans To Reduce Output Starting In February. The Financial Times (12/15, Crooks, Mahtani, Hoyos) reports OPEC "yesterday moved to reassert its power over oil prices by agreeing to cut production early next year in spite of rising concerns over tightening world crude markets." OPEC "ministers meeting in Abuja agreed to cut output by 500,000 barrels a day from February 1." In a statement, the cartel "said the cut was justified on the basis that there was 'more than ample crude supply, high stocks levels and increasing spare capacity' in the market."

The New York Times (12/15, Mouawad, 1.16M) adds that OPEC's planned 2 percent reduction in output is "the group's second production cut in two months and its strongest indication yet that it would seek to keep oil prices above $60 a barrel next year." OPEC "had already agreed to a 4 percent production cut in October to prop up prices." The group also "said Angola would join the group next year, becoming its first new member since 1975. Angola, Africa's fastest-growing oil exporter, is a powerful addition to OPEC."

DOJ_NMG_0106573

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A2, Bahree, 2.04M) says OPEC's decision sends "a strong signal that it will try to prevent oil prices from sliding further." But "[t]he real impact of the cartel's latest output move on oil markets remains unclear. The big unknown is whether members of [OPEC] will actually implement the decision ... . Some OPEC officials say that will depend on demand in the next two months, the level of prices and the amount of oil held in inventories in major consumer countries." The Journal adds, "Oil prices rose yesterday, with light, sweet crude for January delivery up $1.14, or 1.9%, to $62.51 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange."

The Washington Post/Bloomberg (12/15, D4, Critchlow, Pals) reports OPEC "is attempting to revive prices that have slid about 21 percent from a July record of $78.40 a barrel in New York. The cuts take effect about seven weeks before the end of the Northern Hemisphere winter, when demand for heating fuels typically starts to decline."

Large Majorities Support Stricter Fuel-Efficiency Requirements. The Wall Street Journal's (12/15, A4, Harwood) "Washington Wire" column reports a poll's finding that "87% of Democrats, 76% of independents and 74% of Republicans back requirements for more fuel efficiency even if that raises auto prices. That complicates auto makers' ability to mount filibuster against bipartisan Senate bill, sponsored by Democrat Obama and Republican Lugar, to raise CAFE standards." But "[i]ndustry may have better luck in the House, where Democratic powers Dingell and Hoyer call CAFE outmoded; they back tax incentives for auto makers and buyers as an alternative."

Friedman Urges Bush To Return To "Green" Texas Roots. In his New York Times (12/15, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "Which politician launched the Texas wind industry? Answer: Former Gov., now President, George W. Bush." Friedman says he is baffled at "how the same man who initiated one of the most effective renewable energy programs in America, has presided over an administration that for six years has dragged its feet on alternative energy, used its regulatory powers to weaken efficiency standards for major appliances and stuck its head in the sand on global warming." Friedman writes that the only way for Bush to salvage his legacy "is to get back in touch with [his] green Texas roots and devote the rest of [his] term to REALLY ending America's oil addiction, liberating us from dependence on petro-authoritarian regimes and making America the leader in renewable energies that combat climate change."

Trade Agency Clears Way For Some Steel Import Tariffs To End. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, Hitt, Glader, Spector, 2.04M) reports, "Decisions that signal the end of many U.S. steel tariffs promise struggling auto makers a boost, and reflect a shift in the political and economic fortunes of these two pillars of the U.S. economy." Heavy-equipment makers "will also benefit from a separate ruling yesterday by the U.S. International Trade Commission that clears the way for tariffs to lapse on cut-to-length plate steel from 11 countries." The end to tariffs "on corrosion-resistant steel essential to car making from Australia, Canada, France and Japan will benefit auto makers. Tariffs remain in place for the same type of steel from Germany and South Korea." Domestic steelmakers, "which have long received favored treatment in Washington, were surprised by the ruling. In addition, they face several more ITC reviews in coming months on products such as hot-rolled steel product, pipe and tubular goods as well as concrete-reinforcing bar, which is used in construction. Some oil companies also are said to be lining up to lobby for an elimination of tariffs on pipe and tubular goods."

Obama Not Interested In Being "Un-Hillary" Candidate. The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Pearson, 617K) reports that on the "cusp of a historic decision over whether to run for the White House, Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday that he believed he would be a 'viable candidate' for president who could move the nation beyond the generational politics that have defined the last 40 years." In a meeting with the Tribune editorial board, Obama said, "I wouldn't run if I didn't think I could win." The Tribune adds Obama "articulated a rationale for his potential candidacy, confidence in his ability to win and an assessment of potential opponents -- both Democrat and Republican." Obama said that he "would reveal his decision in January, following a two-week family vacation that returns him to his roots in Hawaii, setting an extraordinary arc for a politician who a little more than two years ago was a state senator toiling in Springfield." But Obama said "he viewed hype over his potential candidacy as 'transitory' and not something that would dictate his decision. He said he had no real concerns about his ability to put together a staff and raise the tens of millions of dollars he would need to wage a campaign against his potential opponents, including Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York." Asked for "his assessment of Clinton, Obama said, 'I think she'd be a capable president. She has gone through some battles that, in some cases unfairly, have created a perception about her that is different from how I am perceived.'" Obama said, "however, that he had no interest in being what he called 'the un-Hillary' -- a reference to serving as a standard bearer for Democrats looking for an alternative to Clinton." Speaking of "a potential match up with McCain, Obama said he was under no illusions how a GOP presidential campaign would be run against him. 'War hero against snot-nosed rookie,' Obama said."

DOJ_NMG_0106574

CSMonitor Says Obama Not Ideology-Free. The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, 59K) notes in an editorial that Obama said "he's become a 'symbol' of voters' desire for 'something new.' Such self-deprecation could be sincere sentiment - or it could be skilled political rhetoric. It doesn't matter which, though, because the words of the junior senator from Illinois are true." People "don't know much about this Democratic fresh face; he's too inexperienced to have a long political track record. But they're obviously responding positively to what he symbolizes: a call to reach across the partisan and ideological divide in America." But it's "not as if Obama is stripped of ideology. He's pro-choice, pro- affirmative action, and supports 'universal' health care - traditional Democratic causes. The National Journal, a nonpartisan publication, gave him an 82.5 liberalism rating, higher than Sen. Clinton (79.8)."

Commission Calls For Major Changes To US Education System. Yesterday's report by the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce received widespread, mostly positive, newspaper coverage but little TV coverage. Most stories mentioned proposals to test tenth-graders for college readiness, to offer universal pre-kindergarten and to raise teacher salaries. The CBS Evening News (12/14, story 10, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Forget No Child Left Behind; a lot of our children are being left behind by students in other nations." The commission "blames sub-par schools, and it's calling for a major course correction." CBS (Assuras) added, the report proposes "a radical overhaul to stream all students to college" and "schools could be run by groups of teachers or private companies. All four-year-olds and all low-income three-year-olds would enroll in universal pre-K, and high school students should be prepared to pass college-level board exams by age 16."

The AP (12/15, Zuckerbrod) focused on proposals for giving exams to tenth graders to determine whether they would "go on to community college or stay in school and study for more advanced tests that could earn them a place at a four-year college;" increasing teacher pay; and placing "independent contractors in charge of operating schools."

The New York Times (12/15, Herszenhorn, 1.16M) called it "a far-reaching redesign of the United States education system that would include having schools operated by independent contractors and giving states, rather than local districts, control over school financing." The commission was noted for having "two former federal education secretaries…two former labor secretaries…and an array of other luminaries." It "rethinks American schooling from top to bottom" and "was quickly hailed by some as a potentially groundbreaking document." But "the national teachers' unions were apprehensive."

The Washington Post (12/15, A11, Haynes, 690K) reports the commission "proposed dramatic changes that would shake up American public education in an effort to make the nation more competitive globally" at an estimated cost of "about $60 billion." The Post identified "the most controversial recommendations" as "empowering school districts to sign contracts with companies and teachers to run the schools…and forcing teachers to give up pensions in exchange for large pay increases." The Post also noted that the commission was "funded by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation and the Lumina Foundation for Education."

The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Olszewski, Rado, 617K) says the recommendations would "end America's four-year high school and replace it with a more European-style model." But "unlike in Europe…teens would be encouraged to retake the exam to be developed by each state until they pass it."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Paulson, 59K) reports that the commission warns that "many Americans are in danger of falling behind and seeing their standard of living plummet." It described major proposals while mentioning that they are "likely to encounter opposition."

Miller, Kennedy To Consider Proposals. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A4, Tomsho, 2.04M) reports the commission argues that "to preserve its living standard, the U.S. must undertake a radical overhaul of its education system." CA7 Rep. George Miller, incoming chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee, said that "some" of the proposals "should get serious attention in the next Congress." The report "also sparked immediate opposition" from "some educators" and "major teacher unions."

Bloomberg (12/15, Basken) reports, "The Gates Foundation and other sponsoring groups may pay states to help implement it." The report "faces opposition from teacher unions." But "congressional leaders from both parties, including the incoming Democratic chairman of the House and Senate education committees, Representative George Miller of California and Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, also praised the ambitiousness of the recommendations and promised to consider them." U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings "hasn't yet studied the report."

DOJ_NMG_0106575

DARPA's Neuroscience Research Seen As Cause For Concern. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, Begley, 2.04M) reports the Pentagon's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or Darpa, as "part of its mission to maintain U.S. military superiority 'by sponsoring revolutionary, high-payoff research,' the agency has expanded into neuroscience. Can the folks who brought you the Internet also bring you ways to look into brains -- and do you want them to?" Darpa has "good reason to fund neuroscience. Discoveries and new technologies such as noninvasive imaging to detect what the mind is doing might help analysts, pilots and grunts process and react better to barrages of data, and allow real-time assessment of head injuries on the battlefield. Brain-computer interfaces in which thoughts are electronically translated into signals that operate a computer or prosthetic limb might improve rehab for soldiers suffering grievous injuries." But as with "other 'dual use' technologies, however, the findings and gizmos born of Darpa's brain research may well find their way into civilian life, and in ways that trouble some ethicists." Jonathan Moreno of the University of Virginia, a former adviser on biodefense to the Department of Homeland Security, said, "There are reasons to be concerned about what uses these discoveries might be put to."

OTHER NEWS:

Local Elections Test Of Support For Ahmadinejad. The AP (12/15, Karimi) reports local elections to be held in Iran today are "expected to be a first test of support for hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad since he took office more than a year ago." Ahmadinejad "could face dissatisfaction among conservatives, some of whom feel he has been too caught up in confrontations with the West and has failed to deal with Iran's struggling economy." Meanwhile, reformers are "hoping the vote will show popular support on which to rebuild." However, participation in that vote was expected to be low "since there is very little difference among the candidates, who are carefully selected by Guardian Council, an election watchdog controlled by hard-liners."

NYTimes Says Holocaust Conference Is Reminder Rogues Should Not Be Underestimated. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/15, 1.16M) says this week's conference in Iran "of Holocaust deniers and racists was, predictably, a circus of Holocaust denial and racism argued by discredited scholars and even the former Ku Klux Klan leader, David Duke. But one should never underestimate the political power of these vicious ideas, even among supposedly respectable people across the Middle East and beyond." The Times notes that Ahmadinejad's claim that the Holocaust is "a myth ginned up to justify the creation of the state of Israel" is "frightening enough," but "couple that with his calls to wipe Israel off the map and his government's -- so far unrestrained -- drive to develop the technology needed to build a nuclear weapon, and you have even more reasons to keep yourself up at night."

Israel Bars Haniya From Entering Gaza With Cash. The New York Times (12/15, A3, Myre, 1.16M) reports in "a bizarre standoff that lasted more than seven hours on Thursday," Israel barred Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya from returning home to the Gaza Strip, "saying he was carrying tens of millions of dollars in cash that could be used for terrorist attacks." Haniya was finally allowed to cross from Egypt into the southern Gaza Strip late Thursday night, "but only after leaving the money with Hamas officials who stayed behind in Egypt." During his "lengthy wait," angry members of his Hamas party "shot up the Rafah border terminal, clashing first with Palestinian security forces on one side of the border and later with Egyptian security officials on the other side." It was not clear how much money Haniya was carrying, though the Israeli news media estimated it "at $35 million and said it had been packed in suitcases."

The Washington Post (12/15, A28, Wilson, 690K) notes the US has "threatened sanctions against any country or group that uses bank transfers to send money to Hamas," so officials have "resorted to carrying cash into Gaza in suitcases, a financing method that has embarrassed Israeli officials who hope the boycott weakens the movement and brings a change in the Palestinian government." The Financial Times (12/15, Devi) reports Haniya was "carrying $35 million in cash, believed to be part of the $350 million he raised during a regional tour that took in Iran, Syria and Qatar."

The AP (12/15, Barzak) says Thursday's "unrest was likely to strain the US-brokered deal that turned over control of the crossing to the Palestinians" last year.

Israeli Court Sanctions Targeted Killings. The Chicago Tribune (12/15, Greenberg, 617K) reports, "Sanctioning one of the most controversial tactics used by Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians, the Israeli Supreme Court on Thursday upheld the army's policy of targeted killing of militants but said the legality of each attack had to be determined case-by-case." The court "declined to issue a blanket ban on the practice, frequently used by the Israelis during six years of fighting with the Palestinians. Some human-rights groups have called the tactic execution without trial and a violation of international law." The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Wilson, 690K) says "the unanimous decision departs little from guidelines the military says it already follows in carrying out 'targeted killings,'" but "it does say commanders should allow an independent investigation to follow each assassination and recommends that the military compensate 'innocent civilians' harmed in the operation."

DOJ_NMG_0106576

Lebanon's Shiites Question Hezbollah's Control. The Christian Science Monitor (12/15, Blanford, 59K) reports this month's protests in Beirut are "the most visible evidence" that Hezbollah is "now the undisputed representative of the country's Shiite community. Yet some of the party's coreligionists have started to publicly question Hezbollah's political monopoly," expressing concerns that "its ambitious gambit to topple the Western-backed government is intended to benefit backers in Iran and Syria and will be detrimental to the long-term interests of Shiites." Although Shiite "voices of dissent are few," the "are gaining more attention at a time when Lebanon is serving as a battleground in the emerging struggle between Iran and its regional allies…and the Sunni-dominated Arab world led by Saudi Arabia and Egypt."

LATimes Urges US To Stay Out Of Lebanese Politics. The Los Angeles Times (12/15, 850K) editorializes, "Two weeks ago, nobody was giving odds that Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government would survive the year." However, today "Siniora doesn't look much stronger, but his government is still in business, and the protesters have little to show for their efforts." The Times notes that "while Siniora's opponents attempt to dismiss him as a US puppet," it is "imperative" that the US not "make the mistake of sacrificing a shaky but functional democracy for token gestures at assistance in Iraq" as "consensus is beginning to form around the idea that negotiations with Syria are necessary."

Survey Shows "Sharp" Decline In US Standing In Mideast. The Washington Times (12/15, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports attitudes about the US have "deteriorated sharply" in the Middle East in the past two years, according to a new survey of five countries in the region. The survey -- conducted in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco, Jordan and Lebanon -- "without exception" found "a strong majority expressed unfavorable opinions of the United States" with the lowest level in Jordan, where only 5 percent said they had a favorable view of the US. Survey respondents "tend to distinguish between US policy and the American people, but that distinction appears to have eroded in the past four years," according to James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, for whom the survey was conducted. Zogby, who said he "first noticed a distinct shift in 2004," cautioned that in order for the US to accomplish its goals in the region "you need regional support."

Congress, Government Agencies Learning More About Islamic Culture. Separately, the Christian Science Monitor (12/15, MacDonald, 59K) reports that while "some in Congress may need a primer on Islamic extremists…other American institutions are already boning up -- especially when they have a stake in doing so." For example, the FBI "will emphasize Muslim culture when it expands introductory training for new agents from 18 to 21 weeks next month." However, "certain key sectors of US society also display a dangerous ignorance," Muslim advocates say, and "topping the list this month" is Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D) of Texas, the incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee," who in an interview with Congressional Quarterly last week "could identify the historic Sunni-Shiite split but didn't know that Al Qaeda is Sunni or that Hezbollah…is Shiite."

Propaganda Puts Pyongyang's Commitment To Talks In Question. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A8, Ramstad, 2.04M) reports North Korean "propaganda" is "putting a renewed focus on pride in the country's new nuclear capability, a sign that suggests disarmament talks next week will make little progress, Pyongyang watchers say." Brian Myers, a specialist in North Korean propaganda based in Seoul, said during the pate month, signs appeared on the streets of Pyongyang with slogans such as "Revel in the pride of being a country in the Nuclear Club," which he calls "a sign that nuclear capability has become a tool for the government to galvanize support at a time when the country is suffering food shortages and economic decay." Myers, who is "sometimes consulted by US diplomats and military officials for his observations on North Korea," told the Journal, "You really have to admire these State Department people who do these negotiations and go through these grueling talks for days and weeks -- They haven't given up on them."

Similarly, McClatchy (12/15, Johnson) says Pyongyang is "digging in its heels before crucial nuclear talks rev up Monday, raising questions over whether it wants to buy time or is ready to negotiate in earnest." The "blustery talk" from Pyongyang "may be designed to bolster a negotiating position for the talks."

The Los Angeles Times (12/15, Magnier, 850K) says that North Korea "has an interest in avoiding a quick resolution," noting that "the longer it keeps the program intact, the more likely the world is to accept its status as a member of the nuclear club, as Pakistan and India discovered." Also by "extending talks beyond the 2008 US elections," it "could bring it a new negotiating partner, in the form of a new administration, that it might find easier to deal with."

Meanwhile, AFP (12/15) reports Pyongyang "may stage a second nuclear weapons test to strengthen its hand during upcoming negotiations on scrapping its nuclear program," South Korea's new defense minister warned. As a result, Kim Jang-Soo "ordered the 650,000-strong military to step up combat-readiness to deter possible aggression from the North."

DOJ_NMG_0106577

Rice Announces $1 Million Fund To Assist Human Rights Activists. The AP (12/15) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday announced the State Department has established a $1 million emergency fund "to help cover such expenses as legal fees and medical bills for human rights activists." The department also "redefined US goals and expectations for international treatment of independent groups that promote democracy and human rights" in a 10-point statement of principles on NGOs. However, in "a slap at Russia, one principle says governments seeking to regulate the groups should aim to protect, not impede, their work." Russia was "not mentioned in literature the department handed out Thursday nor in Rice's brief remarks, but the United States has been concerned about a law passed this year that requires groups such as Amnesty International to register with the government."

The Washington Times (12/15, Kralev, 88K) notes that Rice also announced that, beginning next year, she will "bestow a Freedom Defenders Award on a foreign activist or nongovernmental organization and a Diplomacy for Freedom Award" on a US ambassador for "working to end tyranny and promote democracy."

Pentagon Seeks Creation Of New African Command. The AP (12/15, Jelinek) reports the Pentagon is recommending the creation of a new US military command for Africa," which is seen as having greater strategic importance to America since the start of the fight against terrorism." Officials say Africa also is "strategically more important because of increased efforts by China to involve itself and gain influence on the continent." Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said a proposal has been sent to President Bush.

Egypt Arrests Opposition Leader After University Protest. The New York Times (12/15, A9, El-Naggar, 1.16M) reports Egypt Thursday arrested several leading members of the Muslim Brotherhood and more than 140 student members after a campus protest, saying the group "had formed what amounted to militant squads" that planned "acts of unrest." In a statement, Interior Ministry officials charged that the brotherhood had created what it called "deterrence committees," which were "trained in the arts of combat and provided with knives, sticks and chains, and appointed to start holding strikes and demonstrations and acts of unrest in the university."

Britain Abandons BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe. The Financial Times (12/15, A1, Adams, Boxell) reports on its front page that Britain was accused Thursday night of "caving in to intense pressure from Saudi Arabia" after Tony Blair's government intervened to end a Serious Fraud Office inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE Systems. The SFO's decision to abandon its investigation into the Al Yamamah oil-for-arms contracts "came under fierce attack from opposition peers and leading international lawyers." The decision was announced by Lord Goldsmith, the attorney-general, "on a day when the UK government appeared determined to rush out all its controversial news under the cover of the publication of a long-awaited police investigation into the death" of Princess Diana. The abandonment of the inquiry is "expected to save a multibillion-pound jet fighter contract with Riyadh and safeguard thousands of jobs."

King Abdullah's Son Rumored To Be Next Saudi Ambassador. The Washington Post's (12/15, A33) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "another name has emerged as a strong contender to become the next Saudi ambassador here" -- Mishal bin Abdullah, son of the Saudi king, who now serves at the United Nations in New York.

Bush Holds Malaria Summit. AFP (12/15, Knox) reports, "US President George W. Bush designated eight African countries as new beneficiaries of US aid to battle malaria, which kills one million people annually around the world." Bush added "Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali and Zambia to his five-year, 1.2-billion-dollar President's Malaria Initiative (PMI) for Africa, bringing to 15 the number of countries covered." Bush, "speaking to US and African activists, civic leaders and government officials at a White House summit on the killer mosquito-borne disease, also proposed doubling US development aid to Africa by the end of the decade. 'This administration has doubled development aid to Africa during my presidency -- and I propose to double it again by the end of this decade,' he said." Also at the summit, First Lady Laura Bush "unveiled a 30-million-dollar plan to help African communities battle malaria by funding non-governmental organizations and civic and religious groups battling the disease."

The New York Times (12/15, Dugger, 1.16M) reports, "The top leaders of all the main malaria-fighting organizations -- from the World Health Organization to the World Bank, from the United States Agency for International Development to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to Unicef -- were at the forum, which the Bush administration titled the White House Summit on Malaria. They met for hours after the public session to plot strategy." Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, "a Vermont Democrat expected to lead the Senate appropriations subcommittee that oversees foreign aid, was at the forum and said he wanted to find a way to finance the administration's malaria program. 'We're trying to get the kind of money we spend in a day in Iraq,' he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106578

'Somewhere we've got to have our priorities right. It's a moral issue.'"

The Washington Times (12/15, Carter, 88K) quotes Bush saying, "It is possible to eliminate malaria. … We know exactly what it will take to prevent and treat the disease. ... It is not going to require a miracle. It requires smart, sustained effort."

On Fox News (12/14, MacCallum), First Lady Laura Bush discussed the problems she has seen firsthand in Africa. Mrs. Bush said, "They face many problems that developing countries face. And certainly pandemic disease is one of the worst things. Because of pandemic disease, schools don't have teachers because teachers have died, the economy is flat because workers aren't able to work because they're sick. And there are a lot of things that if we can eradicate diseases, like malaria, will help these countries in their development, in their economic development. And since malaria can be eradicated, all of us need to work together to make sure we do it."

US, Chinese Officials At Odds Over Yuan. The Washington Post (12/15, D1, Cha, 690K) reports, "US and Chinese leaders clashed publicly on the opening day of strategic economic talks, with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. pushing China to revalue its currency and Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi saying Americans do not have a full understanding of the situation. After standing by as US officials criticized her country's economic policies in the media during the past week, Wu set the tone for the meeting with assertive introductory remarks that spanned 20 typed pages and 5,000 years of Chinese history." Paulson "was equally aggressive in his follow-up speech, saying that the U.S. government's "strong view" is that China should allow its currency, the yuan, to be more flexible."

The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A2, Phillips, Batson, 2.04M) reports, "In the Great Hall of the People, under a painting of Chairman Mao Zedong and other revolutionary heroes, Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi gave Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and his delegation a history lesson about her country's struggles with poverty and foreign interference. American misconceptions about the Asian country aren't 'conducive' to good relations, she said as she opened two days of talks yesterday, according to the written text of the speech." Wu "reiterated longstanding Chinese complaints that foreign critics fail to grasp the extent of her country's huge economic and social challenges, from profound poverty to the waves of rural residents pouring into cities."

Ban Ki-moon Pledges Stronger Ties With US As New UN Chief. NBC Nightly News (12/14, story 6, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There has been a big change at the top at the United Nations here in New York. A South Korean, Ban Ki-Moon has been sworn in as the eighth secretary general in the history of the UN. He is the first Asian to lead the UN in 35 years. He replaces Kofi Annan who steps down at the end of this month after 10 years on the job."

The New York Times (12/15, A5, Hoge, 1.16M) reports that addressing the General Assembly hall after taking the oath, Ban "heaped praise" on Annan, "but in a subsequent news conference, he distanced himself from Mr. Annan's plea Monday that the United States return to a more multilateral foreign policy grounded in respect for international law." However, Ban acknowledged that the relationship between the United Nations and the United States had become "strained," but said that "in such a case it is very important to discuss, to resolve the difference of opinions, and I, as secretary general, will try to harmonize so that we can expect constructive contribution and participation of the United States." The AP (12/15, Lederer), AFP (12/15, Aziakou), Loa Angeles Times (12/15, Farley), Washington Post (12/15, A27, Lynch, 690K) and Washington Times (12/15, Pisik, 88K) also report the story.

Negroponte Says Castro Near Death. In an interview with the Washington Post (12/15, A23, DeYoung, 690K), Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte said Cuban President Fidel Castro is "very ill" and will not be alive "much longer...months, not years." Meanwhile, the Post notes that in a brief speech earlier this month, Raul Castro said Cuba is willing to open negotiations with the United States "to settle the long US-Cuba disagreement," but Assistant Secretary Shannon rejected that offer this week, telling reporters that the Bush administration will deal with Cuba "only when it shows a commitment to democracy."

Embargo Opponents Hope Democratic Congress Will Ease Restriction. McClatchy (12/15, Bachelet) reports the "Democrats' capture of Congress and Cuban leader Fidel Castro's illness have dramatically altered the battle lines over Cuba policy and given new hope to opponents of US sanctions." Congressional interest in Cuba is "growing" with six Democrats and four Republicans signing up for a trip Friday to Havana organized by the House International Relations Committee. However, "few observers expect Congress to end the trade embargo on Cuba anytime soon."

Cuba Vows To Defy US Reform Efforts. The AP (12/15, Arrington) reports Cuba "vowed to defy US efforts for economic and political change" in a front-page editorial Thursday in the Communist Party's newspaper, saying the US government "should not fool themselves." The newspaper also "criticized the American diplomatic mission in Havana for distributing books, medicine, clothes and shortwave radios to Cubans," saying the US Interests Section "acts like the central barracks of the counterrevolution."

DOJ_NMG_0106579

Poll Finds 1 In 4 Cubans Satisfied With Level Of Freedom. The AP (12/15, Klug) reports a new Gallup Poll released Thursday found "about one-quarter of Cubans interviewed in the island's two biggest cities are satisfied with their freedom to choose what they do with their lives." When asked about the job performance of Cuba's leaders, "about 40 percent of those surveyed said they disapproved." Gallup conducted the survey only in two cities" because of the difficulty in getting around the island" and cautioned that the results are "not meant to be representative of Cuba's more than 11 million citizens."

Lugovoi Denies Role In Poison Plot. The Wall Street Journal (12/15, A1, Cullison, 2.04M) reports on its front page that former Russian spy Andrei Lugovoi, who now finds himself at the center of the investigation in the death of Alexander Litvinenko, is "deeply offended by suggestions that he helped kill Mr. Litvinenko." In a series of recent interviews with the Journal, Lugovoi "said he is now undergoing tests for radiation poisoning" himself and calls the allegations "nonsense." He insists that his business "required him to travel to London more than a dozen times this year," during which he would visit with Litvinenko, "who at one time worked as a bodyguard for the tycoon." Although Scotland Yard detectives "have not been allowed to directly question" Lugovoi, he "says he spoke to Russian investigators for three hours, however, in the presence of British detectives," and has "waived his right to a lawyer, saying he's a victim, not a perpetrator."

Columnist Calls Chavez Victory An "Assault" On Democracy. Wall Street Journal (12/15, A21, 2.04M) columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "has for eight years been heading a devoutly anti-American government and he is widely considered the region's heir apparent to Fidel. But be prepared for the Venezuelan bad boy to become even more menacing to the US now" that he has won "legitimacy" by going "through an electoral exercise." O'Grady calls his election an "assault on Venezuelan democracy," saying the country is "not a democracy by any definition and Mr. Chávez is sure to be a thorn in the side of democrats for years to come. But legitimizing his abuse of power, in face of all the evidence, only makes things worse."

Proliferation Expert Criticizes US Nuclear Policy. Hnery Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/15, A20, 2.04M) that the Bush administration "has condoned or backed nuclear expansion in India, China, Brazil, Argentina, South Africa, Ukraine, France, Britain, Japan and Australia. Because of this and previous US winking at the nuclear fuel-making activities of key US allies, our own State Department's lawyers now eagerly insist that all nations have a right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) to make nuclear power and fuel. All that's required, they say, is that states claim their activities have some conceivable civilian application and open them to occasional international visits." Sokolski says the "risk of pursuing such egregious policies is obvious: A world full of nuclear fuel-making states, claiming they are on the right side of the NPT, only days or weeks from having bombs."

WPost Welcomes Calderon's Early Actions As President. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/15, A34, 690K) says that "when Felipe Calderon took office as Mexican president two weeks ago, the dominant question was whether he would be able to govern the country." However, the Post says Calderon has "opened his presidency with aggressiveness and skill," and "so far…has accompanied his law-and-order campaign with populist gestures: He slashed his own salary and the presidential budget and adopted some of the social spending measures championed by Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the failed presidential candidate who now seeks to destroy Mexico's democracy."

Congress Urged To Grant Treaty Approval By Two-Thirds Majority. Former State Dept. officials David Kaye and K. Russell LaMotte and illustrator Peter Hoey write in the New York Times (12/15, Kaye, Lamotte, Hoey, 1.16M) that the Democratic Congress can "help reverse the steep erosion of America's standing abroad, particularly the impression that the United States has disengaged from global problem-solving," by making "an impact in one significant area: by giving the required two-thirds majority vote to approve a raft of treaties awaiting action." The Senate, they note, now has before it "more than two dozen treaties submitted for approval by President Bush and his predecessors — some, in fact, were negotiated as long ago as the Eisenhower administration." Approving treaties "from this list," they argue, would "make a "good start" in "repair[ing] America's image now, even while the Democratic Congress and the White House battle over the future of Iraq policy."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Skid Row Scams Cost Taxpayers Millions."
"His Atlantic Records Shaped Pop Music."
"Believing Is Seeing."
"Senate Looks Out For Its Own."

DOJ_NMG_0106580

"Breast Cancer Rates Fall."
"Army Is Stretched Too Thin."

USA Today:
"Malformation Caused Johnson's Bleeding."
"Gift Of Wreaths Touches Nation."
"Troops To Get Safer Garb."

New York Times:
"Reversing Trend, Big Drop Is Seen In Breast Cancer."
"U.S. Is Dropping Effort To Track If Visitors Leave."
"Legislators Vote For Gay Unions In New Jersey."
"From Head Scarf To Army Cap, Making A New Life."
"The Final Word On Diana's Death (Don't Bet on It)."
"Ill Senator Is Called Responsive."

Washington Post:
"Top U.S. General Says Army Will Need To Grow."
"Rice Says U.S. Won't Engage Iran, Syria."
"Some Metro Riders May Reach For Car Keys."
"Democratic Sen. Johnson In Stable Condition After Brain Surgery."
"Israeli High Court Backs Military On Its Policy Of 'Targeted Killings'."
"Kaine To Seek $500 Million In Bid To Alleviate Va.'s Traffic Ills."

Washington Times:
"'03 Sees Fall In Breast Cancer Rate."
"Minority Hiring On Hill Pushed."
"New York City Braces For Construction Chaos."
"Johnson 'Critical' After Surgery."
"Hanukkah Festivity Joins Methodist, Jewish Group."
"Israel Lets Haniyeh But Not The $35 Million."
"Computer-Free E-Mailing Attracts Low-Tech Seniors."

Detroit Free Press:
"Detroit Schools Dump 3 Tech Deals."
"Parties Aim For Primary In 2008."
"Hospitals Chase Down Million-Dollar Donors."
"Sales Rock For Instrument Of Tiger's Injury."
"US Breast Cancer Rates Fall Sharply."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Breats Cancer Decline A Shock."
"Flight Of Fancy."
"Democrats Forge Ahead As Senator Convalesces."
"Folks Wiped Off State Map Take Offense."

Houston Chronicle:
"Breast Cancer Rate Dropped With halt In Hormone Use."
"Catching Up With Tradition."
"State Discounts TAKS Cheating."
"After Tough, Inmate Is Cleared For Release."
"Close Door, Have A Seat, Pop A Cola."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing; Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing-Analysis; Senator Johnson Critical Condition; Senator Johnson Condition-Analysis; Creating A Larger Army; Living In Baghdad; Missing Climbers-Oregon; Stock Market; Princess Diana Investigation; Ahmed Urdigan Obit; Honoring The Veterans.
CBS: Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing; Breast Cancer Cases Decreasing-Analysis; Senator Johnson Critical Condition; Arteriovenous Malformation-Analysis; Senate Balance Of Power; Missing Climbers-Oregon; Creating A Larger Army; Hussein Capture 3 Year Anniversary; Iraq Deadly Place; Education Reform; Ahmed Urdigan Obit; College Students Finding God.
NBC: Breast Cancer Cases Decreases; Senator Johnson Critical Condition; Arteriorvenous Malformation-Analysis; Creating A Larger Army; Laura Bush's Interview; New UN Secretary General; Stock Market; Princess Diana Investigation; Climate Change; Missing Climbers-Oregon; Honoring Our Veterans;

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — President and Mrs. Bush participate in a Ceremony for 2006 Recipients of the Presidential Medal of Freedom, East Room, The White House; participates in Armed Forces Full Honor Review in Honor of the Secretary of Defense, the Pentagon; participates in reception for the diplomatic corps, State Department; President and Mrs. Bush participate in Holiday Reception for the Diplomatic Corps, United States Department of State.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MEDICAL CARE _ 9:30 a.m. - 5 p.m. Brookings Institution holds a conference on the problem and potential solutions involving medical care, including antitrust rules. Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Session on changing technology, physician cuylture and variations in treatment, with Thomas Lee of Harvard Medical School, Elliott Fisher of Dartmount Medical School and Steven Shortell of the School of Public Health University of California, Berkeley. 11 a.m. Session on systemic reorganization, with James Mongan of Partners HealthCare Sytems, Denis Cortese of Mayo Clinic, and Jonathan Perlin of HCA. 12:45 p.m. Luncheon address - Leonard Schaeffer, CEO, North Bristol Partners. Keynote address - Mark McClellan. 3 p.m. Session on tools for change, with Katherine Baicker, member, Council of

DOJ_NMG_0106581

Economic Advisers, others. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PENTAGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9 a.m. Army Col. David Sutherland, commander of 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, will brief live from Iraq to give an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

PUBLIC DIPLOMACY _ 9:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies and Business for Diplomatic Action hold a forum with Harris Diamond of Weber Shandwick, Gary Knell of Sesame Workshop, others. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

RX DRUG ADHERENCE _ 9:30 a.m. The National Community Pharmacists Association, in partnership with Pharmacists for the Protection of Patient Care, hold a press briefing to release of new national survey on consumers' behaviors relating to prescription medication. The survey reveals that three-fourths of patients have not taken their prescriptions as directed. Location: National Press Club, Murrow Room.

CONGRESS _ 10 a.m. New York University, The Brookings Institution and RAND Corp. hold a conference on Congress' institutional barriers toward legislating for the future. Participants include former Sen. Tom Daschle, former Rep. Bill Frenzel, Paul Light of NYU, Sarah Binder of Brookings, James Dewar of RAND, and Calvin Mackenzie of Colby College. Location: Brookings Institution, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

ENERGY INITIATIVE _ 10 a.m. Former Sen. John Breaux and past US Conference of Mayors President Beverly O'Neill hold a news conference to announce a coalition of energy consumer and producer groups committed to finding new solutions to the nation's energy challenges. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

ENERGY-NRC _ 10 a.m. Energy Daily, others, hold a media breakfast with NRC Chairman Dale Klein. Location: National Press Club.

UNIONS-GOODYEAR _ 10:30 a.m. AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and USW President Leo Gerard hold a telephone briefing to discuss the ongoing strike at Goodyear. Contacts: Steve Smith, 202-637-5142.

RAILROADS-HAZARDOUS MATERIALS _ 11:15 a.m. Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and TSA Deputy Administrator Robert Jamison hold a press conference on a new rail security package targeting high risk hazardous materials in transit. Location: TSA Headquarters, East Building, Town Hall, 601 S. 12th St., Arlington, Va.

ISG _ 12 p.m. The Middle East Institute holds a panel discussion on inside perspectives on the Iraq Study Group, with Amb. David Mack, Paul Hughes and James Placke, all of whom were part of the ISG's Expert Working Group structure. Location: 1761 N St. NW.

HEALTH CARE _ 12:15 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform sponsor a briefing on the Medicare P4P provider demonstration projects, with Robert Berenson of the Urban Institute, Robert Galvin of General Electric, Alan Nelson of the American College of physicians, others. Location: Columbus Club, Union Station.

IRAN _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Center for American Progress hosts a forum, "The Coming Crisis with Iran: A Conversation About Political, Diplomatic, and Miltary Options." Featured Panelists: Thomas Pickering, U.S. Representative to the United Nations, 1989-1992, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, 1997-2001; and Flynt Leverett, Senior Fellow, New America Foundation; Sam Gardiner, Colonel, United States Air Force (retired) The event will be moderated by Joe Cirincione, Senior Vice President, Center for American Progress. Jeffrey Laurenti, Senior Fellow, The Century Foundation, will preside. The following expert white papers will be released: Gareth Smyth, Iranian Politics and Nuclear Confrontation; Barry Posen, A Nuclear Iran: A Difficult but not Impossible Policy Problem; Flynt Leverett, Dealing with Tehran: Assessing U.S. Diplomatic Options; Bruce Jentleson, Sanctions Against Iran: Key Issues; and Sam Gardiner, The End of the Summer of Diplomacy. Location: Center for American Progress, 1333 H St. NW.

RUMSFELD _ 1:15 p.m. Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld will be honored at an armed forces full honor parade. President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, Marine Corps, will attend. Location: Mall Entrance Parade Field, Pentagon.

MALARIA _ 2:30 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. Bonnie McElveen-Hunter, chairman of the American Red Cross, along with the US Agency for International Development and the US Department of State, hosts a meeting of key players in the fight against malaria and will be available for interviews. Location: American Red Cross Board of Governors Hall, 430 17th St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0106582

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, December 15, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, December 15, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061215.pdf; dojclips061215.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Warns About Attacks If Ill Cleric Dies (NSDY) 4
Jailed Sheik Has Tumor On Liver (NYDN) 5
Sheik's Declining Health Puts FBI On Alert (USAT) 5
Sheik's Illness Prompts Bulletin (NYT) 6
Feds Find No Credible Terror Threats For Holiday (ABC News) 6
Behind This Very Real Threat (NSDY) 7
Port Protectionism Doesn't Work (LAT) 8

Homeland Response:

Pelosi Wants Panel To Oversee Spy Budget (USAT) 9
House Democrats Planning New Intelligence Oversight (NYT) 10
Pelosi Announces Intelligence Plans (AP) 11
New Panel To Check Intelligence Budgets (WT) 12
Pelosi Looks To Boost Oversight Of Intelligence And Ethics (WP) 13
Pelosi Wants New House Committee To Oversee Spy Spending (AP) 14
Homeland Security Chief Defends Real ID Plan (CNET) 16
Government Proposes Rail Security Plan (AP) 16
Tighter Rule On Hazardous Rail Cargo Is Ready (NYT) 17
U.S. Is Dropping Effort To Track If Visitors Leave (NYT) 18
U.S. Preparing To Drop Tracking Of Foreigners' Departures By Land (WP) 19
GAO Finds Homeland Security Tech Issues (HC/AP) 20
Travel Industry Groups Oppose Risk Tests (AP) 21
A Gag On Free Speech (NYT) 22
Pentagon Papers Revisited (WP) 22
When Disaster Strikes (WP) 23

War News:

Bush Weighing Deeper Commitment In Iraq, Officials Say (MCT) 23
Call To Add U.S. Forces Is Resisted At Home, In Iraq (WSJ) 25
Military Considers Sending As Many As 35,000 More U.S. Troops To Iraq, McCain Says (NYT) 26
McCain Calls For More Troops In Iraq (AP) 28
Bush Seeks Ideas On New War Plan Here And In Iraq (USAT) 30
Iraqi VP Says Bush Wants Coalition To Counter Al-Sadr (USAT) 30
Iraq Coalition Plan Gains Urgency (LAT) 31
In Baker's Blunder, A Chance For Bush (WP) 32
Panned In Baghdad (WSJ) 33
Truman's Trials Resonate For Bush (WP) 34
Top Commanders Appear Set To Urge Larger U.S. Military (NYT) 35
General Says Army Will Need To Grow (WP) 37
Army Chief Seeks More Forces, Reserves (AP) 39
Army Is Stretched Too Thin (LAT) 40
General Says Army 'will Break' Without More Reserves (MCT) 41
Rice Rejects Overture To Iran And Syria (WP) 42
Could Iran Help The US Stabilize Iraq? (CSM) 43
Rice Lying Low At The Middle East Crossroads (FT) 45
Saudi Ex-ambassador Urged No US Talks With Iran (AFP) 46
White House: Syrian Visits Hurt Progress (AP) 47
Bush Administration Says Senator's Trip To Damascus Is A Mistake (MCT) 48
White House Criticizes Senator's Syria Trip (AFP) 49
White House Upset By Senator's Trip To Syria (NYT) 49
Kerry Urges Bush To Engage Iran, Syria On Iraq (AFP) 50
What Syria Would Say (WP) 51
New General Takes The Reins As No. 2 U.S. Commander In Iraq (LAT) 52
'We're Seeing Positive Results' (USAT) 53
White House Defends Enemy Body Count (AP) 54
Troops In Iraq To Get Fire-resistant Uniforms (USAT) 54

Sectarian And Ethnic Lines In Sand Stall Provision Of Iraqi Oil Law (NYT) 55
Gunmen Kidnap Shopkeepers, Bystanders In Baghdad (MCT) 55
Panic, Then Quiet, As Kidnappers Strike (LAT) 57
Gunmen Kidnap Baghdad Shopkeepers, Bystanders (WP) ... 58
Bitter Detour For Expatriate Back In Iraq (NYT) 59
From Head Scarf To Army Cap, Making A New Life (NYT) 61
4 Are Killed And 22 Hurt In Bomb Attack In Afghanistan (NYT) 65
Pakistan Will Have To Reckon With Tribal Leaders, Negroponte Says (WP) 65
Gift Of Wreaths Touches Nation (USAT) 66
In The 83rd Congress, A Senate In Constant Turmoil (WP) ... 69

DOJ:

FEDERAL DIARY: Nearing Takeoff: Compensation For Justice Lawyers' Travel Time (WP) 70
U.S. Attorney John McKay Announces Resignation (AP) 71

Corporate Scandals:

Sycamore: Ex-exec Thwarts Options Probe (BZJRNL) 72
Dell Delays Filing Quarterly Report, Cites SEC Probe (BLOOM) 72
Coherent Faces Informal SEC Probe (CFO) 72
Apollo Finds Issues With Option Grants (AP) 73
S.E.C. Eases Regulations On Business (NYT) 73
Auditing Reform: Mission Accomplished! (WP) 75
Street Chiefs In For Big Paydays (WSJ) 76
Executive Compensation Comes Into The Clear (WP) 77

Criminal Law:

Criminal Inquiries Look At U.S. Oil-Gas Unit (NYT) 78
5 Oil And Gas Companies To Pay Royalties (AP) 79
Interior Strikes Deal On Owed Fees With Oil Companies; Foregoes Collecting $900 Million In Back Royalties (FEDT) 80
Duke Athletes Ask Judge To Bar Use Of Photo Lineup (WP/AP) 81
Polygamist Leader Ordered To Stand Trial (USAT/AP) 81
Authorities Launch Crackdown On L.A. Schemes (LAT) 82
Anti-Piracy Program Halting Cash Payouts To Employee Tipsters (IBD) 84
Engineer Indicted For Alleged Espionage (NSDY/AP) 85
California Man Charged In Theft Of Military Secrets (WT) 86
Paper Company Denies Misconduct (MJS) 87

Civil Rights:

Dallas Jail Violates Rights Of Inmates, U.S. Report Says (FWST) 88
L.A. County Hate Crimes Jump 26% (LAT) 88
NJ Lawmakers Approve Civil Unions (AP) 89
Legislators Vote For Gay Unions In New Jersey (NYT) 90
New Jersey Lawmakers Approve Gay Civil Unions (LAT) 91
Death Sentences Decline, And Experts Offer Reasons (NYT) 92
Executions In U.S. Drop To A 10-year Low (LAT) 93

Antitrust:

Feds Defend Approval Of Telecom Megamergers (CNET) ... 95
Stalemate Keeps AT&T-BellSouth Merger Off Of FCC's Agenda (WP) 95
Merger Hold Up (WSJ) 96
If More US Airlines Merge, Who Would Benefit? (CSM) 97
Antitrust Wait Ends In $1.1B Sirna Acquisition (BZJRNL) 99
Merck-Sirna Deal Clears Waiting Period (AP) 99
ProSieben Holders To Sell Stake In Private Buyout (WSJ) 99
Hearst Expects To Close "Daily Breeze" Purchase This Week (E&P) 100
Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard (AP) 100
Municipal Bond Probe May Spur Damage Claims, Legal Experts Say (BLOOM) 100
Samsung Electronics, LCD Makers May Face Record Antitrust Fines (BLOOM) 102
Japan Returns To Global Stage As An Acquirer (WSJ) 103

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Casino Plan For Catskills Moves Closer To Reality With Interior Department's Approval (NYT) 105

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pipe Bombs Lead To Arrest (PITTTRIB) 106
FBI Hails Phila. Labor Leader's Crime-prevention Work (PHI) 107
Briefly... CITY/REGION (PHI) 107
A Travesty Of Injustice (BOS) 108
2 Plead Guilty In Ski Resort Fire (NSDY/AP) 109
Shiite? Sunni? Some In US Learn Who's Who. (CSM) 109
Guards In Prison Sex Scandal Sentenced (WP/AP) 111
Murderer Of Witness Gets Life In Prison (PHI) 111
Officials Say Man Arrested After Mixing Pills On Flight (HC) 112
Body In Mexican Park Had U.S.agents' Business Cards (HC/AP) 113
Cyclist Indicted In Steroids Probe (NYT/AP) 113
Cyclist Indicted In BALCO Steroid Scandal (SFC) 115
Former American Cyclist Indicted As Balco Inquiry Takes New Step (NYT) 116

DOJ_NMG_0106585

Cyclist Cited For Perjury (NYDN) 116
Cyclist Faces Perjury Charge In Balco Probe (MERCN) 117
Former Cyclist Charged With Hindering Steroid Probe (Update2) (BLOOM) 118
33 Indicted On Drug Ring Charges Tying City, Suburbs (MJS) 118
Five From Hazleton, Freeland Indicted On Heroin Conspiracy Charges (TLPA) 120
Marijuana Co-op Duo Out On Bail (CCT) 120

Immigration:

The System Is The Problem (WP) 121
Texas Official's Report Ignites A New Border Conflict (WP) 122

Congress-Administration:

Sen. Johnson 'Recovering' After Surgery (AP) 123
Johnson's Illness Threatens Dems' Power (AP) 125
Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery Amid Tide Of Sympathy And Well Wishes (AL) 126
Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery For Bleeding In Brain (USAT) 128
What The Fate Of Johnson's Seat May Portend (WSJ) 129
As A Senator Is Felled, A January Vote Looms Big (TIME) ... 130
Ill Senator Is Called Responsive (NYT) 131
Good Wishes Pour In For Sen. Johnson (USAT) 132
Johnson 'Critical' After Surgery (WT) 133
Democratic Senator Survives Brain Surgery (MCT) 134
Senator Tim Johnson Has Brain Surgery, Doctor Says (Update6) (BLOOM) 135
Control Of Senate At Issue As Sen. Johnson Undergoes Brain Surgery (CQ) 137
Senator Recovering From Brain Surgery (CHIT) 139
Senate Is Loath To Remove Disabled Members (LAT) 141
Democratic Sen. Johnson In Stable Condition After Brain Surgery (WP) 142
Experts Optimistic About Senator's Recovery (WP) 143
Senator's Chances Are Mixed For Recovery From Rare Disorder (WSJ) 144
Malformation Caused Johnson's Bleeding (USAT) 145
Birth Defect Led To Stroke In Senator, Doctors Say (NYT) .. 146
What Is Arteriovenous Malformation, Or AVM? (LAT) 147
Senator's Improvement Connected To Control Of Chamber (LAT) 148
Sen. Johnson Seldom In The Spotlight (AP) 149
An Unfamiliar Spotlight For An Unassuming Senator (NYT) 150
House Considers Independent Ethics Panel (AP) 151
First Steps Toward Ethics Reform In Congress (CSM) 152
Page Board Chair Wants Monthly Meetings (AP) 153
Pelosi: GOP To Get 1 Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills (WSJ/DJ) 154
GOP Misses Chance To Reshape Environmental Laws (LAT) 154
Fitzgerald Mum On Cheney In Leak Case (AP) 156
Last-Minute Inserts Offer Benefits In Medicare Bill (NYT) 157
Minority Hiring On Hill Pushed (WT) 158
Chertoff Says FEMA Still Has Work To Do (AP) 159
Dow Sets Another Record Close On Strong Corporate Profits (WP/AP) 160
Markets Go On Record-breaking Binge (USAT) 160
Dow Hits Record Over 12400 Mark Despite Oil Rise (WSJ) 161
Import Prices Climb 0.2% After Two-Month Decline (WSJ) .162
Opec Flexes Its Muscles By Agreeing To Cut Production (FT) 162
OPEC Sets Reduction In Output (NYT) 163
OPEC's Cut Aims To Prop Up Prices (WSJ) 164
OPEC Plans Another Cutback In Oil Production (BLOOM) .. 165
Americans Open To New Kinds Of Candidates (WSJ) 166
Whichever Way The Wind Blows (NYT) 167
Trade Ruling On Steel May Boost Auto Industry (WSJ) 168
Obama: Not 'the Un-Hillary' (CHIT) 169
Taking 'Obama-mania' In Stride (CSM) 171
Commission Seeks School System Overhaul (AP) 171
Expert Panel Proposes Far-Reaching Redesign Of The American Education System (NYT) 172
Schools Report Urges Drastic Change, Higher Salaries (WP) 173
Panel: Revamp U.S. High Schools (CHIT) 175
To Fix US Schools, Panel Says, Start Over (CSM) 176
Report Calls For Overhaul Of U.S. Education System (WSJ) 178
U.S. Schools Overhaul Sought, Using Private Control (Update3) (BLOOM) 178
A Pentagon Agency Is Looking At Brains -- And Raising Eyebrows (WSJ) 180

Other News:

Local Elections Test For Iran President (AP) 181
Rogues And Fools (NYT) 182
Israel Bars Hamas Official Carrying Millions (NYT) 182
Palestinian Premier Barred At Border (WP) 184
Palestinian PM Found With $35m In Cash (FT) 185
Hamas In Control Of Gaza Border Crossing (AP) 185
Israel's High Court OKs Targeted Attacks (CHIT) 186
Israeli High Court Backs Military On Its Policy Of 'Targeted Killings' (WP) 187
In Lebanon, Hizbullah's Rise Provokes Shiite Dissent (CSM) 189

DOJ_NMG_0106586

Lebanese Government Still Standing (LAT) 191
U.S. Standing Sinks In Mideast (WT) 191
North Korea Emphasizes Nuclear Pride (WSJ) 192
North Korean Talks To Resume Monday (MCT) 193
N. Korea Coming Back To The Table (LAT) 194
NKorea May Stage Second Nuclear Test During Six-party Talks: Minister (AFP) 195
$1M Fund Intended To Assist Activists (AP) 196
Bush Creates Activists' Funding (WT) 196
Pentagon Calls For New African Command (AP) 197
Egypt Arrests Opposition Leaders After A Protest (NYT) 197
UK Drops BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe (FT) 198
White House Hosts Malaria Summit (AFP) 199
Bush Celebrates Early Victories In Campaign Against Malaria (NYT) 200
Bush Says Ending Malaria 'Possible' (WT) 200
U.S., China Clash On Currency (WP) 201
China Entreats U.S. To Broaden Its Understanding (WSJ) ... 202
New U.N. Leader Is Sworn In And Promises To Rebuild Trust (NYT) 203
Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (AP) 204
Ban Ki-moon Sworn In As Next UN Chief (AFP) 205
Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary (LAT) 206
Incoming U.N. Chief Ban Pledges To Restore Trust (WP) ... 207
S. Korea's Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (WT) 209
Castro Near Death, U.S. Intelligence Chief Says (WP) 209
After Years Of Setbacks, Embargo Opponents See Glimmer Of Hope (MCT) 210
Cuba Vows To Defy U.S. Efforts At Change (AP) 211
Poll: 1 In 4 Cubans OK With Freedoms (AP) 212
A Central Character In Russian Whodunit Says He Was A Victim (WSJ) 212
Defining Democracy Down (WSJ) 214
Hair-Raising New World (WSJ) 216
A Tough Beginning (WP) 217
Pacts Americana? (NYT) 218

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Warns About Attacks If Ill Cleric Dies (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

The FBI is putting out a warning saying if the sickly, blind Egyptian helf in the 1993 WTC bombing dies, it could trigger attacks against the U.S.

WASHINGTON -- The blind Egyptian cleric convicted in 1995 in connection with a plot to blow up the World Trade Center suffered a "medical emergency" at a federal prison in Springfield, Mo., last week, and the FBI is warning that his death could trigger attacks against the United States.

Law enforcement and homeland security officials said an FBI advisory was sent about the deteriorating condition of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, 68, "out of an abundance of caution," and there was no specific threat information about planned attacks.

Sources said that the man considered a spiritual leader to the Islamist radical movement was rushed to a Springfield hospital emergency room last week after spitting up blood. A tumor was found on his liver and he was diagnosed with terminal liver cancer, the sources said. The cleric is now "stable," and has been returned to the prison, according to Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley.

New York City Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said yesterday that the FBI had shared its assessment with his department, "and we'll take appropriate precautions as, you know, as our intelligence indicates."

Abdel-Rahman was convicted in October 1995 of being part of a wide-ranging conspiracy to blow up the World Trade Center, bomb the United Nations and kill Egypt's president.

"He is a man of great substance and following in parts of the Islamic world, and there is no doubt that his death will provoke an outpouring of both sympathy and anger," said Vincent Cannistraro, a terrorism expert and former director of intelligence programs for the National Security Council. "Will that translate into a terrorist event? It's possible. But the case is more likely to create spontaneous violence abroad."

DOJ_NMG_0106587

He discounted the likelihood of such incidents in the United States because of the lack of what he called "a substantial Muslim fundamentalist constituency."

Abdel-Rahman has long suffered from ill health, including diabetes. As his condition deteriorated, he was moved from a maximum-security prison in Colorado to the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo. Six years ago, al-Qaida released the cleric's purported "last will and testament" in which he exhorted his followers to "extract the most violent revenge" if he died in U.S. custody.

"His death could arguably inspire others, but I think that more than anything, this is a cautionary step," Frank Cilluffo, director of the Homeland Security Policy Institute at George Washington University, said of the advisory. "I think it comes from the recognition that some solutions aren't going to be out of the FBI, but from state and local authorities, and any information they have ... could be valuable."

Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said that it was the FBI's job to advise of developments, but "I don't think we should be overly concerned."

Staff writer Herb Lowe contributed to this story.

Jailed Sheik Has Tumor On Liver (NYDN)

New York Daily News, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The notorious blind Egyptian sheik who led the first terrorist assault on New York City is "falling apart" and was recently hospitalized, federal officials said yesterday.

Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the imprisoned Islamic cleric known as the Blind Sheik, was rushed from a federal prison hospital in Springfield, Mo., to an emergency room after he started "throwing up blood," according to an FBI intelligence bulletin obtained by the Daily News.

While under examination at St. John's Regional Health Center's trauma unit on Dec. 6 to stop bleeding in his esophagus, doctors "discovered a small tumor on his liver," the FBI said.

Abdel-Rahman is now stable and "is not at death's door," a U.S. official lamented.

"The guy is sick; he's falling apart," the official added.

He is also back in prison.

The FBI sent notice to police agencies Dec. 8 because Rahman has begged for revenge if he died in an America prison.

Abdel-Rahman was convicted a decade ago and is serving a life sentence for planning to destroy city landmarks. He issued a religious fatwa to kill Americans that was cited by Osama Bin Laden, whose original Sept. 11 plot involved hijacking jets to secure Abdel-Rahman's release.

James Gordon Meek

Sheik's Declining Health Puts FBI On Alert (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The FBI issued a security alert to law enforcement agencies last week because of the declining health of imprisoned terrorism conspirator Omar Abdel-Rahman, the blind Egyptian cleric who once called for attacks on America if he died in U.S. custody, two federal law enforcement officials said Thursday.

Rahman, 68, who has ties to al-Qaeda and is widely known as the "Blind Sheik," was sentenced to life in prison in 1996 after being convicted of assisting a plot to attack New York City landmarks. He suffers from diabetes and has been held at the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo., said the officials, who described the contents of the Dec. 8 bulletin. The officials requested anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly on the matter. Rahman has been in declining health almost since his conviction more than a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0106588

The officials said that there was no indication an attack on the USA is coming, but that the FBI bulletin was a reminder that Rahman had called on terrorist associates to seek "the most violent revenge" if he died in U.S. custody. His statement was part of his will, which was made public in 1998.

U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Tracy Billingsley, said Thursday that Rahman was taken to an undisclosed hospital for treatment last week, but that his condition stabilized and he was returned to the prison hospital. She declined to elaborate on his condition, citing federal prison policy.

Rahman, who has been praised in recent years by al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, was convicted of taking part in a plot to assassinate political and religious leaders and blow up the United Nations and other landmarks in New York City. At his sentencing hearing in New York, Rahman called his case "an extension of the American war against Islam."

The sentencing came nearly two years after the convictions of four men in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, which killed six people and injured more than 1,000. Conspirators in the terrorist plot linked to Rahman were not charged in the '93 bombing but were accused of being part of the group that carried it out. Rahman is regarded as the spiritual leader of the radical Islamic group Al-Gamaa al-Islamiya, a group based in Egypt that has claimed responsibility for a 1997 attack at a Luxor temple in protest of the sheik's confinement by the United States.

Sheik's Illness Prompts Bulletin (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

The hospitalization of Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, who is serving a life sentence at a Missouri prison for his role in a 1993 plot to bomb New York City landmarks, prompted the authorities to issue a bulletin saying that he had urged his followers to engage in violence if he died in custody, law enforcement officials said. The officials said they had received no credible threats associated with Sheik Abdel Rahman, a 69-year-old blind Islamic cleric, but sent the advisory Dec. 8 as a precaution, two days after the sheik was transferred to a Springfield, Mo., hospital for a blood transfusion. A spokesman for the Bureau of Prisons declined to describe details of the sheik's medical problem or say how long he was hospitalized, but said he was returned to the prison when his condition stabilized.

Feds Find No Credible Terror Threats For Holiday (ABC News)

By Richard Esposito

ABC News' The Blotter, December 15, 2006

As the height of the holiday season approaches, the FBI and Department of Homeland Security say there are no known credible terrorist attacks in the making inside the United States, but crowded stores and New Year's celebrations remain attractive targets.

This was a key finding of a "Holiday Season Security Awareness" bulletin circulated Wednesday and obtained by ABCNews.com

"DHS and the FBI currently have no credible intelligence that terrorist organizations are planning attacks against the Homeland during the holiday period," the bulletin stated. "Attacks overseas and disrupted plots abroad continue to suggest a focus on attacks against lightly-defended targets or facilities with lower security profiles. We continue to urge vigilance during the holiday period and ask law enforcement and security personnel to report suspicious activity."

The report cited the Dec. 6 FBI arrest of Derrick Shareef on charges of plotting to detonate hand grenades at an Illinois shopping mall during the holiday season as a reminder of the potential threat.

In a separate security report, the Department of Homeland Security Infrastructure Threat and Risk Analysis Center noted a continued interest on the part of al Qaeda in attacking a national monument or icon. The world-renowned Statue of Liberty and Washington Monument continue to be at the top of that terror wish list, that report said.

Click Here for Full Blotter Coverage.

"DHS lacks credible, specific evidence suggesting any terrorist group currently is targeting national monuments and icons (NMI) assets," the strategic sector assessment report said.

DOJ_NMG_0106589

"Nonethess, al-Qa'ida remains a serious threat and desires another strike in the United States. An attack against NMI assets (National Monuments and Icons) meet its targeting strategy of causing mass casualties and economic and psychologic al damage and would further its strategic goals."

One of a series of sector analyses produced regularly by the Department of Homeland Security, the report notes that "other extremist groups and homegrown Islamic radicals whose views are informed and inspired by, but not necessarily linked to, al-Qa'ida also are a threat to the sector."

"Two sector assets, the Statue of Liberty and the Washington Monument, have featured prominently in detainee and threat reporting."

National monuments and landmarks make a uniquely attractive target, the report said, because they attract large crowds, have symbolic value and allow relatively easy access.

"The NMI sector is unique because of the diverse values its assets represent. The most devastating attack against a particular NMI target would likely cause mass casualties and destroy the symbolic structure. Even a less severe attack, however, would undermine the great value placed in an austere and unblemished monument or icon, especially those that symbolize freedom and safety."

Behind This Very Real Threat (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The common denominator was salad. Over several weeks, hundreds of people reported falling ill with diarrhea and severe intestinal distress after eating leafy green vegetables at salad bars.

The time was September 1984, the place a small town in Oregon called The Dalles.

It took more than a year before investigators determined that 751 people had been sickened, not by accidental contamination, but as a result of deliberate poisoning in what would be the first documented case of bioterrorism in the United States. An obscure religious sect had sprayed Salmonella typhimurium on salad bars and drinking cups in 10 restaurants in an attempt to influence an upcoming election.

"That was probably the first bona fide case of a biological terrorist act in the U.S. in terms of intentional contamination of the food supply," said Peter Chalk, a RAND Corp. terrorism expert. "But there have been other cases of this around the world in terms of simple extortion, carried out by criminals against food companies, as well as by animal rights activists and environmental extremists."

While the U.S. food supply is among the world's safest, experts say it is vulnerable to deliberate, as well as accidental, contamination - a reality brought home by the deaths of three people and the sickening of hundreds as a result of tainted spinach, tomatoes and a still-unidentified food source at Taco Bell. The country's exposure to deliberate sabotage is increasing, moreover, as a result of the centralization of the food supply, growing foreign imports and the system's oversight by a "fragmented and problem-laden" national safety system, in the words of a 2003 report by the Government Accounting Office.

Increased preparations

"The threat from agroterrorism may not be widely recognized, but the threat is real and the impact could be devastating," said FBI Deputy Director John Pistole, speaking at a recent summit of law enforcement and agriculture officials.

Noting that documents about U.S. agriculture, which had been translated into Arabic, were discovered in Afghan caves, Pistole said that, while the FBI had no specific intelligence regarding attacks, "the absence of a communicated threat does not prove the absence of a threat."

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, national response plans to agroterrorism have been prepared by agencies, including the Department of Homeland Security, the FBI, the Food and Drug Administration and the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Stepped-up planning and surveillance have also been spurred by analyses showing growing criminal interest in biological agents. Nineteen of 27 confirmed terrorist efforts to use such agents around the world, and 40 of 56 confirmed criminal cases, occurred in the 1990s, according to a study by W. Seth Carus for National Defense University in Washington, D.C..

But many say that recent contamination episodes are proof that such plans are inadequate.

DOJ_NMG_0106590

"What these incidents show is that the actual oversight of the food supply is questionable," said Chalk, the Rand expert. "One of the major problems is that we require only self-regulation of the food processing industry and that the FDA lacks sufficient inspectors and resources to do the job."

Opinion is divided

Those deficiencies become magnified by the food industry's growing centralization, which could make the introduction of even a small amount of poison devastating. Two Stanford researchers published a study last year concluding that just a third of an ounce of botulinum toxin poured into a milk tanker could cause hundreds of thousands of deaths.

"Food poisoning and food contamination have always been with us," said Michael Pollan, author of "The Omnivore's Dilemma: A Natural History of Four Meals." But it doesn't become a national story like this until it affects hundreds of people. ... If you really cared about national security and public health, you would take steps to promote decentralization of the food supply."

Others, however, discount the terrorist threat. They say an attack on the food supply simply doesn't produce the shock value - or in most cases, the casualties - of crashing planes into buildings.

"If your intent is to kill people, then you can do it in a lot more effective ways," said Jean Weese, a food scientist at Auburn University in Alabama.

Intentional food poisonings

Cases of intentional poisonings of the food supply:

2003: Ninety-two people fall ill after purchasing ground beef from a Michigan supermarket that was intentionally contaminated with nicotine. An employee of the supermarket was subsequently indicted for the contamination of 200 pounds of beef.

1997: Israeli settlers spray pesticides on grapevines in two Palestinian villages, destroying up to 17,000 metric tons of grapes.

1990s: Before using sarin nerve gas in the Tokyo subways in 1995, which killed 12 people and sickened thousands, Aum Shinrikyo produced biological agents including botulinum and anthrax, and tried unsuccessfully to use them. The group outfitted three vehicles to disseminate botulinum toxin, according to testimony by former members, one of which was targeted at the U.S. Navy base at Yokosuka. The effort is believed to have failed because the agents were not sufficiently virulent.

1984: The Rajneeshee cult spreads salmonella in salad bars at 10 restaurants in The Dalles, Ore., to influence a local election. Health officials say that 751 people were sickened and more than 40 hospitalized.

1978: Members of a group calling itself the Arab Revolutionary Council poison Israeli oranges with mercury, injuring at least 12 people and reducing exports by 40 percent.

SOURCE: CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH REPORT,

"AGROTERRORISM: THREATS AND PREPAREDNESS"

Port Protectionism Doesn't Work (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

SIX MEMBERS OF Congress traveled to the Dominican Republic on Sunday for a look at the future of U.S. port security. At Puerto Caucedo, east of Santo Domingo, they examined an X-ray scanning system for cargo containers. The port performing this cutting-edge work is operated by Dubai Ports World.

Yes, that's the same company that Congress thinks can't be trusted to run U.S. ports. Earlier this year, Dubai Ports World bought a British firm that operated several ports and cargo terminals in the U.S. Unfortunately for the company, the deal came during an election year when lawmakers were having chest-thumping contests to prove who was tougher on national security. Though Dubai Ports World is headquartered in the United Arab Emirates, one of this country's strongest Middle Eastern allies, the fact that the UAE is a Muslim country was apparently enough to prove to lawmakers that the deal would make U.S. ports unsafe. Dubai Ports World headed off congressional action by promising to sell its U.S. assets.

On Sunday, insurance giant American International Group agreed to buy the port operations. The lawmakers who spearheaded the xenophobic attacks on Dubai Ports World have since made a lot of self-congratulatory noises, but they have yet to explain why the Dubai company can be trusted to oversee foreign ports where cargo is screened before it's shipped to the U.S., but not ports in the U.S. itself. Nor is it clear why these U.S. port facilities are better off being owned by a financial services company.

DOJ_NMG_0106591

Puerto Caucedo isn't the only Dubai Ports World facility where new security programs for U.S. cargo are performed. Last week, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced that, starting in February, six foreign ports will scan U.S.-bound cargo for nuclear materials. Of those, only three will scan 100% of U.S.-bound containers, and two of the three are operated by Dubai Ports World.

Ports all over the U.S. are facing a capacity crunch amid a flood of imports, especially from Asia. For East Coast ports — like the ones just purchased by AIG — this problem will worsen in the long run after the widening of the Panama Canal. At a time when ports need money to expand, the United States has sent a self-defeating message to foreign port operators that they aren't welcome to invest here. Three of the four biggest such companies in the world (including Dubai Ports World) are foreign owned.

The best thing about the AIG deal is that it closes the chapter on one of the most embarrassing fits of isolationist hysteria in recent U.S. history. Unfortunately, with a pack of protectionist Democrats about to enter Congress, there could be more bouts of hysteria on the way.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pelosi Wants Panel To Oversee Spy Budget (USAT)

USA Today, December 15, 2006

House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi called Thursday for creation of a congressional panel that would oversee the administration's intelligence budget.

The California Democrat said the proposed intelligence oversight panel would be made up of lawmakers from the Appropriations Committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence, and would work within the Appropriations Committee.

Such a panel, Pelosi said, "makes oversight stronger and makes the American people safer."

Pelosi also said:

•Democratic and Republican leaders have agreed to form a bipartisan task force that will study whether an outside, independent panel on ethics should be created to police the House. Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio has agreed to the idea.

•House Democrats have six objectives they hope to accomplish in the first 100 hours after they return to work and assume control in January.

Those six: Ethics and lobbying overhaul, implementing the 9/11 Commission recommendations, raising the federal minimum wage, cutting interest rates on student loans, making health care more affordable and cutting subsidies to the oil industry.

Chertoff defends risk-assessment program

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff defended the government's computerized system for assessing international travelers as potential terrorists.

He said it is a legal effort "to make sure that we don't inconvenience the rights of most travelers" while focusing "on those people that do potentially pose a threat." Seven major U.S. and foreign travel industry associations said Wednesday that the "far-reaching and invasive screening of millions of business travelers" could harm the travel industry. Details of the 16-year-old system were made public last month.

Fund created for human rights activists

The State Department announced a $1 million emergency fund to help cover such expenses as legal fees and medical bills for human rights activists. The fund is meant to pay short-term bills for people who take great risks by defending human rights.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also redefined U.S. expectations for how groups that promote democracy and human rights will be treated around the world. People should be free to join them and the groups should be free to act within international law, the State Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0106592

Pentagon wants an African command

The Pentagon is recommending to President Bush that a new U.S. military command for Africa be created, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. Commanders believe Africa's strategic importance has risen in the age of terrorism and operations there should not be split among several commands.

House Democrats Planning New Intelligence Oversight (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Responding to a recommendation from the Sept. 11 commission, the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said Thursday that House Democrats would create a new type of committee to better scrutinize spending on the nation's intelligence efforts.

The select committee, which would include the lawmakers who set intelligence policy as well as those who oversee the intelligence budget, is intended to address a central commission finding that Congressional oversight of intelligence matters was dysfunctional and needed to be more centralized. The committee will review intelligence spending requests, conduct hearings, make financing recommendations and assess how the money is spent.

The initiative is the latest indication from the Democratic leadership that it intends to be aggressive in the opening weeks of Congress, when the party coming into power may have its best opportunity to push through major changes.

"It's with really some degree of excitement, frankly, that I make this proposal," said Ms. Pelosi, who served on both the Appropriations and Intelligence Committees. "I know it will make the American people safer."

After the Sept. 11 commission issued its report in 2004, the Republican-led Congress explored the idea of making in-house changes sought by the panel. But few were seriously pursued after lawmakers ran into the traditional resistance from senior members of Congress unwilling to surrender any authority.

The Democratic proposal, which would apply to the House only, does not go as far as the commission recommended, but one member of the panel welcomed it on Thursday as a substantive step.

"I think it is a creative, bold solution," said Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman who served on the panel and consulted with lawmakers on the new committee. "You can't point to the F.B.I. to clean up its culture and ask the C.I.A. to improve human intelligence without cleaning up your own backyard."

In another major break with House practice, Ms. Pelosi also formally announced that Democrats, with Republican cooperation, would form a task force to study ways the House could establish an independent entity to enforce House ethics rules.

"There's no question that the ethics process in the past couple of years has lost the confidence of the American people," said Ms. Pelosi, referring to a string of corruption cases that drew little response from the internal ethics panel, which has members from both parties.

Earlier this week, the leadership also announced that it would not try to complete a series of spending bills left on the table by Republicans. This would result in the unusual stalling of thousands of pet projects sought by lawmakers.

The new intelligence committee would be established through proposed changes in House rules to be presented to lawmakers when the 110th Congress convenes on Jan. 4. Under the Democratic proposal, it would consist of members of the Intelligence Committee as well as the Appropriations Committee and make recommendations to the full Appropriations Committee.

Advocates of the approach say it should provide some "cross-pollination" that will lead to lawmakers' gaining more expertise and depth of knowledge about intelligence activities, giving them a greater ability to monitor operations and suggest changes.

Ms. Pelosi said the plan "removes the barriers between the House appropriators and authorizers, makes the oversight stronger."

"What we are doing, I think, is quite remarkable and new," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0106593

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, was noncommittal about the intelligence plan. He said he would "take a look at her proposal and confer with my colleagues about it."

The proposal would have to be approved by the entire House. Democrats, if they are united on the plan, would be able to override even unanimous opposition from Republicans in the new Congress.

Mr. Boehner took the opportunity to take a jab at Ms. Pelosi, accusing her of backtracking on a high-profile campaign pledge to adopt all of the remaining recommendations of the commission that Republicans resisted. The commission, for instance, had proposed a new joint House-Senate intelligence panel.

But Ms. Pelosi said it would not be possible to follow all the ideas suggested and indicated that Democrats, after pushing through the new internal rules, would immediately turn to other commission recommendations.

"We'll go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores," she said.

Senate Democrats have been less enthusiastic about making such changes, but the House action could step up pressure for a new approach to intelligence matters across the Rotunda as well. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said last week that he would consult committee chairmen to see what recommendations could be enacted.

On the ethics task force, Democrats said its findings on an independent watchdog would be due March 15. Ms. Pelosi said the group should determine how such an enforcement arm might work.

Pelosi Announces Intelligence Plans (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, December 15, 2006

Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi on Thursday recommended creating a House panel to closely examine U.S. spy agencies' actions and spending, a step toward adopting all the proposals of the anti-terror Sept. 11 commission.

Pelosi, D-Calif., said the panel would "protect the American people with the best possible intelligence, recognizing the role that Congress plays in all of this."

It also would shake up long-standing power structures in Congress.

The Select Intelligence Oversight Panel would be part of the powerful Appropriations Committee and would draw its membership from that spending committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Through a series of hearings, it would examine the president's intelligence budget, prepare the classified details to the annual defense spending bill and conduct oversight of the use of appropriated funds by intelligence agencies.

Pelosi's proposal does not follow the exact recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. But it moves closer to the overhaul recommended two years ago when the commission found weaknesses in how Congress monitors the 16 intelligence agencies.

A Democratic member of the Sept. 11 commission — former Rep. Timothy Roemer of Indiana — said the change would achieve the commission's two major goals: forcing spy agencies to disclose more to Congress, which they often have ignored, and linking the expanded oversight to the power of the purse.

"This is a major step forward in terms of correcting some of the dysfunction on Capitol Hill," Roemer said.

The commission's Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean, said Pelosi's plan was a helpful step. But, he added, "It depends very much who the chairman is and who the members are."

Yet Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, who will lead House Republicans next year, was lukewarm about the proposal. "I appreciate the incoming speaker's efforts to reach out to Republicans in hopes of continuing to improve congressional oversight of America's intelligence systems," Boehner said in a statement.

The full House will have to approve Pelosi's proposal. It was one of six she outlined Thursday as her priorities for the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January.

The others are ethics and lobbying overhaul; raising the federal minimum wage; cutting interest rates on student loans; making health care more affordable; and cutting subsidies to the oil industry.

DOJ_NMG_0106594

It also is not clear if the Senate would create a similar intelligence committee, which would be needed to avoid awkwardness as the two chambers work together on intelligence spending bills.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and other senators are reviewing Pelosi's proposal in the context of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, said his spokesman, Jim Manley.

U.S. intelligence agencies will continue to work closely with Congress, should it create the new panels, said Ross Feinstein, a spokesman for National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

In late 2004, the Republican-controlled Congress put in place many post-Sept. 11 changes with a law that created a national intelligence director and other changes. Some of the most vexing recommendations were put aside.

Pelosi has pledged to improve on Republican efforts.

"We'll go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores," Pelosi said.

Less than 10 percent of cargo containers arriving at seaports are physically inspected. The Bush administration has said other security measures will permit officials to screen 100 percent of incoming containers — by checking each container's origin, destination and purported contents to see whether anything raises suspicions.

"By the end of next year, we expect to have virtually all containers coming into the U.S. screened through radiation portal monitors," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday.

The potency of Pelosi's proposed overhaul will not be known until the Democrats go public with their legislation next year. For now, Pelosi is looking internally at how Congress will do its work.

The classified nature of intelligence spending creates risks that improper spending will go undetected. That became apparent this year when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was convicted of taking bribes in return for using classified legislation to steer government contracts to favored companies. Cunningham was a member of both the intelligence and appropriations committees.

In 2004, the Sept. 11 commission found widespread dissatisfaction with the way Congress oversees spy agencies, saying the current committee structure lacked the muscle to reign in spending.

The commission suggested two alternatives: form a joint House and Senate intelligence committee or create committees in each chamber that conduct the oversight and allocate money for the spy agencies.

Tweaking the second option, Pelosi would create an intelligence oversight subcommittee within the Appropriations Committee, rather than establishing a new stand-alone panel.

The success of her plan depends on her colleagues, some of whom would have to cede more control to Pelosi's new panel.

"Few things are more difficult to change in Washington than congressional committee jurisdictions and prerogatives," the Sept. 11 commission wrote. "To a member, these assignments are almost as important as the map of his or her congressional district."

New Panel To Check Intelligence Budgets (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi yesterday said intelligence budgets would get an extra layer of congressional oversight, giving Democrats opportunity to curb the scope of some of President Bush's programs.

Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats will create a select intelligence oversight panel that will function within the House Appropriations Committee.

The panel will be responsible for crafting the classified portion of the Defense Department's budget and will allow the lawmakers who authorize spy programs to have an additional role in funding them.

The California Democrat promised that the panel will hold hearings on the president's intelligence budget, which includes funding for the CIA and National Security Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0106595

The Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence now is the only panel that handles intelligence policy, and funds are allocated through the Appropriations defense subcommittee. Democrats propose bridging the two committees, creating a separate panel with a few members from each.

"I know it will make the American people safer," Mrs. Pelosi said.

The new panel, for example, could adjust funding for the NSA's wiretapping program, which many Democrats oppose, and oversee intelligence agencies' use of the funds.

The bipartisan National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States said oversight would have helped avoid many of the intelligence failures leading up to the September 11 attacks.

It also called the intelligence agencies "too complex and secret," and lamented a shortage of oversight.

"Even the most basic information about how much money is actually allocated to or within the intelligence community, and most of its key components is shrouded from public view," the September 11 commission's report said.

Mrs. Pelosi, who has served on both the intelligence and appropriations panels, has long advocated transparency in intelligence agencies.

A Republican appropriations aide, however, said the intelligence budgets must remain secret to prevent enemies from becoming aware of U.S. spy programs.

A transparent budget could signal to enemies, for example, large procurements such as satellite systems. The aide said "one or two" appropriations staffers now have "need-to-know" access.

September 11 commission member John F. Lehman, a Republican former Navy secretary, said the plan to eliminate disconnect seems to be "a very good move in the right direction."

Former Rep. Timothy J. Roemer, an Indiana Democrat who served on the September 11 commission, said the idea is "creative" and "a major step forward" to meeting the panel's goals.

Incoming House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said he is analyzing and discussing Mrs. Pelosi's plan with his colleagues.

Mr. Boehner will recommend which Republican members will serve on the panel, but Mrs. Pelosi has final appointment power. The chairmen and ranking members of both the full Appropriations Committee and the defense subcommittee will serve as ex-officio members of the new panel.

Pelosi Looks To Boost Oversight Of Intelligence And Ethics (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi announced yesterday that she will create a new panel within the Appropriations Committee to oversee the nation's intelligence agencies and a House task force to examine establishing an outside ethics panel.

The twin moves demonstrated the delicate balance that Pelosi (D-Calif.) is trying to strike to maintain her political power while fulfilling the promises of the Democrats' successful 2006 campaign. Both decisions fall short of recommendations coming from the bipartisan commission that examined the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and from ethics groups. But they go well beyond what Republicans were willing to do while they controlled Congress and beyond even what some Democrats were anticipating in recent weeks.

"I think it's a significant step forward on improving oversight and a major step forward on correcting the dysfunction on Capitol Hill," former congressman Timothy J. Roemer (D-Ind.), a member of the Sept. 11 commission, said of the intelligence plan.

In 2004, the commission urged Congress either to create a House-Senate intelligence panel or grant the House and Senate intelligence committees the power not only to oversee the nation's intelligence agencies but also to fund them and shape intelligence policy. The intelligence committees' gains would come at the expense of the Armed Services committees and the Appropriations panels' defense subcommittees, which now control intelligence spending. But, the commissioners said, intelligence agencies were routinely ignoring the intelligence committees because those panels did not have the power of the purse.

DOJ_NMG_0106596

Appropriators, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally and the incoming chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, strongly objected to any efforts to strip them of jurisdiction over the intelligence budget. Democratic sources on the Appropriations, intelligence and Armed Services committees said last month that Pelosi was leaning toward establishing a panel to examine options for reorganizing the House along the lines suggested by the Sept. 11 commission.

But news reports on the issue emboldened commissioners and families of Sept. 11 victims to renew their push for stronger congressional oversight on intelligence. So Pelosi found a middle ground: Members of her intelligence oversight panel would come from both the intelligence and Appropriations committees, and would have the tasks of overseeing the intelligence agencies and drafting their budgets. Those budgets, however, would be folded into the larger annual defense spending bill, which would still be under the jurisdiction of Murtha's subcommittee and the larger House Appropriations Committee.

The plan "removes the barriers between the House appropriators and authorizers, makes the oversight stronger and makes the American people safer," Pelosi said.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) would not promise to follow suit.

"We will work with key senators to carefully examine the House proposal as part of our larger discussion about the best ways to ensure implementation of the spirit and letter of the 9/11 commission's recommendations," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Similarly, proposals to establish an outside panel of experts to examine ethics complaints have met staunch opposition from ethics committee members, who say they should be expected to do their job. Rep. Martin T. Meehan (Mass.), one of the Democrats' point men on the ethics package that will come to a vote in January, said last week that an outside panel would not be part of the initial wave of ethics rules but could come up later.

Pelosi put some weight behind that yesterday, saying she and Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the incoming House minority leader, would create a panel to report back by late March on an outside panel.

Joan Claybrook, president of the watchdog group Public Citizen, said she is sympathetic to the internal politics involved. But she added that the panel "worries me enormously," saying "I think they ought to bite the bullet" and create an independent Office of Public Integrity now.

Aides close to Pelosi said that by creating such an investigatory panel, she is all but ensuring she will push for an outside group, possibly of former House members and judges, to examine ethics complaints and watch over ethics committee efforts.

Democratic leaders circulated their proposed rules changes yesterday ahead of a conference call with House Democrats. They include a ban on gifts and travel from lobbyists, preapproval from the ethics committee on all lawmakers' travel funded by outside groups, a ban on the use of corporate jets, and mandatory ethics training. Under the rules package, Republicans would be guaranteed some votes on amendments. Members would be given extra time to read bills before a vote is scheduled, and votes could no longer be held open indefinitely while House leaders twist arms to win passage.

House-Senate negotiating conferences would be opened somewhat, and provisions could no longer be sneaked into final agreements after the negotiations are closed.

On budget matters, rules would be reinstated saying tax cuts or spending increases would have to be offset by tax hikes or spending cuts to ensure the deficit does not expand. Special parliamentary rules that prohibit filibusters in the Senate could no longer be used on legislation that expands the budget deficit, a slap at Republicans who used such rules to pass successive waves of large tax cuts. And home-district pet projects, known as earmarks, would have to be claimed by their sponsors, who would have to certify that the earmarks would not benefit them or their spouses.

Pelosi Wants New House Committee To Oversee Spy Spending (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The AP, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106597

WASHINGTON -- Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi on Thursday recommended creating a House panel to closely examine U.S. spy agencies' actions and spending, a step toward adopting all the proposals of the anti-terror Sept. 11 commission.

Pelosi, D-Calif., said the panel would "protect the American people with the best possible intelligence, recognizing the role that Congress plays in all of this."

It also would shake up long-standing power structures in Congress.

The Select Intelligence Oversight Panel would be part of the powerful Appropriations Committee and would draw its membership from that spending committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Through a series of hearings, it would examine the president's intelligence budget, prepare the classified details to the annual defense spending bill and conduct oversight of the use of appropriated funds by intelligence agencies.

Pelosi's proposal does not follow the exact recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. But it moves closer to the overhaul recommended two years ago when the commission found weaknesses in how Congress monitors the 16 intelligence agencies.

A Democratic member of the Sept. 11 commission -- former Rep. Timothy Roemer of Indiana -- said the change would achieve the commission's two major goals: forcing spy agencies to disclose more to Congress, which they often have ignored, and linking the expanded oversight to the power of the purse.

"This is a major step forward in terms of correcting some of the dysfunction on Capitol Hill," Roemer said.

The commission's Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean, said Pelosi's plan was a helpful step. But, he added, "It depends very much who the chairman is and who the members are."

Yet Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, who will lead House Republicans next year, was lukewarm about the proposal. "I appreciate the incoming speaker's efforts to reach out to Republicans in hopes of continuing to improve congressional oversight of America's intelligence systems," Boehner said in a statement.

The full House will have to approve Pelosi's proposal. It was one of six she outlined Thursday as her priorities for the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January.

The others are ethics and lobbying overhaul; raising the federal minimum wage; cutting interest rates on student loans; making health care more affordable; and cutting subsidies to the oil industry.

It also is not clear if the Senate would create a similar intelligence committee, which would be needed to avoid awkwardness as the two chambers work together on intelligence spending bills.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and other senators are reviewing Pelosi's proposal in the context of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, said his spokesman, Jim Manley.

In late 2004, the Republican-controlled Congress put in place many post-Sept. 11 changes with a law that created a national intelligence director and other changes. Some of the most vexing recommendations were put aside.

Pelosi has pledged to improve on Republican efforts.

"We'll go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores," Pelosi said.

Less than 10 percent of cargo containers arriving at seaports are physically inspected. The Bush administration has said other security measures will permit officials to screen 100 percent of incoming containers -- by checking each container's origin, destination and purported contents to see whether anything raises suspicions.

"By the end of next year, we expect to have virtually all containers coming into the U.S. screened through radiation portal monitors," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday.

The potency of Pelosi's proposed overhaul will not be known until the Democrats go public with their legislation next year. For now, Pelosi is looking internally at how Congress will do its work.

The classified nature of intelligence spending creates risks that improper spending will go undetected. That became apparent this year when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was convicted of taking bribes in return for using classified legislation to steer government contracts to favored companies. Cunningham was a member of both the intelligence and appropriations committees.

DOJ_NMG_0106598

In 2004, the Sept. 11 commission found widespread dissatisfaction with the way Congress oversees spy agencies, saying the current committee structure lacked the muscle to reign in spending.

The commission suggested two alternatives: form a joint House and Senate intelligence committee or create committees in each chamber that conduct the oversight and allocate money for the spy agencies.

Tweaking the second option, Pelosi would create an intelligence oversight subcommittee within the Appropriations Committee, rather than establishing a new stand-alone panel.

The success of her plan depends on her colleagues, some of whom would have to cede more control to Pelosi's new panel.

"Few things are more difficult to change in Washington than congressional committee jurisdictions and prerogatives," the Sept. 11 commission wrote. "To a member, these assignments are almost as important as the map of his or her congressional district."

Homeland Security Chief Defends Real ID Plan (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET News.com, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON--U.S. Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Thursday defended forthcoming national ID cards as vital for security and consistent with privacy rights.

Chertoff said one of his agency's top goals next year is to forge ahead with recommendations for the controversial documents established by a federal law called the Real ID Act in May 2005. By 2008, Americans may be required to present such federally approved cards--which must be electronically readable--to travel on an airplane, open a bank account or take advantage of myriad government services such as Social Security.

Credit: DHS Michael Chertoff

"I think this is an example (of) when security and privacy go hand in hand," the Homeland Security chief said in a half-hour speech at George Washington University here. "It is a win-win for both."

The importance of such documents was magnified by an announcement Wednesday, Chertoff said. Federal authorities reported that they had made more than 1,200 arrests related to immigration violations and unmasked criminal organizations stealing and trafficking in genuine birth certificates and Social Security cards belonging to U.S. citizens.

"Do you think your privacy is better protected if someone can walk around with phony docs with your name and your Social Security number, or is your privacy better protected if you have the confidence that the identification relied upon is in fact reliable and uniquely tied to a single individual?" Chertoff asked rhetorically.

The upcoming federally approved IDs are intended to be a secure, tamperproof means of protecting Americans' identities while keeping out terrorists and other wrongdoers, Chertoff said.

The Homeland Security chief, who is nearing his two-year mark with the agency, was likely trying to quell rampant skepticism about the IDs voiced by some privacy advocates, immigrants and other groups. Some have said they fear that the IDs are a stepping stone to a veritable police state, complete with ready surveillance of individuals.

Some have argued that the idea of creating more tamperproof IDs is only a marginally better way to screen out those intent on committing terrorist acts because ID cards don't even begin to tackle a core crime prevention challenge: determining a person's unspoken intentions.

State governments have also been critical of the 2008 deadline and what they have said amounts to an unfunded mandate to switch over their systems. A September study released by the National Governors Association, National Conference of State Legislatures and American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators estimated that the overhaul of their identification systems (PDF) would cost states more than $11 billion over five years. The New Hampshire state legislature even considered passing a law earlier this year that would prohibit the state from complying with the federal Real ID law.

Government Proposes Rail Security Plan (AP)

By Leslie Miller

AP, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106599

A government proposal to prevent terrorists from attacking trains would require railroads to inspect rail cars and keep them in secure areas when not in use.

The plan, to be announced Friday, would affect freight and passenger rail systems.

The Homeland Security Department's proposal falls short of the more stringent measures proposed by Democratic lawmakers who are set to take control of Congress next month.

The incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee indicated Congress may impose stricter requirements than those proposed by the Bush administration.

"I am not convinced that all of the security gaps plaguing our current hazmat transport system will be filled by this proposal," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss.

A major concern is that terrorists would attack or sabotage a rail car filled with poisonous chemicals, which would spread quickly and kill thousands.

The proposal would give the Transportation Security Administration authority to inspect railroads, rail yards and mass transit rail systems, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press from a person involved in the rulemaking process.

The 708 railroads affected would have to designate a rail security coordinator to receive intelligence from the government, and would have to report significant security concerns and potential threats.

The proposal also would require receivers of hazardous materials to keep the rail car in a secure area until it is unloaded. Freight railroads would have to report the location of a rail car when requested by the government.

The plan does not match what at least nine cities have proposed — rerouting around densely populated areas trains that are carrying hazardous material.

The District of Columbia passed a law in 2005 banning hazardous material shipments within 2.2 miles of the Capitol. CSX Transportation sued; the case is pending.

"The only significant risk reduction is rerouting," said Fred Millar, a consultant to the city council in the nation's capital. "Anything short of rerouting isn't serious."

The rail industry fears that other cities would follow Washington's lead if the city prevails. Eight other cities have introduced legislation to ban hazardous shipments.

Railroads say forcing trains to take longer, circuitous routes would create a safety hazard by increasing the likelihood of an accident.

The Federal Railroad Administration has met with freight railroads in an effort to come up with voluntary efforts to secure hazardous materials.

TSA chief Kip Hawley previously was a senior executive with Union Pacific.

The eight cities that introduced legislation to require trains carrying hazardous material be rerouted around them, according to Millar, are Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Albany and Buffalo, N.Y., Cleveland, Baltimore and St. Louis.

Tighter Rule On Hazardous Rail Cargo Is Ready (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Seeking to make rail shipments of chlorine and other hazardous chemicals less vulnerable to attack, the Homeland Security Department intends to announce a proposed rule on Friday to require railroads to track continuously tanker cars of "toxic inhalation hazards" and bar them from leaving the cars unattended or parked for long periods.

The proposal would also clarify how government workers inspect tank cars and railyards for compliance, establish rules on the chain of custody and handoff of dangerous cargoes and set communications requirements.

Each year, the railroads carry 1.7 million shipments of hazardous materials, of which 100,000 are toxic chemicals prone to become airborne in an accident. About 80 percent of the shipments that can become poison gases are chlorine, for purifying water and other applications, or anhydrous ammonia, for fertilizer.

DOJ_NMG_0106600

An official of the Homeland Security Department provided details of the plan on the condition that he not be identified further, because it has not been published. The plan is to be open for public comment for 60 days.

Among other changes, each railroad would have to have a round-the-clock security coordinator to receive tips on threats to cargoes and immediately inform the government of details like the location of cargo.

Many high-hazard cargoes move through densely populated areas, and some cities would like to ban them. The District of Columbia adopted an ordinance in February 2005 that requires permits for "ultra-hazardous materials," including explosives, flammable liquids like liquefied petroleum gas, toxic solids and toxic gases, from an area extending 2.2 miles from the Capitol.

CSX, which operates a stretch of tracks between the Federal buildings just south of the Mall, challenged the ordinance in court as unduly burdensome to interstate commerce. Enforcement has been blocked while the case works its way through the federal courts.

Fred Millar, a consultant to the City Council who drafted the ordinance, said eight cities were weighing similar rules: Albany, Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Philadelphia and St. Louis.

The new rule would not address routes. Such rules would be sensible, Mr. Millar said, but railroads did not like them because they might be forced to give business to one another.

Officials say that the Transportation Department is considering rules on routes that could be published soon.

The domestic security proposal is that carriers would have to establish security zones around affected rail cars parked, loaded or unloaded in urban areas.

More than five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, few federal rules specifically try to prevent terrorists from attacking materials on the rails. Train crews carry manifests showing what they carry and where, and placards on tank cars identify the contents.

The coded placards identify the contents to emergency responders and anybody else with a readily available emergency response handbook.

U.S. Is Dropping Effort To Track If Visitors Leave (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns And Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — In a major blow to the Bush administration's efforts to secure borders, domestic security officials have for now given up on plans to develop a facial or fingerprint recognition system to determine whether a vast majority of foreign visitors leave the country, officials say.

Domestic security officials had described the system, known as U.S. Visit, as critical to security and important in efforts to curb illegal immigration. Similarly, one-third of the overall total of illegal immigrants are believed to have overstayed their visas, a Congressional report says.

Tracking visitors took on particular urgency after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, when it became clear that some of the hijackers had remained in the country after their visas had expired.

But in recent days, officials at the Homeland Security Department have conceded that they lack the financing and technology to meet their deadline to have exit-monitoring systems at the 50 busiest land border crossings by next December. A vast majority of foreign visitors enter and exit by land from Mexico and Canada, and the policy shift means that officials will remain unable to track the departures.

A report released on Thursday by the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, restated those findings, reporting that the administration believes that it will take 5 to 10 years to develop technology that might allow for a cost-effective departure system.

Domestic security officials, who have allocated $1.7 billion since the 2003 fiscal year to track arrivals and departures, argue that creating the program with the existing technology would be prohibitively expensive.

They say it would require additional employees, new buildings and roads at border crossings, and would probably hamper the vital flow of commerce across those borders.

Congress ordered the creation of such a system in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0106601

In an interview last week, the assistant secretary for homeland security policy, Stewart A. Baker, estimated that an exit system at the land borders would cost "tens of billions of dollars" and said the department had concluded that such a program was not feasible, at least for the time being.

"It is a pretty daunting set of costs, both for the U.S. government and the economy," Mr. Stewart said. "Congress has said, 'We want you to do it.' We are not going to ignore what Congress has said. But the costs here are daunting.

"There are a lot of good ideas and things that would make the country safer. But when you have to sit down and compare all the good ideas people have developed against each other, with a limited budget, you have to make choices that are much harder."

The news sent alarms to Congress, where some Republicans and Democrats warned that suspending the monitoring plan would leave the United States vulnerable.

Representative Dana Rohrabacher, a California Republican who is a departing subcommittee chairman on the House International Relations Committee, said the administration could not say it was protecting domestic security without creating a viable exit monitoring system.

"There will not be border security in this country until we have a knowledge of both entry and exit," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "We have to make a choice. Do we want to act and control our borders or do we want to have tens of millions of illegals continuing to pour into our country?"

Representative Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who is set to lead the Homeland Security Committee, also expressed concern.

"It is imperative that Congress work in partnership with the department to develop a comprehensive border security system that ensures we know who is entering and exiting this country and one that cannot be defeated by imposters, criminals and terrorists," Mr. Thompson said in a statement Thursday.

In January 2004, domestic security officials began fingerprint scanning for arriving visitors. The program has screened more than 64 million travelers and prevented more than 1,300 criminals and immigration violators from entering, officials said.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other officials often call the program a singular achievement in making the country safer. U.S. Visit fingerprints and photographs 2 percent of the people entering the country, because Americans and most Canadians and Mexicans are exempt.

Efforts to determine whether visitors actually leave have faltered. Departure monitoring would help officials hunt for foreigners who have not left, if necessary. Domestic security officials say, however, it would be too expensive to conduct fingerprint or facial recognition scans for land departures. Officials have experimented with less costly technologies, including a system that would monitor by radio data embedded in a travel form carried by foreigners as they depart by foot or in vehicles.

Tests of that technology, Radio Frequency Identification, found a high failure rate. At one border point, the system correctly identified 14 percent of the 166 vehicles carrying the embedded documents, the General Accountability Office reported.

The Congressional investigators noted the "numerous performance and reliability problems" with the technology and said it remained unclear how domestic security officials would be able to meet their legal obligation to create an exit program.

Some immigration analysts said stepping away from the program raised questions again about the commitment to enforce border security and immigration laws.

A senior policy analyst at the Center for Immigration Studies, Jessica Vaughn, said the government had long been too deferential to big businesses and travel groups that raised concerns that exit technology might disrupt travel and trade.

"I worry that the issue of cost is an excuse for not doing anything," said Ms. Vaughn, whose group advocates curbing immigration. Domestic security officials said they still hoped to find a way to create an exit system at land borders. "We would to do more testing," a spokesman for the department, Jarrod Agen, said. "We are evaluating the initial tests to determine how to move forward."

U.S. Preparing To Drop Tracking Of Foreigners' Departures By Land (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106602

U.S. homeland security officials are preparing to abandon plans to develop a system to track the departure of foreign visitors at land borders, citing cost and technical obstacles in scaling back a major post-Sept. 11 domestic security initiative, officials said.

Launched in 2004, US-VISIT was designed to automate the tracking of visitors upon entry and exit from the United States, using fingerprints and digital photographs to help find criminals, potential terrorists and visitors who illegally overstay.

The system, which has cost $1.7 billion so far, recorded 61 million people entering the country as of July through 115 airports, 15 seaports and 154 of 170 land ports.

But pilot projects have recorded only about 4 million people leaving the country, and US-VISIT officials have concluded that technology and personnel "cannot now be implemented" at land crossings without major delays in the flow of cross-border traffic, or without enormous cost to expand facilities, roads and communications links, according to a congressional report released yesterday.

"The department is looking at strategies for US-VISIT exit that are the most cost effective, and we are examining strategies for implementation at air and sea ports," said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security. "We are also looking at land ports. However, there are costs associated, including the physical infrastructure as well as the economic impact, and we are in the process of evaluating all that data now."

Several homeland security officials said a final decision has yet to be made, but that, given the limited time and resources, the department intends to focus on expanding US-VISIT at airports, where the majority of visa holders exit the country. Although land ports register about 309 million border crossings a year, compared with 87 million airport crossings, the majority of land crossers are repeat travelers and Mexican, Canadian and U.S. citizens who do not need visas.

"It comes down to, we have to get at this elephant in chunks," one senior official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because a formal decision has not been announced. "It's a recognition that over the short term, over the next couple of years, you can't do an exit system, holistically, land borders and air. Which one do you get more bang for your buck? It's air."

In comments reported by the New York Times and confirmed by Agen, DHS assistant secretary for policy Stewart A. Baker said a land-border exit system would cost "tens of billions of dollars," which he called daunting.

A report by the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm, said it would cost $3 billion and take five to 10 years to implement a biometric system to confirm visitors' identities upon exit. But there is a December 2007 deadline for phasing it in at 50 major land crossings.

US-VISIT has captured 1,100 criminals using false documents, DHS officials said. They said other programs underway to integrate homeland security and FBI fingerprint databases -- which automatically generate risk assessments on travelers and track down immigration violators -- are offsetting the potential value of an exit system.

"Knowing that bad guys have left the country is important, but knowing the bad guy is coming in is more important," one DHS official said. "We want to do it, but it is not as high a priority as the entry piece of it."

The United States is testing the use of radio frequency identification technology -- involving tiny microchips with a unique code embedded in a tag on visitors' departure forms -- instead of a fingerprint or facial-scan system. But a January 2006 test correctly identified only 16 percent of 166 vehicles with RFID tags. Among the tags' drawbacks is that they cannot be physically tied to an individual.

GAO Finds Homeland Security Tech Issues (HC/AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia Ap Business Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Department of Homeland Security system that uses biometric technology to screen people entering the country has aided border patrol agents, but computer snafus and management shortfalls need to be resolved, according to a report issued Thursday.

Government Accountability Office investigators visited 21 border crossings and officials at every one said the U.S. Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, which uses two fingerprints and a digital photograph to identify people, had improved their ability to process visitors and verify identities, according to the GAO report.

DOJ_NMG_0106603

But U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials at 12 of the 21 sites said "computer slowdowns and freezes" hindered visitor processing and inspection times. At nine of those 12, "computer processing problems were not always reported to CBP's computer help desk, as required by CBP guidelines," according to the report.

"These computer processing problems have the potential to not only inconvenience travelers because of the increased time needed to complete the inspection process, but to compromise security, particularly if CBP officers are unable to perform biometric checks, one of the critical reasons US-VISIT was installed," according to the report.

Bermuda-based Accenture Ltd., a management and technology consulting company, is the prime contractor for US-VISIT, and works on the program with Raytheon Co., SRA International Inc. and Titan Corp., part of L3 Communications Holdings Inc.

GAO recommended that DHS improve existing management controls for the system and develop performance measures to assess its impact at border crossings. The government watchdog agency also said DHS should describe how it will move to a biometric entry/exit capability and align US-VISIT with other border security systems being developed.

In a written response, DHS officials said the computer problems are resolved, a preliminary monitoring system was established, and a working group was set up to determine how to provide detailed monitoring of all applications.

Of more than 70 million visitors processed through US-VISIT since its inception nearly three years ago, more than 1,600 criminals or immigration violators have been denied entry, Robert Mocny, the program's acting director, said late last month. US-VISIT is in place at 116 airports, 15 seaports and 154 land ports of entry.

The GAO also found that DHS's plans to upgrade US-VISIT to collecting all 10 fingerprints may aid border security, but could increase processing times and adversely affect operations where space constraints, congestion and delays already exist.

Accenture is working on moving to the 10-fingerprint system that is becoming the worldwide standard, Mocny said. A company representative did not immediately return a call for comment Thursday afternoon.

DHS received $362 million for US-VISIT in the 2007 budget, $60 million of which is to upgrade to the 10-fingerprint system. Since 2004, the program has received more than $1 billion.

Shares of Accenture added 28 cents to $34.99 in afternoon trading, while Raytheon rose 17 cents to $52.42, SRA International dipped 15 centss at $27.30, and L3 Communications rose $1.91, or 2.3 percent, to $83.94, all on the New York Stock Exchange.

Travel Industry Groups Oppose Risk Tests (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP, December 15, 2006

Eight major U.S., Canadian and European travel industry associations urged the government to suspend a computerized system for assessing international travelers as potential terrorists.

"We are deeply concerned that such a far-reaching and invasive screening of millions of business travelers entering and exiting the U.S. could do significant personal harm to them, and reduce the productivity of the organizations that field business travelers," the organizations wrote Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Wednesday.

In a speech Thursday, Chertoff defended the program as a legal effort "to make sure that we don't inconvenience the rights of most travelers so that we can focus more sensibly and in a more risk-managed fashion on those people that do potentially pose a threat."

The travel groups join some members of Congress and privacy advocates in criticizing the system, which The Associated Press disclosed last month has assigned risk assessments to millions of Americans and foreigners entering and leaving this country over the past four years.

In November, the Homeland Security Department slipped its first detailed public description of the program, which has operated since the late 1990s, into the Federal Register, a fine-print compendium of regulations. It said that travelers could not see their assessments to challenge them, the assessments would be kept 40 years and might be shared with state, local and foreign governments and even courts and private corporations under some circumstances.

The letter was circulated by the U.S.-based Business Travel Coalition, which lobbies for the interests of business travelers.

DOJ_NMG_0106604

Other signers included the Institute of Travel Management and the Guild of Travel Management Companies in Great Britain; the International Association of Exhibitions and Events and the Travel Management Alliance in the United States; the Association of Retail Travel Agents and Association of Canadian Travel Agencies in Canada; and the Netherlands Association for Travel Management. Twenty-four other corporate travel buyers and travel management companies here and abroad also signed the letter.

A Gag On Free Speech (NYT)

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

The Bush administration is trampling on the First Amendment and well-established criminal law by trying to use a subpoena to force the American Civil Liberties Union to hand over a classified document in its possession. The dispute is shrouded in secrecy, and very little has been made public about the document, but we do not need to know what's in it to know what's at stake: if the government prevails, it will have engaged in prior restraint — almost always a serious infringement on free speech — and it could start using subpoenas to block reporting on matters of vital public concern.

Justice Department lawyers have issued a grand jury subpoena to the A.C.L.U. demanding that it hand over "any and all copies" of the three-and-a-half-page government document, which was recently leaked to the group. The A.C.L.U. is asking a Federal District Court judge in Manhattan to quash the subpoena.

There are at least two serious problems with the government's action. It goes far beyond what the law recognizes as the legitimate purpose of a subpoena. Subpoenas are supposed to assist an investigation, but the government does not need access to the A.C.L.U.'s document for an investigation since it already has its own copy. It is instead trying to confiscate every available copy of the document to keep its contents secret. The A.C.L.U. says it knows of no other case in which a grand jury subpoena has been used this way.

The subpoena is also a prior restraint because the government is trying to stop the A.C.L.U. in advance from speaking about the document's contents. The Supreme Court has held that prior restraints are almost always unconstitutional. The danger is too great that the government will overreach and use them to ban protected speech or interfere with free expression by forcing the media, and other speakers, to wait for their words to be cleared in advance. The correct way to deal with speech is to evaluate its legality after it has occurred.

The Supreme Court affirmed these vital principles in the Pentagon Papers case, when it rejected the Nixon administration's attempts to stop The Times and The Washington Post from publishing government documents that reflected badly on its prosecution of the Vietnam War. If the Nixon administration had been able to use the technique that the Bush administration is trying now, it could have blocked publication simply by ordering the newspapers to hand over every copy they had of the papers.

If the A.C.L.U.'s description of its secret document is correct, there is no legitimate national defense issue. The document does not contain anything like intelligence sources or troop movements, the group says. It is merely a general statement of policy whose release "might perhaps be mildly embarrassing to the government." Given this administration's abysmal record on these issues, this case could set a disturbing and dangerous precedent. If the subpoena is enforced, the administration will have gained a powerful new tool for rolling back free-speech rights — one that could be used to deprive Americans of information they need to make informed judgments about their elected leaders' policies and actions.

Pentagon Papers Revisited (WP)

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

NO ADMINISTRATION likes leaks. But not since the Nixon administration has the government so aggressively sought to crack down -- not just on leakers, but on reporters and others who obtain leaked material. In the latest manifestation of its disregard for First Amendment principles, the administration has used -- misused, to be more precise -- a grand jury subpoena to retrieve "any and all copies" of a document, marked "secret," obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU's request that a federal judge quash the subpoena should be granted.

The grand jury is an important tool for prosecutors to investigate wrongdoing -- not a vacuum cleaner for material the government wishes hadn't gotten out. The government is seeking to abuse the grand jury process to do an end run around the constitutional prohibition against prior restraint enshrined in the Pentagon Papers case. In that 1971 ruling, the government wanted to stop the New York Times and The Post from publishing classified documents about the Vietnam War; the Supreme Court said no. What if the government, instead of suing to block publication, had simply issued a grand jury subpoena demanding that the newspapers return the Pentagon Papers? If the ACLU, which advocates and litigates on issues of public policy, can be forced to comply with such a subpoena, news organizations would be similarly at risk.

Why would that be so terrible? Because even in a time of war -- in fact, especially in a time of war -- vigorous public debate about controversial policies is essential. An uninformed public can't conduct such a debate, whether the topic is the CIA's secret prisons or the warrantless surveillance of telephone calls. As Justice Potter Stewart wrote in concurring with the Pentagon Papers ruling, "In the absence of the governmental checks and balances present in other areas of our national life, the only effective restraint upon executive policy and power in the areas of national defense and international affairs may lie in an enlightened citizenry -- in an informed and critical public opinion which alone can here protect the values of democratic government."

The government's aggressive -- the ACLU says unprecedented -- use of the subpoena power is especially disturbing because it appears so excessive under the circumstances. According to the ACLU, the 3 1/2 -page document, which came to it unsolicited, outlines "a set of general policy guidelines on a matter of longstanding concern to the ACLU." Its release "might perhaps be mildly embarrassing to the government but the document contains no information concerning matters such as troop movements, communications methods, intelligence sources or the like," the ACLU said. This does not appear to be a document so sensitive that its disclosure would inflict serious damage on national security. In addition, the government, to the extent that it has a legitimate interest in punishing leakers, apparently already knows who leaked it and to whom.

This subpoena, as the ACLU argues, has no "investigatory purpose" but only a "confiscatory, information-suppressive one." That might be in the Bush administration's interest. It's not in the public's.

When Disaster Strikes (WP)

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

IMAGINE THAT a terrorist introduces the plague into downtown Washington, or that a nasty strain of bird flu flies in from Southeast Asia. How well is the region prepared to cope with thousands of casualties and prevent the spread of lethal contagions? Not very, according to a report from the Trust for America's Health, a private watchdog group that rated every state and the District on readiness to respond to a public health crisis.

The report ranked the District and Maryland near the bottom. Maryland, for example, would suffer a chronic shortage of hospital beds in the event of even a moderate pandemic. The District lags in demonstrating that it has the organization to quickly distribute medicine and equipment to communities throughout the city during a health emergency. In all, Maryland satisfied only four of 10 measurements of preparedness, and the District met only five.

Gregg A. Pane, director of the D.C. Health Department, says that the report gives a misleading picture of regional preparation; he notes that the city and its public health professionals have a great deal more experience planning for and responding to crises than other places in the country do. Mr. Pane is right that the measures used do not capture the whole picture. But he admits that there is room for improvement: Better organizing distribution of the pneumonia vaccine and other inoculations, for example, would enhance the city's ability to dispense critical medication during an emergency.

One way to boost the region's disaster preparedness depends on the new Congress, which should fund the ER One project -- a proposal that languished during the recent lame-duck session. The proposed revamp of Washington Hospital Center, which is the busiest acute-care center in the region, would not only vastly increase the region's bed capacity -- coveted real estate during a disaster -- but also provide special emergency training for doctors, nurses and first responders, and increase diagnostic lab space. Its backers plan many other innovations for the facility, which could serve as a model of emergency planning for the rest of the country.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Weighing Deeper Commitment In Iraq, Officials Say (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0106606

By Warren P. Strobel And Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush is weighing whether to make a deeper American commitment in Iraq despite growing public unhappiness with the war, according to senior U.S. officials and former officials familiar with Bush's high-level review.

The proposed changes, with a few exceptions, conflict with the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which warned earlier this month against an open-ended commitment to Iraq and said American combat brigades could be out of Iraq by early 2008.

The president signaled Wednesday that neither the study group's pessimistic assessment nor the bleak situation in Iraq nor the results of the midterm elections have shaken his belief that victory in Iraq is possible.

"We're not going to give up," said Bush, who plans to announce his new strategy early next year.

While some key decisions haven't been made yet, the senior officials said the emerging strategy includes:

-A shift in the primary U.S. military mission in Iraq from combat to training an expanded Iraqi army, generally in line with the Iraq Study Group's recommendations.

-A possible short-term surge of as many as 40,000 more American troops to try to secure Baghdad, along with a permanent increase in the size of the U.S. Army and the Marine Corps, which are badly strained by deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Military commanders look warily at a surge, saying that even 20,000 more soldiers and Marines may not be available and wouldn't necessarily help reduce Iraq's violence.

"We would not surge without a purpose," Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, said Thursday. "And that purpose should be measurable."

-A revised Iraq political strategy aimed at forging a "moderate center" of Shiite Muslim, Sunni Muslim Arab and Kurdish politicians that would bolster embattled Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki. The goal would be to marginalize radical Shiite militias and Sunni insurgents.

-More money to combat rampant unemployment among Iraqi youths and to advance reconstruction, much of it funneled to groups, areas and leaders who support Maliki and oppose the radicals.

-Rejection of the study group's call for an urgent, broad new diplomatic initiative in the Middle East to address the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and reach out to Iran and Syria.

Instead, the administration is considering convening a conference of Iraq and neighboring countries - excluding Iran and Syria - as part of an effort to pressure the two countries to stop interfering in Iraq.

It remains far from clear whether these moves would help stabilize Iraq, where a civil war rages nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion.

Only a year ago, on Nov. 30, 2005, Bush, under pressure to show progress, unveiled a "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq." Then, as now, he pledged to focus on training Iraq's security forces.

Bush also faces huge hurdles in getting public support behind his latest plan. Disapproval of his handling of Iraq has shot up to anywhere from 60 percent to 75 percent this month in polls.

"If he's going to trash the Iraq Study Group report, he's going to have to come up with something coherent, different and that is demonstrably better. I think he's not likely to persuade the country that he's done so," said Larry Diamond of Stanford University's Hoover Institution, who was among the study group's expert advisers.

The study group, chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and retired Congressman Lee Hamilton, released its report Dec. 6.

Bush appears to have been emboldened by criticism of its proposals as defeatist by members of the Republican Party's conservative wing and their allies on the Internet, the radio and cable TV.

Diamond and others close to the group said the report's primary value had been to focus White House and public attention on what the document termed the "grave and deteriorating" situation in Iraq.

The president and his national security team "are going to pick and choose from the Iraq report, and they're not going to choose much," a recently retired U.S. official predicted.

He and others spoke on the condition of anonymity because Bush's policy review is still under way.

DOJ_NMG_0106607

According to a senior State Department official, the president is listening closely to a former Republican secretary of state, but it isn't Baker. Henry Kissinger, a frequent White House visitor, has been to see Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice a half-dozen times, he said.

In recent public comments, Kissinger has warned that an early withdrawal of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq could lead to the country's breakup, although he's also questioned whether victory in Iraq is possible.

In an interview Thursday with CNN, Kissinger said he didn't think Bush could achieve his goal of a democratic Iraq before his term ended in two years. But he said he thought that the president could fashion a strategy that stabilized the country, allowed normal civilian life to return and provided incentives to political leaders to reconcile internally and with other countries in the region.

Kissinger said he'd favor a temporary American troop increase if U.S. military commanders determined that it could make a difference as part of a broader political strategy.

"That, I think, is achievable. For that, I think, increased capability would play a role if only because it would show that the United States is not just running out ... because this conflict will not end in Iraq," Kissinger said. "We are dealing with a movement, and it's running through the Islamic world."

Two senior Iraqi officials confirmed Thursday that Bush is considering a short-term increase in the number of U.S. troops in Baghdad as part of a new strategy to contain the escalating civil war.

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al Hashemi, a leader of the country's Sunnis, said after a speech Thursday at a U.S. government-funded institute in Washington that he and Bush had discussed the option Tuesday in a meeting at the White House.

Hashemi said that while he favored the idea, Bush should set "a timetable" for eventually withdrawing all American forces, linked to "serious efforts to reform the Iraqi military and security forces."

The reforms must include re-enlisting Iraqi soldiers and low-ranking officers who'd been excluded from the new forces under sweeping U.S.-approved purges of members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, he said.

Iraqi Ambassador to the United States Samir Sumaidaie, in a brief interview after Hashemi's speech, said the options that Bush was reviewing included putting more Iraqi forces in the capital.

He and Hashemi confirmed that Bush and his top aides are exploring the formation of a new government coalition to strengthen Maliki.

In a memo leaked last month to The New York Times, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the White House would consider "monetary support" for moderate Iraqi groups that broke with sectarian parties and backed Maliki.

Hashemi said he'd be willing to lead his bloc of Sunni politicians into such a coalition, despite sharp differences with potential Shiite and Kurdish members.

He urged caution in dealing with radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls the largest bloc of Shiite seats in parliament and heads the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that's blamed for much of the anti-Sunni violence in Baghdad.

Hashemi suggested that there might be a way to crack down on the militia while drawing the firebrand cleric's supporters into a new coalition. Excluding Sadr's followers could trigger a backlash that worsens the violence, he said.

McClatchy correspondent John Walcott contributed to this report.

Call To Add U.S. Forces Is Resisted At Home, In Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

The Bush administration is leaning toward temporarily sending as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, even as the Democrats taking charge of Congress demand a drawdown of forces.

U.S. officials say the increase is needed to make a new push to stabilize Baghdad and to bolster efforts to train the Iraqi army. The emerging plan is facing opposition from Iraqi officials adamant that more U.S. forces aren't the answer. U.S. military commanders in Baghdad have drawn up plans for the country that don't require any new personnel. The debate over whether to send additional U.S. forces to Iraq is the most visible manifestation of the high-level tumult roiling the Bush administration as it works to find a way forward there ahead of a presidential address to the nation early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0106608

Although White House officials stress that no final decisions have been made, several aides involved in the internal deliberations say President Bush and senior administration officials appear receptive to calls to temporarily send 15,000 to 30,000 new U.S. forces to Iraq to bolster the 140,000 troops there.

In recent meetings with Mr. Bush, senior Pentagon officials said increasing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq for a few months may improve conditions on the ground there but cautioned that timing would be critical, since limits on available troop equipment mean additional forces couldn't be sustained for a long period of time, according to people familiar with the discussions.

Pentagon officials said they would send additional U.S. forces to Iraq only if the personnel had a clear military mission. "We would not surge without a purpose," the Army's top general, Peter J. Schoomaker, told reporters yesterday. "And that purpose should be measurable."

The troop debate is taking place as U.S. forces in Iraq begin ramping up their efforts to shift the focus of U.S. combat forces to training and advising the struggling Iraqi army. Senior military officials in Baghdad are finishing a plan that would more than double -- and could triple -- the number of U.S. troops who live with and train Iraqi forces. The expansion of the training efforts would be accompanied by a phased redeployment of U.S. forces out of major cities such as Baghdad and onto a small number of large military facilities in more remote parts of the country.

The proposal to send more troops to Iraq is most closely identified publicly with Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, a stalwart war supporter who argues that the U.S. venture will fail unless more troops are sent to the country.

Mr. McCain repeated that message yesterday on a brief trip to Baghdad with other senators, telling reporters there "is still a compelling reason to have an increase in troops here in Baghdad and in Anbar province in order to bring the sectarian violence under control" and to allow Iraq's political process to move ahead.

Deploying more U.S. forces to Iraq would be deeply unpopular in the U.S., where polls show that an increasing majority believes the U.S. is losing in Iraq, disapproves of the administration's handling of the war and wants to see a fixed timetable for a military withdrawal. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll this week found that declining public support for the war had brought Mr. Bush's overall approval ratings down to 34%, the lowest recorded to date in his presidency. The poll showed 35% of those surveyed favor a phased troop withdrawal "beginning immediately," up from 27% in July.

The idea is also running into strong opposition in Baghdad. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has flatly told Gen. George Casey, the top American military commander in Iraq, that he doesn't want more U.S. personnel deployed to the country, according to U.S. military officials. The U.S. sent thousands of additional combat personnel to Baghdad earlier this year in an attempt to quell the daily violence there, but American officials say Mr. Maliki has made clear that he wants to see those forces -- except for U.S. trainers and advisers -- moved out of the city.

Senior U.S. commanders on the ground in Iraq, meanwhile, say they aren't sure additional forces are needed in Iraq.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli's staff is finishing a plan to significantly expand the teams that live with and train Iraqi forces by breaking up some big U.S. combat units into smaller military-advisory teams. The current teams, which number 10 soldiers, could expand to as large as 40 soldiers. As many as one-third of the 4,000-soldier U.S. combat brigades could be broken into teams. But according to the current plan, the overall size of the force wouldn't increase. The plan, which would mark a radical change in the U.S. military approach, hasn't yet been formally approved by Gen. Casey.

Although some senior military commanders in the Pentagon support sending more forces to Iraq, some officers in Iraq question how much impact the additional troops would have. The skeptics argue that the military, strained by the lengthy deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, could sustain the new forces in Iraq only for approximately six months. Critics of the proposal express concerns about where the additional forces would come from. Cobbling together 20,000 to 30,000 additional soldiers may require the Army to extend the deployments of units in Iraq.

Calling up National Guard troops would pose other problems. The White House would have to change Pentagon policies that allow the Army to call up National Guard and Army Reserve troops for a second Iraq tour. Such a move would be politically unpalatable.

Military Considers Sending As Many As 35,000 More U.S. Troops To Iraq, McCain Says (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0106609

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 — Senator John McCain said Thursday that American military commanders were discussing the possibility of adding as many as 10 more combat brigades — a maximum of about 35,000 troops — to "bring the situation under control" while Iraq's divided political leaders seek solutions to the worsening bloodshed here.

After talks in Baghdad with Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and other top American generals, Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, said a substantial United States troop increase was one of the strategy changes the generals were considering as they reviewed what he called "a steadily deteriorating situation."

He said meetings with Iraqi government leaders showed that they, too, "have certainly not ruled out the option of more troops."

"Five to 10 additional brigades is what is being discussed," Mr. McCain said, outlining an increase that could bring overall American troop strength to the highest levels since the invasion in March 2003. While American combat brigades vary, Pentagon officials say they average about 3,500 soldiers. At present, there are 15 combat brigades in Iraq, amounting to about 50,000 of the total American force of about 140,000.

"The American people are disappointed and frustrated with the Iraq war, but they want us to succeed if there is any way to do that," Mr. McCain told a news conference. Unlike some American military commanders who have said any troop increase should be temporary, he said any increase should last "until we can get the situation under control, or until it becomes clear that we can't."

Mr. McCain spoke as the leader of a Congressional delegation that included five senators who have been strong backers of the war, among them Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, who won re-election in Connecticut last month as an independent after losing the Democratic nomination to an antiwar challenger. Mr. Lieberman, too, spoke strongly in favor of a substantial troop increase, saying, "A failed state in Iraq will be a disaster for the region and the world."

Two other Republican senators in the group, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John Thune of South Dakota, said they also backed troop increases, but Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, said she had yet to make up her mind. "I for one am not yet convinced that additional troops will pave the way for a peaceful Iraq," she said. "My fear is that if we have more troops sent to Iraq, we will just see more injuries and more deaths."

The trip amounted to a high-stakes campaign appearance by Mr. McCain, who is all but building his presidential campaign on the issue of Iraq. A leading contender for the Republican nomination in 2008, Mr. McCain strongly supported the original invasion but has shifted to criticizing the war's execution. He now holds the politically risky position that the Bush administration should send in more troops, or withdraw entirely.

But Mr. McCain said personal ambition would not guide his Iraq policy.

"I take the position I'm taking with the full knowledge that only 15 to 18 percent of the American people agree with my position that we need more troops," he said. Still, he said he supported the troop increase to stabilize the situation in Baghdad and other turbulent areas and give Iraqi leaders time to work out compromises to bring the Sunni insurgency and Sunni-Shiite sectarian violence under control.

The visit by Mr. McCain came at a time of disarray in Washington and across the United States over how to proceed in Iraq. Mr. McCain, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, is effectively doubling down his bet on the war, figuring that embracing a strong resolution in Iraq will give him an effective campaign cudgel. If the administration sends more troops, Mr. McCain can hope for a speedy resolution in Iraq that allows him to claim partial victory; if President Bush pulls back and chaos persists, he could contend that his advice was ignored.

Without a troop increase, Mr. McCain said at the news conference, "the results are going to be inevitable, in my view" — a defeat for America and for its Iraqi allies that would create a terrorist haven that could be used as a base for attacks in the United States.

He contrasted the situation with the Vietnam War, saying, "when we came home, the war was over." But now, he said, Iraq's Islamic militants "will follow us home" if the American effort fails.

DOJ_NMG_0106610

But even Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam hero, acknowledged the perils of his approach. He described a troop increase as "the least bad option" and said it could cost him his shot at the presidency. "I happen to feel that I have to do what my many years of life involved in the military dictate to me," he said. As if to emphasize his military credentials, he and other members of the delegation left Baghdad by helicopter after the news conference to fly to an embattled Marine base at Ramadi, 85 miles west of the capital, which is considered one of Iraq's deadliest places.

Although Mr. McCain did not say so, American commanders here are divided on the recommendations they will present to Mr. Bush, who has said he will announce a new strategy for the war in early January, officials familiar with the generals' discussions say.

General Casey, the top commander here, is said to be cautious, arguing that an increase could lower violence in Baghdad, at least temporarily, but that it could also encourage Iraq's feuding political leaders to delay tough decisions needed to stem the slide toward anarchy.

Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-highest-ranking American officer in Iraq, has been the allied forces' operational commander for the past year, and he has resisted a troop increase, the officials say, believing an American-financed job creation program could do as much to weaken the insurgents and political militias.

General Chiarelli's successor, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who took over at a ceremony in Baghdad on Thursday, is bullish, seeing a troop increase as a way for American and Iraqi troops to gain the upper hand in Baghdad and Anbar Province, a desert region virtually overrun by Sunni insurgents, the officials say.

Another cautionary voice has been that of Gen. John P. Abizaid, leader of the Central Command, which oversees the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. General Abizaid has said increasing troop strength, especially in Baghdad, could have an impact on the mounting cycle of revenge in which Sunni suicide bombings of Shiite civilian targets have set off murderous attacks on Sunni civilians by Shiite death squads. But General Abizaid, like General Casey, has said the impact would be temporary if Iraqi politicians failed to end sectarian feuding.

Iraq's growing anarchy was highlighted Thursday by another mass kidnapping in central Baghdad that appeared to have been driven by sectarian motives. Masked gunmen in elite police uniforms abducted dozens of men in the morning from the Sinak neighborhood, an area of automobile spare-parts shops close to the Shiite working-class district of Sadr City, an Interior Ministry official and witnesses said.

The neighborhood is not far from the site of a suicide bombing on Tuesday in which at least 70 Shiite day laborers were killed and more than 230 wounded.

The gunmen drove up in cars with police markings and brandished automatic rifles, witnesses said. "People were in a panic," said a 36-year-old spare-parts merchant. "Some people were trying to close their shops and leave. Others were just trying to slip away. I walked away as fast as I could. A few seconds later, I heard heavy shooting."

Another merchant said he broke free from the gunmen before they could shove him into a car. "They seemed to know who they wanted to kidnap because they'd take one person and leave others behind," he said.

The men were blindfolded and driven off to a building in an unknown location, a Shiite man who was later freed said. He said the captives were shackled and kept in a poorly lighted room. The kidnappers asked the victims whether they were Sunni or Shiite, and whether they had ties to any terrorist groups.

By late Thursday, at least 25 abductees had been freed, all Shiites, the Interior Ministry official said. It was unclear how many others — presumably Sunnis, though that was impossible to determine — were still being held.

In the area of the predominantly Shiite city of Kut in southern Iraq, 17 bodies were found by a stream, police officials said. All the victims had been shot dead after being tortured.

In Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near an Iraqi Army patrol, killing two people, including one soldier and mortar rounds killed a woman, according to Interior Ministry reports.

McCain Calls For More Troops In Iraq (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106611

Sen. John McCain took his controversial proposal for curbing Iraq's sectarian violence to Baghdad on Thursday, calling for an additional 15,000 to 30,000 U.S. troops and joining a congressional delegation in telling Iraq's prime minister he must break his close ties with a radical Shiite cleric.

The lawmakers' trip came as the bloodshed showed no signs of abating. At least 74 more people were killed or found dead, including 65 bullet-riddled bodies bearing signs of torture. And gunmen in military uniforms kidnapped as many as 70 shopkeepers and bystanders from a commercial area in central Baghdad in what was apparently an attack against Sunnis; at least 25 were later released, police said.

McCain's position puts him at odds with American public opinion and with the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended withdrawing substantial number of U.S. troops over the coming year. The Army in recent days has been looking at how many additional troops could be sent to Iraq if President Bush decides a surge in forces would be helpful.

Army officials say only about 10,000 to 15,000 troops could be sent and an end to the war would have to be in sight because the deployment would drain the pool of available soldiers for combat. Further, many experts warn, there is no guarantee a surge in troops would work to settle the violence.

"We would not surge without a purpose," the Army's top general, Peter J. Schoomaker, told reporters Thursday in Washington. "And that purpose should be measurable."

McCain said he realizes that few Americans favor deploying more U.S. troops to Iraq, and that if such a move proved unsuccessful in the unpopular war it could hurt his presidential ambitions.

But the Arizona Republican said Americans must realize that if U.S. troops leave Iraq in chaos, groups such as al-Qaida "will follow us home and that we will have a large conflict and greater challenges than those that we now face here in Iraq."

"The American people are confused, they're frustrated, they're disappointed by the Iraq war, but they also want us to succeed if there's any way to do that," McCain told reporters in Baghdad.

He said conditions in some areas of Iraq have improved since his last visit in March, but "I believe there is still a compelling reason to have an increase in troops here in Baghdad and in Anbar province in order to bring the sectarian violence under control" and to "allow the political process to proceed."

Two other senators in the delegation, Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said they agreed.

"We need more, not less, U.S. troops here," Lieberman said.

Another senator in the group, moderate Republican Susan Collins of Maine, disagreed.

"Iraq is in crisis. The rising sectarian violence threatens the very existence of Iraq as a nation," she said. The current U.S. strategy in Iraq has failed, but "I'm not yet convinced that additional troops will pave the way to a peaceful Iraq in a lasting sense," Collins said.

"My fear is that if we have more troops sent to Iraq that we will just see more injuries and deaths, that we might have a short term impact, but without a long-term political settlement," she said.

Collins' remarks appeared to reflect the findings of the Iraq Study Group, which concluded that sustained increases in U.S. troops would not solve the fundamental problem and that violence would renew once those forces left the area.

While the senators were meeting with U.S. and Iraqi officials in Baghdad, Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, was in Washington, where he called on the Bush administration to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops. Al-Hashemi said the timetable should be "flexible" and depend on development of an Iraqi security force.

"You've done your job," al-Hashemi, who met with Bush this week, said at the United States Institute of Peace, a U.S.-financed think tank. Currently, however, "there is across-the-board chaos in my country," he said.

Graham said he was shocked by the situation in Baghdad.

"The first time I came here with Sen. McCain we went rug shopping. Yesterday, we moved around in a tank. It's one of the most dangerous places on the planet," he said.

The congressional delegation, which also included Republicans Sen. John Thune of South Dakota and Rep. Mark Kirk from Illinois, left Baghdad on Thursday to tour the southern port city of Basra and Ramadi, the insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0106612

Lieberman said the senators met with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, and urged him to break his ties with Muqtada al-Sadr and disarm the anti-U.S. cleric's Mahdi Army militia, which has been blamed along with Sunni Arab insurgents for the sectarian violence and ruthless attacks on U.S. forces.

Al-Sadr controls 30 of the 275 parliament seats and is a key figure in al-Maliki's coalition.

Lieberman said the delegation left its meetings with al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and other Iraqi officials believing "there is a force of moderates within the context of Iraqi politics coming together to strengthen the center here against the extremists."

He said the delegation was "quite explicit" about "how important it is that the Iraqis themselves begin to take aggressive action to disarm the militias, to stop the sectarian violence and to involve all the people in country to governance," including promised provincial elections.

But the senator also said moderates in parliament may look for another leader if al-Maliki fails to do that.

"What the U.S. needs and wants, and has to demand, is that in return for all that we're putting on the line here is that they take on the extremists," Lieberman said. "That's what this battle is all about."

Bush Seeks Ideas On New War Plan Here And In Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush will be spending part of his holidays in "continuous consultations" as he makes final decisions on a new Iraq war plan to be unveiled in the new year.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday that Bush will seek more information from a variety of sources, including members of the Iraqi government, Pentagon and the National Security Council, which is coordinating the administration's review of its war policy.

GOOD ADVICE: President gets advice from several sources

The result could make or break the United States' push for democracy in Iraq, according to those who have participated in the review.

"We've basically got about one more chance to get this right," said Stephen Biddle, a senior fellow with the Council on Foreign Relations who attended a White House meeting with Bush on Monday.

Said Snow: "The endpoint of what's going on right now is not a speech, it's policy. It is a way forward where the president will be instructing those involved to do things differently than they are doing now."

Since meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan two weeks ago, Bush has listened to ideas on Iraq from heads of state and non-government experts, as well as military commanders.

The options include adding U.S. troops as well as minimizing the role of the estimated 140,000 troops already in Iraq. There have also been discussions about forging what Snow called a "moderate consensus" within the country's democratic government.

Some ideas have already been ruled out by Bush, including one to partition Iraq into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish zones. He also has questioned a proposal to negotiate with Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, in part, he says, because they are helping insurgents in Iraq.

The consequences for Bush and the United States go beyond Iraq.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who lost the 2004 presidential election to Bush, believes the war was poorly planned and has damaged U.S. credibility in the Middle East.

Jordan's King Abdullah II has said civil war in Iraq could spread to Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Bush, whose approval ratings have dropped as more U.S. troops have died, has repeatedly said a premature withdrawal could turn Iraq into a haven for terrorists eager to strike America: "The stakes are high in this fight."

Iraqi VP Says Bush Wants Coalition To Counter Al-Sadr (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106613

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is pressing Iraqi politicians to form a new Cabinet to reduce the power of Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American cleric whose militia is responsible for much of the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq.

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a moderate Sunni, said Thursday that President Bush told him the administration wants Iraqi politicians to form a coalition of "moderate parties." al-Hashimi met with Bush on Tuesday.

Iraq's governing coalition includes mostly Shiite political parties and has six Cabinet ministers from al-Sadr's faction. A new coalition would reduce or eliminate al-Sadr loyalists and replace them with other Shiites, Kurds and moderate Sunni Arabs, al-Hashimi said.

Bush is weighing changes to U.S. strategy in Iraq. Military options include boosting the number of American advisers to Iraqi forces and reducing the number of combat brigades.

The administration position is that military operations alone will not solve Iraq's problems. The United States encourages Iraq's government to find a political solution that will bring the country's rival factions together.

Gordon Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said the administration was not telling Iraqis what to do but the "object of the moderate Iraqi leaders coming together is to stop the violence and create an Iraq that can govern, sustain and defend itself."

Asked whether that meant removing al-Sadr's faction from government, Johndroe said the Iraqis Bush had consulted are "serious about taking action against those who would operate outside the rule of law." Bush has also met recently with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. He spoke by phone Wednesday with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, Johndroe said. Both are prominent Kurdish leaders.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army is among the most powerful militias in Iraq and is blamed for some of the attacks on Iraq's Sunni minority, according to the U.S. military.

Al-Hashimi, who has lost a sister and two brothers to assassins, cited horror stories of Sunnis going to hospitals to pick up the bodies of relatives, only to be arrested, tortured and murdered themselves. Bodies of Sunni men are dumped on the streets full of holes from drills, al-Hashimi said. The Health Ministry has denied any connection to killings.

Al-Maliki has been reluctant to break politically with al-Sadr, whose party controls 30 of the 275 seats in parliament. Support from al-Hashimi, whose bloc has 44 seats, could allow al-Maliki to stay in power without relying on al-Sadr.

"In theory, the numbers are there," for al-Maliki to rely on al-Hashimi instead of al-Sadr, said Larry Diamond, an Iraq expert at Stanford University's Hoover Institution who served as an adviser to the U.S.-led occupation authority in Iraq. "It's possible and probably a smart move on the part of the Bush administration" to encourage al-Maliki to break with al-Sadr, Diamond said. Two U.S. senators visiting Iraq, Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., and John McCain, R-Ariz., said Thursday that they urged al-Maliki to distance himself from al-Sadr.

Lieberman said he left a meeting with al-Maliki and Talabani believing "there is a force of moderates within the context of Iraqi politics coming together to strengthen the center here against the extremists." Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, said he doubted al-Maliki would support a crackdown on the Mahdi Army, composed of thousands of working class Shiites. Al-Maliki "may need Sadr down the road," Katzman said.

Iraq's ambassador to Washington, Samir Sumaidaie, said it might be possible to keep al-Sadr in the new coalition if he agreed to let U.S. and Iraqi forces rein in "the more wild parts of the Mahdi Army."

Iraq Coalition Plan Gains Urgency (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and top aides have made the effort to build a new governing coalition in Iraq a top priority in their search for a new strategy, one of the country's two vice presidents said Thursday.

Tariq Hashimi, who leads the Iraqi parliament's most important Sunni Arab group, said that Bush and other senior officials told him at a White House meeting this week that they believe "for the present time, the only solution we have" is to create a new ruling alliance in hopes of strengthening a frail central government.

Hashimi's comments, in an appearance at the U.S. Institute of Peace, offered new insight into the importance Bush is placing on the coalition-building effort at a time when the president and top aides are considering new strategies for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0106614

U.S. and Iraqi advocates of the approach hope it would give Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki a new freedom to take risky actions, such as trying to suppress militia violence. Maliki's freedom to act is believed to be limited by his dependence on radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Al Mahdi army is blamed for sectarian attacks.

Creation of a new governing coalition also could provide a means for picking a new prime minister if Iraqi and American leaders decide Maliki must be replaced. Some Iraqi advocates of the approach insist that is not their intent.

Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, wrote a classified memo last month that said the United States should urge Sunni and Shiite Muslim leaders to support Maliki if he sought to build a new political base. The United States could help the process by offering cash support to moderate groups that take part, Hadley wrote.

The Iraqi parliament is divided along sectarian lines and includes a large Shiite coalition, along with Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular parties. The new grouping would break up the current Shiite alliance and ally two Shiite parties — Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party and the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq — with the two Kurdish parties and possibly smaller religious and secular groupings.

Bush told reporters Wednesday that he had spoken by telephone to two senior Kurdish leaders about the coalition-building idea, "which we support."

Yet the plan faces obstacles.

Maliki has been wary. And it remains unclear whether the approach could win the support of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's top Shiite religious leader, who has urged Shiite leaders to stick together.

Allies of Sadr have condemned the plan, and there is a risk of a violent backlash if the coalition tries to exclude Sadr, who now has considerable influence within the Shiite coalition.

Hadley, in his memo, acknowledged the difficulties of forming a coalition and said the task would require the U.S. to "use our own political capital."

Hashimi acknowledged that forming the new grouping could ignite a violent backlash from Sadr's many supporters, who now control 30 of parliament's 275 seats and five Cabinet ministries and have the country's most active Shiite militia.

In comments after his speech, Hashimi said coalition members might devise a way to allow some elements of Sadr's group in the coalition while excluding violent portions.

Juan R. Cole, a Middle East specialist at the University of Michigan, said he doubted the coalition would have much cohesion because of the continuing splintering of Iraq's political landscape.

"I can't imagine a situation in which you'd get a stable parliamentary coalition that would vote for the prime minister's policies on every issue," he said.

Hashimi, who has been very critical of the Maliki government, promised that he and his group would support the effort but said it would not bring about the wholesale overhaul of the political system that Iraq needs.

He criticized plans under discussion in the U.S. government to shift the U.S. military from combat to an advisory role. That approach, he said, would risk creating a "security vacuum."

In Baker's Blunder, A Chance For Bush (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

As a result of the Iraq Study Group, President Bush has been given one last chance to alter course on Iraq. This did not, however, come about the way James Baker intended. It came about because the long-anticipated report turned out to be, as is widely agreed, a farce. From its wildly hyped, multiple magazine-cover rollout (Annie Leibovitz in Men's Vogue, no less) to its mishmash of 79 (no less) recommendations, the report has fallen so flat that the field is now clear for the president to recommend to a war-weary country something new and bold.

The study group has not just been attacked by left and right, Democrat and Republican. It has invited ridicule. Seventy-nine recommendations. Interdependent, insists Baker. They should be taken as a whole. "I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this but I don't like that.' " On the basis of what grand unifying vision? On the authority of what superior wisdom? A 10-person commission including such Middle East experts as Sandra Day O'Connor, Alan Simpson and Vernon Jordan?

DOJ_NMG_0106615

This kind of bipartisan elder-statesmen commission is perfectly appropriate as a consensus-building exercise for, say, a long-range problem such as Social Security. It is a ludicrous mechanism for devising strategic changes in the middle of a war.

Its major recommendation of gradual retreat is unremarkable -- exactly what you'd expect from a committee whose objective is consensus. It reflects a certain conventional wisdom in Washington that the war is already lost. And if that were true, we should indeed be retreating. And the sooner the better, even more quickly than the ISG recommends.

But having told us that the price of leaving Iraq to chaos is unacceptably high, the commission never attempts to come up with a plan for succeeding. Its only new initiative is to go regional and involve neighboring Syria and Iran.

Syria should stop infiltration, declares the report. And Iran "should stem the flow of equipment, technology, and training to any group resorting to violence in Iraq." Yes, and obesity should be eradicated, bird flu cured and traffic fatalities, particularly the multi-car variety, abolished. Such fatuous King Canute pronouncements give the report its air of detachment from reality.

This holding back of the tides is to be accomplished by negotiations with the likes of Iran. Baker admits that Iranian representatives told the commission that they are unlikely to cooperate. But we must press on, Baker insists, because we will thus expose Iran as "a rejectionist nation" that is "not . . . willing to help try and stabilize Iraq."

Now, there's a diplomatic achievement: undermining our hard-earned agreement with the Europeans to make any future approach to Iran dependent on the suspension of uranium enrichment in order to . . . demonstrate to the world that a country providing sophisticated weapons, roadside bombs and financial support to both sides of the civil war does not support stability there. Is there a sentient adult outside this commission who did not know that?

A major objective of the New Diplomatic Offensive (as if pompous capitalization makes for substance) is to bring Arab-Israeli peace. Baker thinks that if only the Israelis would surrender to Arab demands, all would be well in the Middle East.

Okay. Imagine that there is peace between Israel and the Arabs. No, imagine an even better solution from the Arab point of view -- an earthquake that tomorrow swallows Israel whole and sinks it (like Santorini, 1650 B.C.) into the Mediterranean. Does anyone imagine that the Shiites stop killing Sunnis? That al-Qaeda stops killing Americans? That Iran and Syria work any less assiduously to destabilize post-Saddam Hussein Iraq? It's these obvious absurdities that made the report so dismissible.

Now that these 10 establishment

sages have labored mightily to produce a mouse, the president has one last chance to come forward with a new strategy.

He must do two things. First, as I've been agitating for, establish a new governing coalition in Baghdad that excludes Moqtada al-Sadr, a cancer that undermines the ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government to work with us. It is encouraging that Bush has already begun such a maneuver by meeting with rival Shiite and Sunni parliamentary leaders. If we help produce a cross-sectarian government that would be an ally rather than a paralyzed semi-adversary of coalition forces, we should then undertake part two: "Double down" our military effort. This means a surge in American troops with a specific mission: to secure Baghdad and (with the support of the Baghdad government -- a sine qua non) suppress Sadr's Mahdi Army.

It is our last chance for success. Bush can thank the Iraq Study Group and its instant irrelevance for making it possible.

Panned In Baghdad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Iraq Study Group Chairmen Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton have spent the past week defending their report against withering criticism here in the U.S. But the more revealing reaction has been from Iraq itself: "Unrealistic," "inappropriate" and "very dangerous" are among the kinder words used by Iraq's leaders to describe the ISG's work.

Consider Jalal Talabani. A secular-minded Kurd who has probably done more than any other leader to reach out across the country's sectarian divides, Iraq's President is no doubt sympathetic to the report's calls for "national reconciliation." But he reacted strongly to the ISG's suggestion that American support for his democratically elected government be conditioned on its meeting U.S.-determined "milestones" toward that goal. That, he said, was an "insult to the people of Iraq."

Mr. Talabani was also critical of the ISG's specific ideas for achieving reconciliation. Having helped bring such Sunni leaders as Adnan Dulaimi into the political process, he clearly understands the importance of giving the Sunnis a fair deal. But he bristled at the report's idea that reconciliation should be achieved through concessions to members of Saddam's Baath Party and other Sunni rejectionists. Fellow Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani echoed that criticism, saying the ISG wanted to reward "those who are against the political process and have conducted acts of violence."

DOJ_NMG_0106616

On the issue of improving Iraq's security forces, Mr. Talabani also objected to the idea of embedding more American advisers inside Iraqi units. Like a number of Iraqis to whom we've spoken, Mr. Talabani believes one key to better security is increasing the freedom of Iraqi Army units to carry out independent operations based on their own intelligence and judgment. "Many people ask why there is no security, and that's because our hands are tied. The Prime Minister cannot move 10 soldiers from one place to another" without U.S. authorization, he said.

We think embedding is a useful idea, though that isn't the same as U.S. control of those units. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki agrees with Mr. Talabani on this, and he argued for more control of the Iraqi Army during his recent meeting with President Bush. While the PM's public reaction to the ISG report was much more muted, Mr. Maliki's advisers have made it clear they are as troubled as Mr. Talabani. "We were told there would not be pressure as such," said one. "If they do not support the government it will look as if they do not do what they preach [about democracy]," said another.

Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who met with Mr. Bush last week, also said the ISG report "includes inaccurate information that's based on dishonest sources." Other Shiites objected to the ISG's suggestion that provisions of the Iraqi constitution, which was overwhelmingly ratified in a referendum last year, be reopened for debate. Iraq's Sunni leaders, meanwhile, were somewhat less critical of the ISG report. But they were hardly enthusiastic either.

We offer this roundup not because these Iraqis are infallible on how to move their country forward, and in fact they often disagree. But their reaction exposes the flawed conception of the ISG process, which is that a group of unelected American "wise men" were going to come up with policies that would somehow save Iraq's elected government from itself. "The report has a mentality that we are a colony where they impose their conditions and neglect our independence," the pro-American Talabani said pointedly.

This Iraqi criticism also underscores that the ISG report was less about winning in Baghdad than about splitting political differences in Washington. As Mr. Bush re-examines Iraq policy with an eye toward announcing significant changes early next year, we trust he understands better than the ISG that a partnership with the Iraqi government is essential to any successful outcome.

Truman's Trials Resonate For Bush (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

He led the United States into war and saw his popularity plummet, yet some 60 years later his reputation has never been higher: It's small wonder Harry S. Truman seems to hold a special fascination for President Bush these days.

That interest came into focus recently after Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) went public with an account of a meeting last Friday in which he said the president seemed to be comparing his situation to that of Truman in the late 1940s. According to Durbin's account and another source familiar with the meeting, Bush told the gathering of congressional leaders that Truman's approach to dealing with the Cold War was not initially popular but that he was vindicated by history -- the implication being that Bush would be vindicated about Iraq as well.

White House aides later disputed this reading of Bush's comments, but the episode may offer a glimpse into the psychology of a president who, like Truman in his second term, seems beset by trouble and pressures on all sides and who is ready to look to history for some comfort and guidance.

"Everyone loves a winner, and history reflects Harry Truman was a winner," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), whose father was a longtime friend of the late president and who met Truman as a young man. "It is all familiar front-yard psychology -- associate yourself with a winner."

By many accounts, Bush is fascinated by history and biography -- he reads extensively and meets periodically with presidential scholars -- and Truman has certainly seemed to be on his mind in recent months. In his commencement address this year at West Point, Bush discussed Truman at some length, lauding his early role in structuring U.S. forces and institutions for the Cold War.

DOJ_NMG_0106617

That speech was followed by repeated references to the Democratic 33rd president during the fall campaign, usually as part of cutting attacks on the party of Truman, which Bush said had become the "party of cut and run" in Iraq. In the 2004 presidential campaign, Bush also mentioned Truman repeatedly, often to praise his role in helping reconstruct Japan after World War II.

By coincidence, say White House aides, one of 10 recipients of the Presidential Medal of Freedom today will be David McCullough, whose 1992 biography of Truman did much to restore the luster of his presidency among the public. In a brief telephone interview this week from his home in Maine, McCullough described himself as "more honored" than he has ever been by the award, the highest civilian honor bestowed by the government, and he noted that the medal was created by Truman in 1945.

"I know that President Bush admires Harry Truman -- we have talked about that," McCullough said, though he was cautious about offering any snap assessments of the Bush presidency. "About 50 years has to go by before you can appraise a presidency -- the dust has to settle."

He did say he sees similarities between Truman and Bush, especially in their capacity to endure "merciless criticism and personal abuse" that he doubts "many of us could take."

Perhaps mindful that Bush-Truman comparisons would draw ridicule from Democrats -- the idea is already the subject of derision in the liberal blogosphere -- White House aides were careful to emphasize that the iconic liberal is only one of a number of inspirations for the president. "People do think about the Truman presidency -- but not only the Truman presidency," said one senior White House official, who was not authorized to speak publicly. "It is not as though it's a talisman or lighthouse for any of us."

The official and several other senior administration officials speak mainly about Truman's role in key events of the traumatic early days of the Cold War, including the Berlin Airlift, the passage of the Marshall Plan and defense of South Korea.

Bush has described the struggle against Islamic terrorism in generational terms, and the implication from his aides is that he is setting up structures and strategy to win this long war, even if, as with Truman, some of the particular actions are unpopular.

"By the actions he took, the institutions he built, the alliances he forged and the doctrines he set down, President Truman laid the foundations for America's victory in the Cold War," Bush told the graduating cadets at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in May.

Democrats at last week's meeting seemed surprised by Bush's comments about Truman, but White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush was making a point that as during Truman's presidency, the United States today faces an "ideological enemy with a global ambition . . . that we were going to have to figure out how to face over an extended period of time."

"I think it's important to note that the president was really not trying to compare himself to Harry Truman so much as to talk about the duration and nature of the struggle," Snow said.

Historians are divided about this kind of assessment from the administration. Fred I. Greenstein, a Princeton scholar regarded as a preeminent authority on the presidency, alluded to one major difference between Bush and Truman, often cited by Democrats. "The Marshall Plan was part of a broad-based diplomatic effort, and it was enacted by Truman's bipartisan leadership of a Republican Congress," he said in an e-mail. "Bush's efforts have been heavily unilateral internationally and divisive internally, except those just after 9/11."

James G. Hershberg, a Cold War historian at George Washington University, said he doubts that history will judge Bush as kindly as it has Truman, saying Truman's roles in fostering European recovery and building the NATO alliance were seen as solid accomplishments at the time. "Bush, by contrast, lacks any successes of comparable magnitude to compensate for his mismanagement of the Iraq war and will be hard-pressed to produce any in his last two years," he said.

But Greenstein said he has been struck by parallels between the two presidents, including their feistiness, the fact that neither seemed up to the job in their early months in office, that both had responses to crises that made them seem more presidential and that both saw their approval levels drop after stalemated wars. "As one who remembers the Truman presidency," he said, "I often have a sense of deja vu."

Top Commanders Appear Set To Urge Larger U.S. Military (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0106618

By Thom Shanker And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The review of Iraq policy by senior commanders appears to be headed toward a recommendation to increase the size of the American military, both to sustain a long-term commitment in Iraq and to leave the United States better positioned to deal with potential adversaries, in particular Iran and North Korea, Pentagon and military officials said Thursday.

The latest indication came when the Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, called for expanding the force by adding more active-duty troops and by making more use of the National Guard and Reserve.

His statement, on Thursday, came a day after President Bush met with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the Pentagon's secure conference room to discuss reshaping strategy in Iraq. That session, officials said, included a detailed discussion of whether the armed services are large enough to sustain the mission in Iraq and meet other global security threats.

Officials who took part in the session or who were briefed on it would not give specific figures that were being discussed for growth goals. But their descriptions revealed a broad conclusion that has received increasing support in Washington: that regardless of the exact shape of President Bush's new strategy on Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by their commitments around the globe, in particular in Iraq.

That conclusion is being punctuated by the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who officially leaves his post on Friday and who was long the champion of the idea that high technology and better intelligence could substitute for a bigger military.

Although expanding the Army's size would be too slow a process to provide immediate relief for the force in Iraq, several ideas are being considered to fill the short-term demand for troops there, especially in Baghdad.

One proposal being studied, according to Pentagon officials, is accelerating the arrival in Iraq of a handful of combat brigades already scheduled to deploy there in 2007. Sending troops in early or keeping soldiers in Iraq past their scheduled departure has been a way to temporarily increase American troop presence in Iraq without ordering in forces that had not been on the deployment roster.

A new study by the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research group in Washington, that was released on Thursday also called for a surge of forces to Baghdad over the near term on the grounds that the nascent Iraqi security force is not up to the task.

The report was written by the military historian Frederick W. Kagan and by Jack Keane, the retired general who served as vice chief of staff of the Army. It calls for adding four to five additional combat brigades to Baghdad and deploying them in neighborhoods that have mixed Sunni and Shiite populations and have been the scene of sectarian violence.

The report argues that this can be done without stretching the Army and Marines to the breaking point, but it also advocates increasing both forces by a total of at least 30,000 per year for the next two years.

At the Pentagon, even those not supporting the surge option argue that the Army needs to grow to sustain the force levels required in Afghanistan and Iraq and to meet other national security threats.

Officials who were briefed on the president's discussion with the Joint Chiefs said there was a consensus that the review of administration strategy in Iraq must be broadened to include decisions on how to prepare the American military for the global counterterrorism mission beyond Iraq.

In particular, they said there was a need to show enough force strength to deter potential adversaries from aggressive moves based on an assumption that American power was bogged down in Iraq.

"A lot of it was discussed yesterday with President Bush," said a senior Pentagon official who was briefed on the discussions by one of those in attendance.

The nation faces three choices or "we will break the active component," General Schoomaker said in an appearance before the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves. He said the choices included reducing demand on the military, which seems unlikely; gaining the guaranteed ability to mobilize the National Guard and Reserve; and increasing the size of the active forces.

DOJ_NMG_0106619

On the last point, said that "current demand on the force makes this a wise and prudent action." He gave no figure on his goal for the Army, but noted that even in an optimistic best case, the Army probably could grow by only 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year.

Congress authorized a 30,000-soldier increase in the active-duty Army after the Sept. 11 attacks in what was described as a temporary measure. Army officials say they hope to reach that authorized total troop strength of 512,000 by next year.

Gen. Gordon R. Sullivan, the former Army chief of staff who now heads the Association of the U.S. Army, a private support group, said in an interview that senior Army officers have told him in recent months that the service needs an active duty strength of some 535,000 to 540,000. General Sullivan said that figure assumed assured access to mobilize the National Guard and Reserves.

General Sullivan said his personal view was that the Army needed to have an active duty strength of more than 600,000 if such ability to mobilize the Guard and Reserves could not be guaranteed.

He noted that there has been a debate over the past few years as to whether the Army deployments were a "spike" or a "plateau."

"Surely, we know by now that it is a plateau," he said. "We are sending people back with 12 months dwell time. One reason we are doing it is that we don't have enough to spread this commitment out."

General Says Army Will Need To Grow (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Warning that the active-duty Army "will break" under the strain of today's war-zone rotations, the nation's top Army general yesterday called for expanding the force by 7,000 or more soldiers a year and lifting Pentagon restrictions on involuntary call-ups of Army National Guard and Army Reserve troops.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, issued his most dire assessment yet of the toll of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan on the nation's main ground force. At one point, he banged his hand on a House committee-room table, saying the continuation of today's Pentagon policies is "not right."

In particularly blunt testimony, Schoomaker said the Army began the Iraq war "flat-footed" with a $56 billion equipment shortage and 500,000 fewer soldiers than during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Echoing the warnings from the post-Vietnam War era, when Gen. Edward C. Meyer, then the Army chief of staff, decried the "hollow Army," Schoomaker said it is critical to make changes now to shore up the force for what he called a long and dangerous war.

"The Army is incapable of generating and sustaining the required forces to wage the global war on terror . . . without its components -- active, Guard and reserve -- surging together," Schoomaker said in testimony before the congressionally created Commission on the National Guard and Reserves.

The burden on the Army's 507,000 active-duty soldiers -- who now spend more time at war than at home -- is simply too great, he said. "At this pace, without recurrent access to the reserve components, through remobilization, we will break the active component," he said, drawing murmurs around the hearing room.

The Army, which had 482,000 soldiers in 2001, plans to grow temporarily to 512,000. But the Army now seeks to make that increase permanent and to continue increasing its ranks by 7,000 or more a year, Schoomaker said. He said the total increase is under discussion.

"I recommend we continue to grow the Army so that we have choices," Schoomaker said, cautioning that it is ill advised to assume demand for American troops overseas will decrease. "Our history is replete with examples where we have guessed wrong: 1941, 1950, 2001, to name a few," he said. "We don't know what's ahead."

In light of such a sober assessment, Schoomaker voiced skepticism about the idea of an infusion of U.S. ground troops into Iraq, a message sources said he and the other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff delivered to President Bush at the Pentagon on Wednesday.

"We should not surge without a purpose, and that purpose should be measurable and get us something," he told reporters after the hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0106620

Schoomaker's highly public appeal for more troops and reserve call-ups appeared to be part of an Army campaign to lobby incoming Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who is to be sworn in Monday, to approve the desired policy changes as well as a significant increase in the Army budget.

The Army estimates that every 10,000 additional soldiers will cost about $1.2 billion a year, up from $700 million in 2001 in part because of increased enlistment bonuses and other incentives. The Army will have to "gain additional resources to support that strategy," Schoomaker acknowledged.

Democrats, who will take charge of Congress next month, said yesterday that they plan to hold hearings on the "urgent" and "critical" readiness problems of the Army and Marine Corps. "Readiness levels for every unit must be raised and maintained at the highest possible level," Rep. Solomon P. Ortiz (D-Tex.), incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee's readiness panel, and Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii) said in an opinion article released yesterday. Two-thirds of Army units in the United States are now considered not ready to deploy.

The Army's manpower dilemma stems from current Pentagon policies: Although 55 percent of soldiers belong to the National Guard or the reserve, the Defense Department dictates that reservists can be mobilized involuntarily only once, and for no more than 24 months.

As a result, out of the total of 522,000 Army National Guard and reserve members, only about 90,000 are still available to be mobilized, according to Army data. "We're out of Schlitz," declared an Army chart depicting the shortage as a depleted barrel, saying this leaves "future missions in jeopardy."

Compounding the problem, the Pentagon has restricted repeated involuntary call-ups, leading to deeper and deeper holes in Army Guard and reserve units. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, hundreds of thousands of reserve soldiers have been mobilized for Iraq and Afghanistan. So when a unit is called to deploy, the only soldiers who can go are volunteers and new soldiers. The remainder are often drawn from dozens of units across the United States.

The result is systematically "broken" and "non-cohesive" units, said another Army chart titled "OSD-mandated Volunteer Policy Stresses the Force," referring to the office of the secretary of defense.

For example, Army Reserve units now must take an average of 62 percent of their soldiers for deployments from other units, compared with 6 percent in 2002 and 39 percent in 2003, according to the Army data. In one transportation company, only seven of 170 soldiers were eligible to deploy. The other 163 came from 65 other units in 49 locations, said the commission chairman, retired Marine Corps Maj. Gen. Arnold L. Punaro, who quoted a Marine Reserve officer as calling the policy "evil."

"Military necessity dictates that we deploy organized, trained, equipped cohesive units -- and you don't do that by pick-up teams," said Schoomaker, a decorated veteran of the Army's Delta Force who served in the ill-fated Desert One rescue mission in Iran in 1980.

"We must start this clock again . . . and field fully ready units. . . . We must change this policy," he said, banging his hand on the table for emphasis. He said later that he had detected "some movement" by Pentagon policymakers who have so far rejected a change on the politically sensitive issue.

In an interview yesterday on C-SPAN, Thomas F. Hall, assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs, said that under the current authority Bush can mobilize up to 1 million reservists for no more than two "continuous" years, but the Pentagon policy under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has been more restrictive, limiting the time to two "cumulative" years. "The law does say 'continuous,' so you could have a break and recall them," Hall said.

Lt. Gen. Clyde Vaughn, chief of the 346,000-strong Army National Guard, said yesterday that his force is "poised for remobilization."

Vaughn said he thinks state Guard leaders will accept fresh call-ups sooner than planned as long as the deployments are limited to 12 months and draw on units that have been home the longest. He said the Guard could tolerate having units deploy for one year out of every five, instead of out of every six.

"One year is absolutely critical," he said, explaining that the 18 months it currently takes for a Guard unit to mobilize, train and deploy means too much time away from jobs and families. Schoomaker indicated that the Army is working on reducing the duration of Guard and reserve deployments to one year.

DOJ_NMG_0106621

Since 2001, the Army Guard has deployed 186,000 soldiers and the Army Reserve 164,000 soldiers for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan and in homeland-defense missions.

Army Chief Seeks More Forces, Reserves (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 15, 2006

As President Bush weighs new strategies for Iraq, the Army's top general warned Thursday that his force "will break" without thousands more active duty troops and greater use of the reserves.

Noting the strain put on the force by operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere in the global war on terrorism, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said he wants to grow his half-million-member Army beyond the 30,000 troops already added in recent years.

Though he didn't give an exact number, he said it would take significant time and commitment by the nation, noting some 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers could be added per year.

Officials also need greater authority to tap into the National Guard and Reserve, long ago set up as a strategic reserve but now needed as an integral part of the nation's deployed forces, Schoomaker told a commission studying possible changes in those two forces.

"Over the last five years, the sustained strategic demand ... is placing a strain on the Army's all-volunteer force," Schoomaker told the commission in a Capitol Hill hearing.

"At this pace ... we will break the active component" unless reserves can be called up more to help, Schoomaker said in prepared remarks.

Schoomaker's comments come as Bush continues his assessment of the Iraq war. Bush held three days of urgent meetings with top generals and other advisers. Over that time, Bush gathered advice from former and current commanders, including those in Iraq, as well as chiefs of the military services and other top Pentagon leaders.

White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to characterize Bush's response to Schoomaker's suggestion, but said Bush "takes seriously any of the requests from the service branch chiefs."

Speaking to reporters afterward, Schoomaker said Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, is looking at several military options for the war, including shifting many troops from combat missions to training Iraqi units. However, Schoomaker said, the military is more interested in getting the Iraqi security forces up to speed than anything.

Above all else, the military is looking at "how we generate Iraqi output," he said.

The Army in recent days has been looking at how many additional troops could be sent to Iraq, if the president decides a surge in forces would be helpful. But, officials say, only about 10,000 to 15,000 troops could be sent and an end to the war would have to be in sight because it would drain the pool of available soldiers for combat.

Further, many experts warn, there is no guarantee a surge would work to settle the violence.

"We would not surge without a purpose," Schoomaker told reporters. "And that purpose should be measurable."

He even heard from outside advisers who suggested he remove Marine Gen. Peter Pace as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, according to an official familiar with the meeting who asked not to be named because the discussions were private.

A number of administration officials have suggested privately that — while Bush has considered the possibility of a short-term troop increase — there is no consensus from the military on the wisdom of injecting a large number of additional troops.

Another option under discussion is increasing the number of U.S. troops who are placed inside Iraqi army and police units as advisers, providing a kind of on-the-job training that the senior military spokesman in Baghdad, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, told reporters is already paying notable dividends.

The military has said that any adjustments in troop levels would be fruitless without accompanying improvements on the political and economic fronts, to reconcile the rival sectarian factions and to put young people to work.

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, meanwhile, called on the Bush administration to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. At a news conference in Washington, al-Hashemi, a Sunni leader who met with Bush earlier this week, said the timetable should be "flexible" and depend on development of a capable Iraqi security force.

DOJ_NMG_0106622

"You've done your job," he said at the United States Institute of Peace, a U.S.-financed think tank.

Currently, however, he said, "There is across-the-board chaos in my country," with roaming bands of murderers.

Army Is Stretched Too Thin (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Army's top general said Thursday that the mission in Iraq "will break" the Army without an expansion of the size of the active-duty force or the remobilization of the National Guard and reserves.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said the all-volunteer Army was being tested by a schedule that allowed less than a year at home for active-duty units between deployments to Iraq.

Boosting the size of the active-duty force would be expensive, and remobilizing the guard members and reservists who have already served in Iraq would be controversial and politically unpopular. But the high operational demand placed on the Army is unlikely to end soon, Schoomaker said. And without sending reservists to Iraq for additional tours or expanding the size of the active-duty Army, it would be difficult to meet the overseas demands.

The Army is officially allowed to have 482,000 soldiers, but Congress has temporarily authorized the service to grow by 30,000. So far, the Army has added 25,000 soldiers.

Testifying before the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves, which was created by Congress to examine challenges facing the reserve component, Schoomaker did not say precisely how much he wanted the Army to grow. But he said "current demand" made an increase "wise and prudent." His remarks left open the possibility that the Army would seek an increase beyond its current limit of 512,000.

"If the nation decides to further increase the size of the Army, it will take a significant amount of time and commitment from the nation," he said. "Optimistically, we could add 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year."

Last month, Marine Gen. James T. Conway said that an increase in his force was under consideration and that funding for a temporary boost in the size of the Corps could be included in next year's supplemental budget request.

Some outside experts — notably Frederick W. Kagan of the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank in Washington — have suggested that the Army should grow annually by one division, about 20,000 people, until it reaches 750,000 soldiers.

Kagan said that from 1979 to 1991, America had an all-volunteer active-duty force of 780,000. "I do not believe we cannot find a way to recruit to a higher level," he said. "The president is going to have to call on the young people of this nation to come out and support this effort."

Such growth is possible, other experts say, but during an unpopular war, it would require large bonuses and pay increases that would eat into the military budget.

Kagan has proposed building up the Army in part to allow the military to send additional forces to Iraq.

In a proposal outlined Thursday, Kagan said that by speeding up rotations and extending tours, the Army and Marine Corps could add some 30,000 combat troops in 2007.

Army officials' estimates of how many soldiers they could add are much lower.

Army officials have been talking privately for months about the need to send guard and reserve units for second tours. But Schoomaker's remarks were the most forceful public presentation yet about the need to tap the reserves further.

Typically reservists must be mobilized for at least 18 months in order to serve in Iraq: six months to train and a year to serve in the war zone. Under current practice, the National Guard and reserves can be mobilized for only a single tour in Iraq. But Schoomaker said almost all of the reserve units had been called once since Sept. 11, 2001.

In early 2005, about 40% of the force in Iraq was made up of Guard troops and reserves. But because numerous soldiers and units have been mobilized, the Army has had to fill out units with volunteers from across the country who are willing to serve a second tour.

The Army wants to be able to send units to Iraq that have trained together, even if some of their members have already served an overseas tour.

DOJ_NMG_0106623

"In my view we must deploy our force in cohesive units, not as individual soldiers," Schoomaker said. "This will require us to remobilize units and reserve component soldiers."

Army officials believe under the law they are allowed to remobilize reservists for a second tour.

Top Pentagon officials have not yet allowed such involuntary remobilizations, but the policy is being examined by the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves.

General Says Army 'will Break' Without More Reserves (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army's top general warned Thursday that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan "will break" the active-duty Army unless the National Guard and Reserves are used more often and thousands of active-duty troops are added to the ranks.

With the all-volunteer force now in its fifth year of combat and facing unprecedented strains, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker noted that active-duty combat brigades spend less than one year at home.

"At this pace, without recurrent access to the reserve components through remobilization, we will break the active component," Schoomaker told a panel appointed by Congress to recommend changes for the National Guard and Reserves.

Further, because nearly all part-time Army units have been called up to serve at least once in the war on terrorism and in Iraq, current mobilization policies mean that the Army must rely on individual volunteers to fill out units that are being deployed again.

"This runs counter to the military necessity of deploying trained, ready and cohesive units," Schoomaker said in testimony to the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves. "In my view, we must deploy our force in cohesive units, not as volunteers."

Schoomaker said the situation will require the Army to remobilize units and reserve component soldiers who already have served once in the war on terror and in Iraq. His recommendations were first reported on Tuesday by McClatchy Newspapers.

Commission chairman Arnold L. Punaro said there's broad agreement among military commanders who've testified in previous hearings that the Pentagon's policy for mobilizing reserve forces must change, but the frequency and duration of deployments remain in dispute.

"It's not sustainable," said Punaro, a retired Marine major general who's now an executive at defense contractor SAIC. "Whether it's feasible or not (to change the policy) remains to be seen."

Speaking to reporters after the hearing, Lt. Gen. Clyde Vaughn, the director of the Army National Guard, said he supports changing the policy so that citizen soldiers are called up to serve for no more than 12 months at a time. Under that model, the Army National Guard could provide as many as 60,000 combat troops for deployment "for a long time," Vaughn said.

"One year is absolutely critical," Vaughn said. "Eighteen months is too long."

Under current law, National Guard and Reserve forces can be called to active duty for up to two consecutive years under a partial mobilization, which is what President Bush declared after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But the practice under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has been to mobilize part-time troops for no more than 24 cumulative months. National Guard and Reserve troops called to service in Iraq and Afghanistan usually spend about six months training, then a year on the ground, leaving them only six months of eligibility to serve in other active-duty roles.

North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley, the National Governors Association's point man on National Guard issues, said the preparations take too long.

"Soldiers are spending way too much time at mobilization stations before they get to the fight," he said in a statement.

He also argued that thousands of active-duty soldiers have yet to serve in the war. "We should fully use all active-duty soldiers first before we ask the National Guard to do a second or even third round of deployments," Easley said.

More than 1 million American servicemen and women have served in Iraq and Afghanistan, many of them National Guard and Reserve troops.

Army officials say Schoomaker wants the 24-month restriction lifted so that units can go to war intact. Although that means that some part-time troops would have to serve again involuntarily in the short term, the goal by 2009 is for active-duty units to serve a year-long overseas deployment only once every three years, Army Reserve units to serve overseas only one out of every five years, and National Guard units to serve only one year overseas out of every six.

DOJ_NMG_0106624

Unless current policies on reserve forces are changed, the country must either reduce the number of troops overseas or add troops to the active-duty Army, Schoomaker said.

Schoomaker said that current demands on the Army make it a "wise and prudent action" to add more troops than the 30,000 that Congress has approved in recent years. Schoomaker said the Army could "optimistically" add at least 6,000 to 7,000 more soldiers a year, or more with greater recruiting incentives.

The Army currently has about 500,000 active-duty troops. Reserve components make up 55 percent of the Army's total strength, with 196,000 troops in the Army Reserve and 345,000 in the National Guard.

Air Force Maj. Gen. Roger Lempke, president of the national Adjutants General Association, which represents the senior leadership of the Army and Air National Guard, said the National Guard already has called up about 75 percent of its soldiers.

Those soldiers aren't available now, he said, and he fears that the Army wants more rotations for troops to meet its needs overseas.

"If they get that access and do it the current way, I expect you're going to see more problems with recruitment and retention," said Lempke, the adjutant general for the Nebraska National Guard.

Lempke said Guard soldiers now are mobilized about two years out of every six or seven. He'd be willing to see troops deployed more often if they don't stay away as long.

"We could do one year in five," Lempke said. "We could support that, but we can't do 18 months every three years or less."

The commission is supposed to deliver a report to Congress by January 2008 that recommends changes to the National Guard and Reserve military forces.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondent Barbara Barrett contributed to this report.

Rice Rejects Overture To Iran And Syria (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday rejected a bipartisan panel's recommendation that the United States seek the help of Syria and Iran in Iraq, saying the "compensation" required by any deal might be too high. She argued that neither country should need incentives to foster stability in Iraq.

"If they have an interest in a stable Iraq, they will do it anyway," Rice said in a wide-ranging interview with Washington Post reporters and editors. She said she did not want to trade away Lebanese sovereignty to Syria or allow Iran to obtain a nuclear weapon as a price for peace in Iraq.

Rice also said there would be no retreat from the administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East, a goal that was de-emphasized by the Iraq Study Group in its report last week but that Rice insisted was a "matter of strategic interest." She reiterated her commitment to pursuing peace between Palestinians and Israelis -- a new effort that President Bush announced in September but that has yielded little so far.

"Get ready. We are going to the Middle East a lot," Rice said.

In a separate interview with Post editors and reporters, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte provided an assessment of the situation in Iraq that did not deviate much from the Iraq Study Group's grim appraisal. He said the Iraqi insurgency could now finance itself from inside Iraq "through corruption, oil smuggling and kidnappings."

Rice's remarks indicated that, despite a maelstrom of criticism of Bush's policies by outside experts and Democrats, the administration's extensive review of policy in Iraq and the region will not yield major changes in its approach. Rice said that Bush could be "quite expansive" in terms of a policy review and that the new plan would be a "departure." But the president will not radically change any of his long-term goals or commitment to Iraq, she said.

Indeed, Rice argued that the Middle East is being rearranged in ways that provide the United States with new opportunities, what she repeatedly called a "new strategic context."

DOJ_NMG_0106625

She said the range of struggles in the Middle East, such as the election of Hamas in the Palestinian territories, the conflict between Hezbollah and the Lebanese government, and strife in Iraq, represents a "clarifying moment" between extremists and what she called mainstream Arabs.

"This is a time for pushing and consulting and pressing and seeing what we can do to take advantage of this new strategic context," Rice said.

But she said democracy in the Middle East is "not going to be concluded on our watch" and acknowledged that "we've not always been able to pursue it in ways that have been effective."

"I take that criticism," she added.

Rice's comments on Iran and Syria were among her strongest on one of the key recommendations of the Iraq panel, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton. The report noted that Iran cooperated with the United States on Afghanistan and urged the administration to "explore whether this model could be replicated in the case of Iraq."

Bush called Iran part of an "axis of evil" shortly after the 2001 Bonn conference that led to the formation of the Afghan government, a label that Iranian diplomats have said soured Tehran's interest in cooperation.

In May, Rice offered to join talks on Iran's nuclear program if Tehran suspended its uranium-enrichment program, but Iran has rejected that condition. She said that Syrian officials have been unreceptive to previous entreaties by U.S. diplomats.

Negroponte noted that Iran was in a "defensive posture" three years ago when Iraq was invaded, wondering whether it would soon be a target. But now, flush with oil wealth, he said, it has become a major factor in the Middle East.

Rice said the administration's goal over the next two years is to give Iraqis the space to marginalize extremists and create a moderate middle that can hold the country together. The violence may not have ended before the administration leaves office, she acknowledged, but she said she hopes that Iraqis would "get to a place that is sustainable" by the end of 2008.

Although the administration is reviewing its troubled strategy in Iraq, Rice said the United States ultimately does not hold the key to solving the country's multifaceted military and political crises.

"The solutions to what is happening in Iraq lie in Baghdad, in their ability to deal with their own political differences," she said. The U.S. role is only in a support capacity, she said, reflecting the emerging undercurrent of the ongoing White House policy review to shift the mission from combat to support in both security and political reconciliation.

Rice said Iraqi officials have appealed to the administration to show greater flexibility and to hand over more responsibility to the new government, which was elected last December and took office in May.

Rice voiced support for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki but said the full array of sectarian and ethnic leaders must be prepared to bring their diverse communities along in tackling the most sensitive issues, including political reconciliation and disarming militias.

The administration has been pressing this message in meetings with two of Iraq's most prominent leaders, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of Iraq's largest Shiite party, who was in Washington last week, and this week with Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, the highest-ranking Sunni in Iraq's government.

"You can't ask a prime minister in a democracy to take difficult steps that nobody will back that up," Rice said.

Although Shiite militias and death squads are behind much of the sectarian violence, Rice said she believes that most Iraqi Shiites are "firmly" on the side of democracy. The Shiite-dominated government is committed to Iraq's national identity and does not want Iraq to be dominated by Iran, Rice said.

Could Iran Help The US Stabilize Iraq? (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

TEHRAN, IRAN

The word "compromise" is rarely invoked when the leaders of archenemies Iran or the United States speak about each other.

DOJ_NMG_0106626

But as the crisis in Iraq deepens, President Bush is being asked by a growing chorus, from the Iraq Study Group to Mideast experts, to appeal directly to Iran for help.

So far in public - as well as through diplomatic channels, sources here say - Iran and the US are laying down irreconcilable, maximalist positions that reflect very different worldviews about what such contact should achieve.

But even if Mr. Bush were to set aside his approach to Iran as part of an "axis of evil," the question remains of whether Iran is willing to help the US out in Iraq - and if so, at what price.

"Now is not the best time [for Iran to help], because [American] intent is only to solve the problems of the US in Iraq, and not those of Iran," says Amir Mohebian, an editor of the conservative Resalat newspaper.

"If the US wants to solve its problems in Iraq, it must see that as a package" of issues with Iran, says Mr. Mohebian, who has close links with power centers in the Islamic Republic. "The US should consider Iran's new position in the region; not just as one country, but as a regional power."

Earlier this year, both Washington and Tehran approved Iraq-specific talks between their officials in Baghdad, though none are known to have occurred. More recently, Bush has spoken disparagingly of bringing Iran into the Iraq equation.

"Fundamentally, the Bush administration refuses to have comprehensive talks with the Iranians," says a Western diplomat, noting that US officials continue to say that Iran is a top state sponsor of terrorism and that its nuclear-power program is a cover to build atomic weapons. Iran rejects those charges. "[But] even if you plan to get in some sort of contact, it makes sense to say 'never,' " as an initial bargaining stance, says the diplomat.

The White House has wanted to limit any dialogue with Iran to Iraq, or, in a separate offer last June, to the nuclear file. But as Iraq has deteriorated, and the demand for talks with Iran has intensified, Iran feels increasingly that it can demand much in exchange.

James Baker, co-chair of the Iraq Study Group, which met with Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the UN, has downplayed the likelihood of Iran's assistance.

"We're not naive enough to think that in this case [Iran] may want to help. They probably don't," Mr. Baker testified to Congress last week. "The president authorized me to approach the Iranian government. I did so. And they in effect said ... we would not be inclined to help you this time around."

Iran's price, analysts here say, could be a broader package that would, at the least, include ending action by the UN Security Council to draft a sanctions resolution over Iran's nuclear issue.

Iran may expect the US to accept its determination to continue enriching uranium, something the White House says must be suspended before talks. Recognition of the regime, after 27 years of estrangement, and a guarantee that Iran will not be a military target, are top priorities as well.

"I have no doubt, that if there is a serious attempt by the US administration for a comprehensive resolution of the problems between Iran and the US, Iran would be more than ready to help," says Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University. "But it is not going to be just about Iraq. Iran would be much more willing to do more, if it knew there is going to be a comprehensive [deal] with the US."

This calculus in Tehran represents a dramatic turnaround from the spring of 2003, when Iran's clerical leadership worried that they were "next" after Iraq on the target list for regime change.

Feeling vulnerable, Iran sent an unprecedented secret letter to the White House, offering to talk about everything from its controversial nuclear program to support for Hizbullah and Hamas militants.

But the Bush team dismissed the offer, and even scolded the Swiss ambassador in Tehran at the time for passing the message on. Today, with the US bogged down in Iraq and looking for a facesaving way out, it is the Iranians who want to define the terms of any cooperation.

They often cite Afghanistan in 2001, when Iran helped the US defeat the Taliban and push out Al Qaeda with extensive intelligence and diplomatic aid, only to be labeled part of the "axis of evil" weeks later.

"It's a game. We think the US wants to use Iranian power to solve their problem in Iraq before the presidential election in 2008," says Mr. Mohebian. "After victory ... then it will be back to the old 'axis of evil.' "

DOJ_NMG_0106627

A final Iranian decision will await more signals from the US, because "up to now, we hear only slogans," says Mohebian. "We don't want to look to the mouths of US leaders, but at their hands. After helping in Afghanistan, what was the result? It only helped the radicals in Iran."

Iran and the US share an interest in a stable Iraq that remains intact and is no longer a breeding ground for extremists, Iranian analysts say. But the Afghanistan case has made the regime uncertain.

"Now, if Iran helps the US contain the violence in Iraq, and [afterward the US] has a free hand, then 'OK, we're going to bomb you now. You are the next target,' " says Mr. Hadian-Jazy. "They should know which road they are putting a step in. They want to be sure."

Iran can't bring stability to Iraq, but it can use its influence - especially with fellow Shiites who run the embattled government - to ease the sectarian violence and help forge a unity government.

"The situation wouldn't be worse if Iran said it would help," says a European diplomat. "But the question is: How much better would it be?"

"[Iran] sees all this as pieces of a great big game, [and] the price will continue going up as the situation gets worse," says the diplomat. "The American request would include intelligence help - and this is very uncommon - [because Iranian] eyes and ears on the ground are the best in Iraq."

But such a request is far from certain. In a bid to talk over Iran's leaders, Bush has spoken kindly to the Iranian people, addressing their rich history and yearning for freedom, while accusing the government of supporting terrorism in Lebanon, the Palestinian territories, and Iraq, and secretly aiming for nuclear weapons.

Likewise, Iran's arch-conservative President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad - who has created friction with the West over comments about the destruction of Israel, and calling the Holocaust a "myth"- wrote a letter to the US public last week. Addressing "Noble Americans," Mr. Ahmadinejad said the American people were "God-fearing, truth-loving, and justice-seeking," according to an official translation, then blamed the administration for "blind and blanket support" of Israel, and for the "killing of hundreds of thousands of innocents" in Iraq that has not stopped terrorism.

"The sad experience of invading Iraq is before us all," he said, in an approach that contrasts sharply with that of his predecessor, President Mohamad Khatami, who touted a "dialogue of civilizations."

"As a counterpoint to George Bush and his irrational behavior, the right choice was not Mr. Khatami; the right choice was Mr. Ahmadinejad," says editor Mohebian. "If the US can calculate our behavior ... the US could attack us."

"Mr. Khatami showed all the pockets to [the US]," he adds. "But because the behavior of Ahmadinejad can't be forecast, [the US] can't calculate the reaction. So before any military action, they will think twice."

Rice Lying Low At The Middle East Crossroads (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Edward Luce And William Wallis

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

While US policy in the Middle East has stalled at multiple crossroads in the search for a "new way forward" in Iraq, Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has been notable only for her low visibility.

As one of President George W. Bush's closest confidantes, Ms Rice is likely to play a pivotal role in the outcome, however. Still, many are asking whether she will take the risk and seize the opportunity to direct a comprehensive change of course in the region in the two years they have left.

A new low was plumbed in the US's international standing when, on the 10th day of Lebanon's summer war, with civilian casualties mounting from Israeli attacks, Ms Rice declared the world was witnessing the "birth pangs of a new Middle East".

Since then, the pro-western Lebanese government has been seriously weakened, the conflict in Iraq has intensified, and the Palestinian territories are close to civil war. Meanwhile, Washington's adversaries – Iran, Syria and Sudan – have been emboldened.

Ms Rice appears to be on the brink of ignoring the first of the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group – that she and Mr Bush launch a comprehensive "new diplomatic offensive" by December 31.

DOJ_NMG_0106628

This would involve initiatives to support Iraq through an international support group, active engagement of Iran and Syria, and the launch of a "renewed and sustained commitment to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts". Her personal role in exploiting this remains in doubt.

"How long have American secretaries of state been shuttling back and forth trying to get a Palestinian state? Has it ever worked?" she asked in an interview with Agence France Presse.

She and Mr Bush have repeatedly rejected the notion of unconditional engagement with Iran and Syria. Containment is driving policy towards Iran, but some European diplomats still believe there is a chance the US will restart a dialogue with Syria.

Allies of Ms Rice say there would be no gain for her at this stage in sticking her head above the parapet.

"The smart thing to do would be to be working quietly behind the scenes with the Saudis and the Israelis to try to get the peace process on the road again," says Dov Zakheim, a former Pentagon official.

M.R. Rosenberg, director of policy analysis at the Israel Policy Forum, which advocates a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, said he was struck by the sense of urgency of Prince Turki al-Faisal, the Saudi ambassador, who abruptly terminated his mission to Washington on Monday. That day the ambassador stressed the importance of Israel and "moderate Arab states" working together to resolve their differences, as they faced what he called a common threat from Iran.

But Prince Turki did not seem optimistic that the Bush administration would launch such a serious initiative, Mr Rosenberg said.

Some see signs that Israel would be prepared to talk to Syria over the Golan Heights but that Washington is holding Tel Aviv back. "The Israelis are ready to talk to Syria – but it is being blocked in Washington," said Chas Freeman, a former US ambassador.

When Ms Rice has met her Middle Eastern counterparts in recent months, Arab officials tried to press the urgent need for momentum on the Arab-Israeli conflict to counter more radical agendas sweeping through the region.

"This has been the broad message every time she speaks to Arab foreign ministers. I think she gets it. But I think Washington is lost in its own dynamics and those dynamics still have a lot of ideology," said a senior Arab official.

So far, they say, she has lacked the entrepreneurial touch in the Middle East. "It's not easy trying to move the Palestinian-Israeli situation forward, especially if you have within your ranks people who believe Israel is always right whatever it does and the Palestinians are always evil," said an Arab diplomat. "Our problem with people like Condoleezza Rice is they take too long to understand the reality on the ground, which is a different reality than the one explained to them."

Others are even less generous. "They [Arab regimes] don't believe she can change the dynamics because they see her as part of the problem," says a well-connected Saudi commentator. "She is gung-ho on Iran and she doesn't believe there are two sides to the Palestinian problem." Since the Lebanon war Ms Rice has expressed regret that the US had not done more to stop the suffering of civilians. But she also sticks to blaming Hizbollah for their deaths and for triggering the conflict.

Emile El-Hokayem, analyst at the Stimson Center, a US-based think-tank, says others draw their own conclusions. "The lesson for many Arabs is that the US will always side with Israel no matter what, and that being America's ally does not necessarily bring substantive political benefits when most needed," he comments. "America emerged as unreliable in Lebanon and incompetent in Iraq. The consequences of this for America's image in the region are serious."

"Restarting the peace process might be a way for Secretary Rice to improve her record. But this is a long shot because none of the actors in the region seems ready to go down this road."

Saudi Ex-ambassador Urged No US Talks With Iran (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

The US State Department said Saudi Arabia's former ambassador here recently visited Washington, adding spice to reports he was involved in a power struggle which caused his successor to quit.

Prince Bandar bin Sultan, was the kingdom's top envoy to the United States for 22 years until 2004. The Washington Post reported Thursday he was in the US capital recently to counsel top officials against heeding mounting calls for talks with Iran or Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0106629

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack reluctantly confirmed Prince Bandar met Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, when pressed by reporters, but refused to divulge the substance of their conversation.

"I can't tell you the last time that he and the secretary met," McCormack said. "I'm sure that it's been within the past several weeks, but I can't tell you exactly when."

The Post quoted diplomats as saying many Saudis believed Syria had betrayed the Arab world by leaning closer to Iran in recent months.

Saudi Arabia has shown increasing signs of concern over Tehran's growing influence with Iraqi Shiite leaders, and its nuclear showdown with the West.

Interestingly, the mission of Prince Bandar, current Saudi national security advisor, seems to directly conflict, on Iran, at least, with recent statements on Tehran by his successor as ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal.

Prince Turki set off a diplomatic mystery on Monday by suddenly resigning and leaving the United States for what were a Saudi official said were "personal reasons."

Among several theories about his departure, was a report that he was locked in a political feud with Bandar.

Signs of differences over Iran may hint at some of the reasons behind any clash, as Prince Turki has publicly urged the United States to enter into dialogue with Iran.

"Saudi Arabia talks to Iran frequently and frankly," Prince Turki said during an an appearance at the Center for Strategic and International Studies on October 4.

"I think for the United States not to talk to Iran is a mistake. We've found in our experience that when we did not talk to Iran -- our relations were broken for a period of a few years in the '90s -- we had more troubles with each other.

"But since then, our relationship has improved dramatically and beneficially for both our countries. So we think that negotiation and talking to people is more important than shutting the doors on them."

The United States is at loggerheads with the Islamic Republic over a series of issues, including Tehran's nuclear program, and also claims Tehran is deliberately fanning extremism in Iraq and the wider Middle East.

White House: Syrian Visits Hurt Progress (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 15, 2006

The White House said Thursday that trips to Syria by U.S. lawmakers are a public relations victory for a government that is thwarting democratic reform in the Middle East.

The Bush administration has tried to discourage lawmakers from going to Syria, White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We think it's inappropriate."

Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Fla., emerged from a meeting with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus on Wednesday, saying Assad was willing to help control the Iraq-Syrian border. Nelson said he viewed Assad's remarks as "a crack in the door for discussions to continue. I approach this with realism, not optimism."

Snow said the trip by Nelson, a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, and future visits to Syria expected by Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa., send an unhelpful, mixed message to the Syrians.

"We want to make sure that they understand that just because they have visitors does not mean that the position of the United States government has changed," Snow said.

Taking issue with the White House, Dodd said in a statement that members of Congress "need to go to hotspots not just garden spots. I can't think of a more critical part of the world than the Middle East and I can't think of a more critical player in affecting events in the region for good or for bad than Syria."

Kerry spokesman David Wade said the senators were engaged in fact finding, not negotiating. "If Ronald Reagan could talk to the 'evil empire,' surely United States senators with a responsibility to American troops can visit Syria," Wade said, referring to Reagan's description of the former Soviet Union.

DOJ_NMG_0106630

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended that the administration engage in direct talks with Syria, but President Bush has reacted coolly to that suggestion.

"The point is that even lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region," Snow said about Nelson's trip.

Nelson's spokesman Dan McLaughlin called the remarks a "baseless attack" and said the White House was producing the "same old tired, mean-spirited partisan politics" that were unhelpful to the situation in Iraq. McLaughlin defended Nelson's trip as par for the course for a senator who sits on three oversight committees: Armed Services, Foreign Relations and Intelligence.

"In Syria, he met with a man he's met with twice before — not to negotiate, which is the president's job, but to talk and gather facts and report back to Congress and the State Department," McLaughlin said. "Senators meet with heads of state all the time."

The United States has limited diplomatic ties with Syria because of its support of Hezbollah and Hamas, which the United States considers terrorist organizations. Bush expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrian government curbs that support and reduces its influence in Lebanon.

"The Syrians should have absolutely no doubt that the position of the United States government is the same as it has been," Snow said.

Bush Administration Says Senator's Trip To Damascus Is A Mistake (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The White House on Thursday escalated its criticism of Florida Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson's defiant diplomacy to Syria as a parade of other senators prepared to meet with the president of the country.

At a press briefing, White House spokesman Tony Snow repeated his contention that the Nelson's trip was "not helpful" and "not appropriate." He charged that "lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region."

President Bush has accused Syria of backing the insurgents now fighting in Iraq.

Nelson, on what he described as a fact-finding tour of the Middle East, told reporters on a conference call Wednesday that he met for an hour with Bashar Assad, saying the Syrian president "clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate" with the U.S. or Iraqi army to secure the border between the two countries. Nelson said he viewed the talks as a "crack in the door" for discussions to continue, but cautioned that he viewed the meeting "with realism, not optimism."

A spokesman for Nelson noted Thursday that senators "meet with heads of states all the time" and called Snow's criticism "the same-old, tired, mean-spirited partisan politics.

"Instead of launching partisan attacks, they should be doing what they recently promised to do: conduct business in a bipartisan way," said Nelson spokesman Dan McLaughlin. "That's the only way we're going to find a solution in Iraq.

Though the Iraq Study Group is recommending a stepped-up diplomatic effort involving Syria and Iran to stem the violence in neighboring Iraq, the White House has expressed reluctance, pointing to Syria's backing of terrorist groups and its record of meddling in Lebanon.

Snow insisted the visits were not undermining the president's stance. But he said the meeting at the presidential palace, along with planned visits by Senators John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa., could send confusing messages about the U.S. stance toward the country.

"The United States has a clear position, and you want to make sure that you're sending a clear message, and not mixed messages, to the Syrians about the fact that they have obligations," Snow said, noting that the U.S. insists Syria "stop serving as headquarters" for terrorist groups. "They would love for us to talk with them. But they've got to do something. We want to make sure that they understand that just because they have visitors does not mean that the position of the United States government has changed."

Nelson acknowledged Wednesday that the State Department was not happy with his decision to meet with Assad, but said he had a "constitutional role as a member of Congress" to meet with the president.

DOJ_NMG_0106631

McLaughlin noted that Nelson was not negotiating, "which is the president's job," but gathering facts to report back to Congress. Nelson was recently named to the Senate Intelligence Committee and is already a member of the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees.

White House Criticizes Senator's Syria Trip (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

The White House sharply criticized a US senator's trip to Syria as "not helpful" and "not appropriate" and warned Damascus not to see the visit as an indirect overture from Washington.

"Even lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region," spokesman Tony Snow said after Democratic Senator Ben Nelson met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

"We do have diplomatic relations with the Syrians. And they do know what our position is. And that position is not going to change," he said. "The president is in charge of foreign policy. It may cost some people their credibility."

The Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James Baker recently urged US President George W. Bush to engage Tehran and Damascus in an effort to secure their help in quelling violence tearing Iraq apart.

On Thursday, Democratic Senator John Kerry, Bush's 2004 rival for the White House, lent qualified support to that suggestion, saying during a visit to Cairo: "I think it's important to begin a discussion."

"I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest," Kerry said after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

The White House, however, took a dim view of the suggestion.

"The Syrians have been adventurous and meddlesome in Iraq, and in Lebanon, and working against the causes of democracy in both of those countries," Snow said. "It's absolutely vital that the democracies succeed in both places."

"And therefore, the Syrians should have absolutely no doubt that the position of the United States government is the same as it has been," he said.

"They need to stop harboring terrorists. They need to stop supporting terrorism in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere. They need to stop serving as headquarters for terrorist organizations. And they need to demonstrate goodwill," he said.

Nelson said Thursday he had had a "sharp disagreement" with Assad over UN-endorsed plans for an international tribunal into the February 2005 murder of Lebanese ex-premier Rafiq Hariri.

The senator from Florida, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is the first US lawmaker to visit Damascus since January 2005. Fellow Democrat Chris Dodd is to travel to Damascus later in the week.

In a statement, Dodd said US lawmakers "need to go to hotspots not just garden spots. I cant think of a more critical part of the world than the Middle East, and I cant think of a more critical player in effecting events in the region for good or for bad than Syria."

"That is why I have decided to include a stop in Syria during my seven day fact finding trip to the region," Dodd said.

Snow dismissed such arguments.

"A lot of times a member of Congress may think, 'Well, I'm going to go there, and I'm going to tell them. I'm going to tell them exactly the same thing. I'm going to take a tough line,'" said the spokesman.

"You can take a tough line all you want, but the Syrians have already won a PR (public relations) victory. And so it's important to realize that in this case, it is not that there is a want of communication," he added.

White House Upset By Senator's Trip To Syria (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The White House said Thursday that a Democratic senator's meeting with President Bashar al-Assad of Syria was inappropriate and undermined democracy in the region, while three more senators, including a Republican, made plans to visit Damascus in defiance of President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0106632

The visits are troublesome for the Bush administration because they come in the wake of the report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which has called for the United States to engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria. Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted such talks, and the visits by the senators could add to public pressure on the White House to change that policy.

Senator Bill Nelson, Democrat of Florida, was in Damascus on Wednesday to meet with Mr. Assad; he later told reporters that he saw a "crack in the door" for the United States to cooperate with Syria on Iraq. Senators Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut; John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts; and Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania; all plan to visit Syria in the coming weeks.

All have been discouraged by the Bush administration from going, though both Mr. Nelson and Mr. Kerry, who were traveling separately in the Middle East on Thursday, said in interviews that they had visited Syria before without any complaint from the White House.

"The bottom line is we have a very clear and distinct responsibility to ask questions," said Mr. Kerry, speaking by telephone from Cairo. "A lot of Americans wish a lot more questions, a lot tougher questions, had been asked before we got into the mess we're in over here."

Mr. Dodd said, "Members need to go to hot spots, not just garden spots."

Mr. Specter, a moderate Republican who has often been at odds with the White House on domestic issues, said in a statement on the Senate floor this month that he had long advocated negotiating with Syria. "We need to keep our friends close and our enemies closer," he said.

The back-and-forth over Syria appeared to be emerging as a proxy for the broader battle over American policy in the Middle East, which is unfolding even as Mr. Bush weighs a new strategy for the United States in Iraq.

With the Democrats about to take control of Congress after an election that was widely viewed as a referendum on the war, the visits reflect an increasing willingness to challenge the White House over foreign policy. The sharpness of the White House response, meanwhile, suggests an appetite to use the issue as a basis for a political fight.

"We think it's inappropriate," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said on Thursday, adding, "The concern here, among other things, is that this does not strengthen the hand of democracy in the region."

Mr. Snow said the visits "may cost some people their credibility." He singled out Mr. Nelson in particular, saying the Florida senator "came back empty-handed" after his last meeting with Mr. Assad. At the time, the senator reported that Mr. Assad had told him he was willing to restart negotiations with the Israelis — but that has never happened.

The White House contends that Syria is helping to fuel the insurgency in Iraq, and it is particularly incensed at Syria for supporting Hezbollah, the militant group in Lebanon, and for trying to destabilize the Lebanese government. Mr. Nelson, who was in Lebanon on Thursday to meet with Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and other officials there, said in a telephone interview from Qatar, where he went after his stop in Lebanon, that he had "sharp exchanges" with Mr. Assad over that very issue — and that he reported those exchanges to Mr. Siniora.

"I told Prime Minister Siniora that I told Assad to keep his hands off Lebanon," the senator said. He said he approached his meetings in Syria with "realism, not optimism," and added of Mr. Assad, "I don't trust him at all."

Despite the harsh words from the White House, the Bush administration does have diplomatic ties with Syria, and Mr. Nelson said American Embassy officials have been "just ecstatic" to receive reports from his visits, "because so often they don't have access to a highly controversial leader in the country until somebody like a senator comes along."

Mr. Nelson said he had already briefed R. Nicholas Burns, the State Department's third ranking official, about his meeting with Mr. Assad.

While Mr. Nelson was in Damascus, the White House on Wednesday issued a statement under Mr. Bush's name in which the president called for the immediate release of Syrian political prisoners. "Syrians deserve a government whose legitimacy is grounded in the consent of the people, not brute force," the statement said.

Mr. Snow said Thursday that the statement was not timed to coincide with Mr. Nelson's visit.

Kerry Urges Bush To Engage Iran, Syria On Iraq (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106633

US Senator John Kerry urged his rival in the 2004 elections, President George W. Bush, to kindle a dialogue with Iran and Syria in a bid to stabilize Iraq.

"I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest," Kerry told reporters after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo.

"Syria needs to understand that and Iran needs to understand that, but I think it's important to begin a discussion."

Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, said his talks with Mubarak also covered the Middle East peace process and the situation in Lebanon.

"Syria needs to respect Lebanon's sovereignty," he stressed.

Kerry, whose Democratic Party will dominate the next US Congress, is still in the running to vie for the presidency a second time.

A review of US policy in Iraq co-authored by former secretary of state James Baker and published earlier this month urged the current US administration to engage Iran and Syria to help achieve peace and security in Iraq.

But Bush has vowed not be rushed into changing strategy and has resisted mounting calls to open fully-fledged talks with Syria and Iran.

What Syria Would Say (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria -- What positions would Syria take if it entered a dialogue with the United States about Iraq and other Middle East issues? I put that question Thursday to Walid Moallem, Syria's foreign minister, and he offered surprisingly strong support for the recommendations made last week in the Baker-Hamilton report.

"We are not against the U.S.," Moallem said. "To the contrary, we want to be part of a regional dialogue that, in our opinion, serves American interests in the region." He described America and the region as being at a "crossroads" and said: "Either we go for stability, or the region will fall, and religious civil wars and the extremists behind them will take over."

Moallem's comments are the most detailed Syrian response to the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton. As we made a line-by-line review of the group's recommendations involving Syria, Moallem expressed support for nearly every item. When I asked if Syrian President Bashar al-Assad endorsed these positions, he answered: "He is the leader. I am expressing his ideas."

Moallem portrayed Syria as a potential partner in stabilizing the region. He referred at one point to "the noble cause of peace between Syria and Israel." Later, he said that while Syria favors a timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, a rapid American withdrawal before Iraqis are ready to take over security would be "an immoral step."

The Bush administration has shown little interest in dialogue with Damascus, and the administration has been sharply critical of Syria's campaign against Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a key U.S. ally. Administration officials have said in the past that although Syria speaks of a desire for cooperation and dialogue, its actions -- in Lebanon and elsewhere -- have not matched its words.

A former Syrian ambassador to Washington, Moallem worked with Baker on diplomatic issues involving the 1991 Madrid peace conference, which opened the way for peace talks between Syria and Israel that were ultimately unsuccessful. The Syrian said that when they met again in September to discuss the Iraq Study Group, Baker asked him: " 'Walid, how can we return to the Syrian-American situation of the early 1990s, when we succeeded to build mutual trust?' I told him, 'This is our wish also in Syria.' "

Moallem argued that the Bush administration's efforts to isolate Syria have failed and that it's time for the administration to try another approach based on shared Syrian-American interests in three goals for the Mideast: peace, stability and prosperity. He said that although Syria hoped to recover the Golan Heights, it was not setting this as a condition for dialogue.

"A constructive dialogue has to start without preconditions," he said. He denied that Syria was seeking greater power in Lebanon as the price for its help in Iraq. "This is not a deal. This is not, 'We will do this if you give us Lebanon,' " he said. But he did note that if America wanted dialogue, "you need to reassure us about your good intentions concerning our stability."

DOJ_NMG_0106634

Syria has already begun implementing some of the Baker-Hamilton recommendations for Iraq, Moallem said. With this month's restoration of Syrian-Iraqi diplomatic ties, he explained, the two countries are beginning joint efforts to control their border and increase political and economic cooperation, as called for by the Iraq Study Group. "We are not doing this to please the U.S. We are doing what is in the Syrian and Iraqi interest," he said.

Moallem said he supported the report's recommendation for an Iraq Support Group that would draw in Syria and other neighboring states, but only after the Iraqis themselves had agreed on plans for disarming militias and ending sectarian divisions. He said that the timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops "depends on Iraqi ability to take over security" and that America's military role there should focus on training rather than fighting.

On the specific Baker-Hamilton recommendations involving Lebanon, Moallem also expressed general support. He said Syria wasn't shipping arms to Hezbollah, that it would "continue our cooperation" with the U.N. investigation of the murder of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri and that it was "ready" to "achieve a deal on exchanging prisoners" with Israel. He also disclosed what he said was a previously unreported effort by Syria and Qatar to broker a compromise between the radical Palestinian group Hamas and the moderate Fatah faction of President Mahmoud Abbas.

Is this Syrian gambit for real? Is Moallem serious in his offer to talk with America about a comprehensive package of peace with Israel, stability for Iraq and compromise in Lebanon? The answer is that there's really only one way to find out, which is to explore further the ideas the Syrian foreign minister has put on the table.

Atranscriptof the writer's interview with Walid Moallem is available athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. David Ignatius co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

New General Takes The Reins As No. 2 U.S. Commander In Iraq (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

CAMP VICTORY, IRAQ — Army Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno assumed command of U.S. troops at a ceremony in the capital on Thursday, vowing to pursue more than just combat to resolve the conflict in Iraq.

"This is not just a military solution only," he said to the crowd assembled outside one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces near the U.S. military headquarters. "It is a combination of diplomatic, economic and military programs."

But those who know Odierno say the hard-charging general who plotted Hussein's capture as well as anti-insurgency operations may put more effort toward securing, rather than rebuilding, Iraq when he becomes the No. 2 U.S. commander here.

Odierno gained a reputation as an aggressive commander while leading the 4th Infantry Division in Sunni Arab-dominated parts of the country in 2003 and '04. Some military analysts have argued that the region's continued unrest can be traced to his heavy-handed methods.

Odierno's predecessor, Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, was seen as a champion of more comprehensive strategies aimed at winning over local populations, including large-scale public works programs and restrained firepower in the face of sectarian warfare.

Despite sporadic violent uprisings against his forces, Chiarelli, a former West Point professor, was able to stabilize the volatile Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Sadr City in Baghdad by putting locals to work on a large sewage system and assigning some of his top soldiers to work with nascent Iraqi security forces.

Chiarelli also is popular in Washington, where he is in contention to replace his commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who may leave before summer.

At Thursday's ceremony, Casey praised Chiarelli's approach to securing Iraq.

"I will always remember your personal passion for building a better life for the Iraqi people," Casey told the crowd, which included U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and several regional U.S. military commanders.

Chiarelli spoke of working side by side with Iraqis in the last year to rebuild the country, in a speech sprinkled with quotes from President Theodore Roosevelt and economist John Stuart Mill.

DOJ_NMG_0106635

Odierno sat nearby, surveying the crowd of about 300 soldiers, sailors and Marines. He cut an imposing figure, still looking like the tight end he was at West Point: head shaved, jaw squared, brown eyes piercing. Raised by a World War II Army sergeant, Odierno saw his son enter the military and lose an arm after being wounded by insurgents in Baghdad.

When Odierno spoke, he paraphrased Gen. Douglas MacArthur, the hawkish World War II commander who advocated the use of nuclear weapons against the Chinese during the Korean War: "No man is entitled to the blessings of freedom unless he is vigilant in their protections."

People close to Odierno say his characterization as an overly aggressive commander with a style antithetical to Chiarelli's is unwarranted. They say he has become more attuned to the importance of "soft" power during his last two years as an assistant to Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Chiarelli said Thursday that he believed Odierno shared his belief that it would take more than military force to bring peace to Iraq. Odierno suggested political solutions to the latest sectarian conflicts, such as setting a date for provincial elections and integrating sectarian militias into the army.

But he was at his most passionate when talking about counterinsurgency.

"We are going to go after any — any — individual who attacks the government, who attacks the security forces and who attacks coalition forces, no matter who they are and no matter who they are associated with," he said.

Odierno said his first task would be developing Iraqi security forces. His second: supporting Iraqi security forces "to defeat those extremists who do not want to conform to Iraq."

Odierno added that his style hadn't changed much since his days in the northern Iraqi city of Tikrit. "I'm aggressive in whatever I do," he said. "I'm an aggressive personality." Odierno's spokesman said the general planned to meet with commanders this week to discuss his strategy.

Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a spokeswoman at Baghdad coalition headquarters who worked with Odierno in Tikrit, said he was aggressive, "but never overly aggressive." Members of the 4th Infantry Division have a reputation for fighting hard, she said, but they had to, at least at first.

"It was always going to be about more than combat power. We knew that," she said.

Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow in foreign policy studies at the Washington-based Brookings Institution who visited Odierno in Tikrit in 2003, said he saw the general use only "proper counterinsurgency methods," such as spending military money to create jobs for locals. That was also the approach taken in the northern city of Mosul by Gen. David H. Petraeus, commander of the Army's 101st Airborne Division and another possible contender for Casey's job.

"I think Odierno's legacy is clearly complex," O'Hanlon said. "He does not enjoy the reputation for excellence in counterinsurgency that Gen. Petraeus and Gen. Chiarelli and certain other officers enjoy. But the jury is still out in my mind on whether he will do this new job well. Quite possibly he can."

'We're Seeing Positive Results' (USAT)

By William B. Caldwell IV

USA Today, December 15, 2006

The Iraqi people and the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) share a vision for Iraq: a secure, stable and self-governing nation in which Iraqis find solutions to Iraqi problems. To do this, the government of Iraq must achieve national reconciliation, rebuild Iraq's infrastructure to provide basic services and — in partnership with coalition forces — defeat the terrorists and extremists seeking to sow the seeds of discord and division among the Iraqi people.

The best way to achieve this last goal is to transition more authority and responsibility for Iraq's security to Iraqis. Iraqi forces have the best understanding of their culture, language and geography — all skills vital to defeating an insurgency. Once sufficiently trained, equipped and mentored, the Iraqi Security Force will be the most effective weapon against the foreign and extremist elements trying to tear apart Iraq.

For more than 30 years, the Iraqi army was a tool of oppression. Three years ago, there were virtually no security forces in Iraq. Today, Iraqis are protected by a trained and equipped military and police force, one that will soon number more than 350,000.

DOJ_NMG_0106636

Quality is improving with quantity. Eighty percent of the Iraqi army is already operating with limited coalition support. Recent independent Iraqi operations in Baghdad, Baqubah and elsewhere have captured senior leaders of al-Qaeda in Iraq, freed dozens of kidnapping victims and uncovered massive weapons caches that would have been turned into car bombs capable of killing hundreds of innocent Iraqis.

Challenges remain. Iraqi forces have deficiencies in logistics, leadership and, in some cases, loyalty. The best way for the Iraqi Security Force to enhance its capabilities and values is through partnership with coalition transition teams. So MNF-I has strengthened how we train and mentor Iraqi forces.

Transition teams combine the best kind of leadership: leadership by example, with the best kind of education: learning through experience. We are seeing positive results with the way these dedicated troops develop capable Iraqi forces that are loyal to the democratically elected, representative unity government and to all of Iraq's people. That is why we are creating more military, police and border transition teams, increasing their size and accelerating their use.

Exporting military professionalism and developing Iraqi forces are vital to our national interest. We win when they win.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV is spokesman for the Multi-National Force in Iraq.

White House Defends Enemy Body Count (AP)

AP, December 15, 2006

The White House expressed concern Thursday about what it believes is an impression that American forces in Iraq "aren't doing anything, they're just targets."

In fact, said presidential spokesman Tony Snow, U.S. troops are "fighting the bad guys" and killing and capturing them.

Snow raised the point when asked to explain why President Bush, a day earlier, had said that 5,900 enemy forces had been killed or captured in Iraq during October, November and the first week of December.

Typically, Bush and White House officials do not talk about enemy body counts, although the Pentagon keeps a running total on the number of American losses. More than 2,930 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003.

"There is quite often the impression ... that our people aren't doing anything, they're just targets," Snow said at his daily press briefing. "And I think there's a certain amount of unease in the American public because they hear about deaths but they don't hear about what's going on."

Snow said the government has been loath to do body counts since the practice was discredited during the Vietnam War. "But it probably is worth at least giving a general impression of relative battlefield success of what's going on."

Troops In Iraq To Get Fire-resistant Uniforms (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Flame-resistant uniforms will be standard issue for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan by early 2007, Pentagon officials say.

More than 160,000 suits made of the flame-retardant fabric NOMEX will be sent to combat zones, said Thomas Edwards, assistant deputy chief of staff for Army logistics.

The Pentagon moved quickly, Edwards said, because Iraqi insurgents are using homemade bombs and targeting the fuel tanks of vehicles. The bombs, called improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, are the top killer of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"Guys in the area of operations said, 'Give us all the fireproof uniforms you can find and then kick up production,' " Edwards said.

After receiving the Army's request Sept. 21, the Pentagon shipped 70,000 suits by Oct. 13 to outfit troops who patrol outside U.S. bases, Edwards said. It will cost about $70 million for the uniforms, hoods and gloves.

NOMEX, a DuPont-manufactured fiber, resists burning for about 9 seconds, long enough to allow troops to escape from a burning vehicle, Edwards said.

Troops are urged to drink extra liquids to keep from overheating because of the suits' added layer of protection, said Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0106637

Margo Hughey, a 68-year-old grandmother from Columbus, Ind., said she has raised $2,000 to buy the suits for troops after learning of attacks with diesel-soaked explosives from relatives serving in Iraq. She and friend April Johnson, 41, also contacted Indiana's two senators — Republican Richard Lugar and Democrat Evan Bayh — because they did not believe the Pentagon had acted quickly enough.

"When I learned our own family members were in extreme danger, and it did not look like they would be supplied by the DOD (Department of Defense) or the Army I knew I must do something," Hughey said.

Lugar contacted the Pentagon but had not received a response, spokesman Andy Fisher said.

Edwards said the Pentagon moved quickly: "I don't know how long it took Granny to raise that two thousand bucks, but it couldn't have been a helluva lot faster than we did in getting these uniforms."

Sectarian And Ethnic Lines In Sand Stall Provision Of Iraqi Oil Law (NYT)

By Edward Wong

New York Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 — Iraqi politicians and ministers are divided along ethnic and sectarian lines over a critical provision in a proposed national oil law, according to the country's oil minister. If the differences can be bridged, the draft could be unveiled soon, the minister, Hussain al-Shahristani, said this week.

The oil law, along with security, is considered a prerequisite for attracting the foreign investment that Iraq's oil sector desperately needs. The law would set guidelines for development contracts for as many as 60 oil fields in the country, Mr. Shahristani said in an interview.

The law is also a crucial step in the process of national reconciliation, American and Iraqi officials said, because it sets out rules for the equitable distribution of the country's oil wealth. That, in turn, could ease tensions over granting greater autonomy to Iraq's regions.

Sunni Arabs, who dominate the oil-poor areas of western Iraq, have opposed regional autonomy because they believe they would not get a fair share of the country's oil wealth, which is concentrated in the Shiite south and the Kurdish north. Although agreement has been reached on the sharing of oil revenues, representatives of the main Sunni Arab, Shiite and Kurdish political blocs remain at odds over the issue of control over contracts to develop oil fields, Mr. Shahristani said. The representatives sit on a committee that is reviewing a draft of the law written by the Oil Ministry.

The sticking point is regional versus central government control over the contracts. The Sunni Arabs want the central government's Oil Ministry to negotiate and approve development contracts, while the Kurds want the regional governments to have those powers, said Mr. Shahristani, a conservative Shiite. The Shiites fall in between; they say the law should permit each region to negotiate its own contracts, but they want the contracts to be subject to the approval of a proposed Federal Oil and Gas Council, Mr. Shahristani said.

American officials here have been increasing pressure on the Iraqis to present a draft of the law, and perhaps even approve it, by the end of the year. In its report, the Iraq Study Group said that an equitable distribution of oil wealth was necessary for national reconciliation, and recommended that the central government keep control of revenues and oil fields, to the chagrin of the Kurds, who insist on maximum autonomy.

Once the oil law is in place, the federal council will announce a round of bids for the development of fields that have been identified but are not producing, Mr. Shahristani said. Iraq has 80 known fields, 20 of which are producing oil and will be developed by the Iraq National Oil Company, he said. Development of the others would be offered up for bids.

Oil contracts signed with foreign companies by Saddam Hussein's government would be reviewed by the federal council to see whether they should be honored or scrapped, Mr. Shahristani said. The various parties have agreed that oil revenues will be allotted to the regions through the central government's budget process, he said. That means the central government would be able to use money to finance its needs before giving the rest to the regions. Earlier in the negotiations over the oil law, the Kurds had insisted that the revenues be automatically divided and distributed to the regions first.

Gunmen Kidnap Shopkeepers, Bystanders In Baghdad (MCT)

By Mohamed Al Dulaimy And Hannah Allam

DOJ_NMG_0106638

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Kadhim Mahdi ran a lucrative carpentry business in west Baghdad, but he closed his shop when clashes and car bombs shut down his neighborhood.

Next, he became a grocer - until three other grocers in the area were assassinated. Then he fled without even daring to retrieve his expensive shopping carts and his electrical generator.

Mahdi moved across the Tigris River to east Baghdad six months ago, thinking that his new job selling spare parts for water pumps was so safe that he could even take his 4-year-old son to work with him.

On Thursday morning, however, Mahdi was feeding his son cake at his shop when gunmen dressed in Iraqi police and army uniforms descended on the Sinak district and kidnapped dozens of shopkeepers and bystanders in the latest of a string of mass abductions in Baghdad.

"They were shooting in the air and chasing after the crowds running away," Mahdi said. "My son asked me, 'Dad, are we going to die?'"

The brazen attack took place barely a mile from the heavily guarded government compound known as the Green Zone, where Iraqi officials were preparing for a weekend conference on national reconciliation.

The Sinak attack was the most notable incident on a day packed with other violence that reflects the lawlessness that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's beleaguered government appears unable to curb. Police reported the discoveries of 45 bodies in the capital Thursday, 42 in the mainly Sunni Muslim western side and three in the predominantly Shiite Muslim eastern side.

A leading Shiite politician, Adil Abdul Mahdi, escaped an apparent assassination attempt Thursday when gunmen fired on his motorcade in a majority-Sunni neighborhood, police said. Abdul Mahdi, of the Iranian-backed Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, is considered a moderate Islamist and a favorite of Washington officials, who've tried unsuccessfully to maneuver him into the prime minister's seat.

At the scene of the mass kidnapping in Sinak, a small industrial area where Iraqis shop for refrigerator motors and power tools, Kadhim Mahdi and three other witnesses said that police at a checkpoint watched as the abductors rounded up 30 to 70 men and stuffed them into 10 or more paddy wagons and other vehicles that Iraqi security forces typically used.

The attack was especially confounding, the witnesses said, because the kidnappers didn't appear to follow a sectarian agenda, seizing Sunnis, Shiites and Christians alike.

"First, they came to a Sunni-owned shop ... they took him and I thought it was because he was a Sunni, but then they turned to the others," said Qahtan, 23, who escaped by hiding in the mud underneath a truck and was too scared to divulge his full name. "The second one was Christian, and he was telling him, 'I'm a Christian! I'm a Christian!' One of them answered, 'Christian, Shiite, Sunni, you're going to come with us.'"

Qahtan, who sells tools in Sinak, said he saw the gunmen load 30 men into the enclosed police-style vans and other vehicles bearing the camouflage markings of the Iraqi army, then return for others. He said the captives shouted for police to help them but that no one responded.

Another witness, Haider Jassim, 22, said a sniper had shot at passers-by earlier this week from a position near a bridge that leads to the area, so at first he was relieved that the security forces finally had responded. He said he quickly grew dismayed when the forces targeted merchants and began shooting randomly into crowds of people attempting to flee.

"There were two police vehicles, but they did nothing to help people," Jassim said. "On the contrary, they were positioned in a way that blocked the path after the (attackers) fled. ... We don't know who they were, but for sure they'll ask for ransom for some of (those seized), kill some and so on. Like the usual daily incidents."

Iraqi Interior Ministry officials said that as many as 29 of the abductees - all Shiites - were released unharmed Thursday evening. Police gave no information as to how many were kidnapped or who was behind the attack.

"On Saturday, when people come back to their shops, we'll count who is missing and find out the real number taken," Qahtan said. "They'll kill the Sunnis and throw them in a Shiite neighborhood and they'll kill the Shiites and throw them in a Sunni neighborhood after checking their IDs."

DOJ_NMG_0106639

Kadhim Mahdi, a Shiite, said he escaped by grabbing his son and running across the street to an apartment building, where residents offered them shelter. He said he cradled his trembling son in his arms and decided that it was time to look for yet another line of work.

Al Dulaimy is a McClatchy Newspapers special correspondent. Special correspondents Zained Obeid and Laith Hammoudi contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Panic, Then Quiet, As Kidnappers Strike (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- "They're here! They're here!"

The panicked cry rose from the crowd of shoppers and businessmen, sending them into a stampede past storefronts and shocked onlookers. Men, women and children fell over handcarts and folding chairs, knocking each other down, hiding behind buildings and seeking shelter in shops.

None knew who "they" were: uniformed men firing weapons in the air and herding people into trucks, just a few hundred yards from the edge of the U.S.-guarded "Green Zone."

But most had suspected such a day might come to the Sinak market of downtown Baghdad. All knew to run at first sight of the uniformed gunmen who have become signature elements of the all-too-common mass kidnappings in the capital.

"We weren't really surprised," said Hossein Abu Marwa, an employee of an air conditioner shop in the sprawling market. "We face such threats on a daily basis. Sometimes we hear they're coming from this side or that side. We don't know who is shooting. We don't know who is coming. Are they the resistance? Are they armed criminals? You don't know if they're Sunni. You don't know if they're Shiite."

This time, at least 60 people disappeared within minutes, stuffed into four delivery trucks and hauled away toward eastern Baghdad.

An Interior Ministry official reported later that at least 23 of the shopkeepers had been released unharmed in northern Baghdad, after showing their captors identity cards bearing names associated with Shiite Muslims.

The fate of previous victims of mass kidnappings has been brutal: most show up dead within days, often with signs of torture, such as drill holes.

Thursday's abduction took place in and around the auto-supply section of the open-air Sinak wholesale market, a few hundred yards from the headquarters of Iraq's Ministry of Defense.

It began around 10 a.m. when a convoy of between 10 and 13 sport-utility vehicles of the type often used by official security forces screeched into the market and sealed off the main roads, said witnesses.

Heavy gunfire ensued almost immediately.

"I saw the four-wheel drive cars arrive, about 10 of them, as well as trucks for transporting prisoners," he said. "I immediately realized something grave was going on." The shopkeepers said they clutched their guns as the drama began, fearful of criminals. When they realized the invaders came heavily armed and in official guise, they put their weapons away. "They were men in uniform," said Ahmad Jassem Saadi, the 39-year-old owner of a leather jacket shop. "What could I do?"

Saadi, along with a group of other shopkeepers, stood at the doors of their shops and watched. "They detained a group of people, and then they started taking other sellers and even passers-by," he said. "The people struggled. They were taken by force and put into trucks."

Some described the trucks as the type used to transport milk and meat products. Others said they were like armored vehicles used to take money.

They began to fill up.

The gunfire continued. The panic mounted.

Hassan Khafaji, shopping for a part to repair his broken-down 1990 Oldsmobile sedan, lay on the ground as the shooting continued. He crawled to an alley, stood up and fled.

"I just kept running and running until I got somewhere safe," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106640

Yassin Hashim, who works at a refrigerator motor shop within the market's labyrinth of alleyways, helped an elderly man to his feet after the jittery mob knocked him to the ground. "He was too weak to get away," said Hashim.

"Some people were running and screaming," Saadi recalled. "Others were frozen in their place, watching."

"They were just looking for a place to hide," said Hashim. "Some people thought there were snipers."

The ordeal was over within 15 minutes, witnesses said. A detachment of Iraqi soldiers arrived and sealed off the area. Some witnesses described the kidnappers as police commandos, but a spokesman for the Ministry of Interior said the suspects wore army uniforms.

Afterward Saadi gathered around a group of shopkeepers consoling a local Christian restaurant owner, a middle-age man with salt-and-pepper hair, who was weeping. His son had been taken. "It was painful and I felt very sad," he said.

By then, around 11:30, the streets already had emptied. There were no customers and no shopkeepers. "I couldn't work," Saadi said. "We closed up the shop and went home."

Special correspondents in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Gunmen Kidnap Baghdad Shopkeepers, Bystanders (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 -- Hardly a soul stirred on Thursday afternoon inside the warren of narrow dark alleys and side streets in Sanak, one of the Iraqi capital's busiest commercial districts. Shop after shop remained closed, their steel doors sealed with thick padlocks. Empty stalls, flanked by apartments filled with cowering residents, served as a silent coda to what had unfolded two hours earlier.

Gunmen in camouflage uniforms drove up in 11 cars at about 10 a.m. and surrounded the area, just around the corner from an Iraqi police checkpoint, witnesses said. Some wore black ski masks, others black bandannas. They casually went from business to business, spending 30 minutes rounding up at least 25 shopkeepers, witnesses said. The men hustled their captives past the stalls and stunned customers, grabbing a few bystanders along the way.

"They took Sunnis, Shiites and Christians," said Ziad Ali, one of the shopkeepers. "They did not differentiate. They even grabbed six boys."

The mass abductions, brazen even by Baghdad standards, were the latest sign of worsening insecurity in the capital. Two days ago, 70 day laborers were killed in a car bomb attack in another busy district. A month ago, gunmen who claimed to be from the Shiite-run Interior Ministry seized as many as 150 people from an agency of the Ministry of Higher Education, which is controlled by a Sunni Arab party.

Thursday's well-orchestrated kidnappings did not appear to be sectarian in nature or a reprisal attack, shopkeepers and officials said.

"This is very serious. This happened in the heart of Baghdad," said Mohammed al-Askari, a Defense Ministry spokesman. "This is to create a state of chaos, so they can say the government has failed, the political process has failed. This is aimed at stopping life in the city."

The assault occurred on a day when a U.S. congressional delegation, led by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), visited Baghdad. McCain repeated his call to deploy more U.S. troops to Iraq, saying 15,000 to 30,000 more were needed to stem the sectarian violence and bring stability.

"The American people are confused, they're frustrated, they're disappointed by the Iraq war, but they also want us to succeed if there's any way to do that," McCain told reporters inside the U.S. Embassy.

Meanwhile, Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno began his duties as the number two U.S. general in Iraq, replacing Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli. Odierno told reporters that sectarian strife and car bombs were the main challenges to security in the capital. He reiterated views stated earlier by Chiarelli that a multi-pronged effort that includes economic, political and military measures was needed to contain the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0106641

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) described the changes he saw in Baghdad in stark terms. "The first time I came here with Senator McCain, we went rug shopping," he said. "Yesterday, we moved around in a tank. It's one of the most dangerous places on the planet."

By Thursday evening, it was unclear how many people had been abducted in Sanak, with estimates ranging from 25 to as many as 70. Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said that several victims were later released and that the investigation was continuing.

Khalaf said the kidnappers in Sanak, a bustling market for automotive spare parts, wore army uniforms. There is growing evidence that Shiite militias fomenting sectarian violence have infiltrated the police and to a lesser extent the army.

But Askari, the Defense Ministry spokesman, said investigators from the army also conducted interviews in Sanak and arrived at a different conclusion.

"Some of the police battalions wear the same camouflage uniforms as the army," Askari said. "And some of the people we interviewed said the vehicles they used were not the type used by the army."

He said Thursday's incident demonstrated how easy it still is to buy official police uniforms. "In the center of Baghdad, you can find people selling them. This is the responsibility of the Ministry of Interior, not the Ministry of Defense."

In addition to the uniforms, witnesses said, the gunmen wore official bulletproof vests and carried shields. They appeared to be targeting certain shops. Robbery did not appear to be a motive, witnesses said.

"It was not a matter of money," said Baha Hamdani, a store owner who was one of the few people orbiting the empty stalls and shuttered shops. "I had plenty of money, but they didn't come after me."

When asked why the gunmen targeted Sanak's merchants, he replied: "They took them in order to kill them. This is the only reason."

Ali, the shopkeeper, said the gunmen stopped rounding people up when they heard sharp claps from one of their leaders. Then they took the men and pushed them into their vehicles before driving off. The attack emptied the market. "Everyone ran upstairs," he said.

Hamdani said he and some other shopkeepers ran to the police checkpoint and asked for help. "They told us it was not their duty," he said.

Askari said the area fell under the responsibility of the police. Khalaf said there was no police checkpoint in the area, and that by the time officers responded to the incident, the kidnappers had fled.

Hamdani, who wore gray pants with oil stains, held up a small piece of metal from his shop. "Life has become as cheap as these spare parts," he said.

Bitter Detour For Expatriate Back In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 — Of all the Iraqi expatriates who returned to rule, rebuild and profit from their country after the invasion, none have fallen as far as Aiham Alsammarae, who was once the minister of electricity but now spends his days consumed with bitterness in a Baghdad jail as his lawyers fight multiple charges of corruption against him.

Mr. Alsammarae, an American citizen who lived in the Chicago area and built a thriving engineering firm there, is the only cabinet-level Iraqi official to be convicted and jailed for misusing money during his time in office. Four months ago, hearing that he was being accused of corruption, he walked into a Baghdad courthouse to find out if there were charges against him and was astonished to find himself placed under arrest pending trial. He has been in jail ever since.

During an interview in that jail on Thursday, Mr. Alsammarae still had the swept-back, perfectly arranged hair and obsessively polished shoes of his days in power, but he wore a shapeless zippered jacket over a beige shirt and pants rather than one of his elegant suits. Possibly in deference to his former rank, his "cell" was a converted office with a computer, a refrigerator, a potted plant, a thin mattress and other amenities — far better than what is provided to other prisoners in the jail.

But Mr. Alsammarae is bitter because, he said, the United States has left him in his hour of need to the vagaries of an Iraqi court system that in many ways is still the opaque and frightening apparatus it was before the invasion. "When somebody is giving his life to service as an American here, he should be dealt with in a different way," he said, complaining of what he called a lack of action by the American Embassy. "If they did anything for me, I am not aware of it."

DOJ_NMG_0106642

As if to help make his point, the Iraqi justice system still had Mr. Alsammarae in jail on Thursday, several days after an appeals court overturned his conviction, on Oct. 11, on the first of the counts against him, involving payments for a single electricity generator in the southern Iraq.

An employee at the Central Criminal Court of Iraq confirmed that the 23-member appeals court had unanimously overturned the conviction but said that under Iraqi law, Mr. Alsammarae might have to remain in jail until the other charges against him were resolved.

Mr. Alsammarae's case is caught in an extraordinarily complex web of events that include American-sponsored efforts to fight official corruption and to improve the Iraqi court system while at the same time allowing the courts to operate independently of American influence. Mr. Alsammarae also faces the burden of having long been suspected of corruption by Iraqi and American officials, and he has been the target of lashing criticism for years in the Iraqi news media.

An American official in Baghdad familiar with the case said the embassy was in fact monitoring Mr. Alsammarae's situation closely.

"They have done everything they can to ensure his safety and fair treatment, but at the same time cannot interfere in a legitimate Iraqi court process," the official said.

Iraqi officials were generally less restrained. Saadi Mehdi Ali, who currently serves as inspector general in the Electricity Ministry, said he had reviewed the papers on Mr. Alsammarae's cases.

"Believe me, all the cases in which Aiham is accused, they are correct," he said. "He is accused with facts."

The cases involving Mr. Alsammarae began with investigations by the Commission on Public Integrity, an Iraqi organization independent of the government that was created by the United States. The commission has been praised by some officials as a much-needed breath of reform in a country long riddled by corruption, and derided by others as overzealous and politically motivated.

"It's politics," said Mr. Alsammarae, a secular Sunni Arab who was what he described as a midlevel member of Saddam Hussein's governing Baath Party as a student in the 1970s. The commission and the court system have both been accused of falling under the influence of Shiite politicians and Shiite-run militias.

Mr. Alsammarae arrived in Iraq just after the American invasion in 2003, looking for business opportunities. He was originally appointed electricity minister by L. Paul Bremer III, the leader of the American occupation authority, in August 2003. He stayed on until May 2005 in the Iraqi government that followed, run by Prime Minister Ayad Allawi.

Mr. Allawi, who has previously suggested publicly that the Commission on Public Integrity may have a political agenda, said through a colleague on Thursday that he stood by those remarks.

Ali Shbot, a spokesman for the commission, which is run by Rathi al-Rathi, said that those charges were ludicrous and that the commission was investigating politicians of all stripes. He said that of roughly 90 cabinet-level officials in previous Iraqi governments since the invasion, 18 have received either arrest warrants or subpoenas.

All but a few of those officials remain at large, having fled the country or gone into hiding. Mr. Shbot said there were also active corruption cases against about 80 former officials — deputy ministers, directors general or senior ministry advisers — at least some of whom are still in Iraq. In the same jail in Baghdad's protected Green Zone, a former deputy finance minister, Kareem Hmeed Faraj, is serving a three-year sentence.

But despite the general view that Iraqi governments have been corrupt, it is the sheer number of those cases that disturbs some officials who say they believe that politics is indeed coming into play.

"I applaud the notion of public integrity," said a senior Iraqi official who has followed the case and who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of prejudicing the cases. "But the problem with these guys, they are highly politicized. My view is that Judge Rathi is way out of his place."

But in a sign of the difficulties the former electricity minister faces, the official added, "I suspect that Aiham Alsammarae is a crook."

DOJ_NMG_0106643

From Head Scarf To Army Cap, Making A New Life (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

LACKLAND AIR FORCE BASE, Tex. — Stomping her boots and swinging her bony arms, Fadwa Hamdan led a column of troops through this bleak Texas base.

Only six months earlier, she wore the head scarf of a pious Muslim woman and dropped her eyes in the presence of men. Now she was marching them to dinner.

"I'm gonna be a shooting man, a shooting man!" she cried, her Jordanian accent lost in the chanting voices. "The best I can for Uncle Sam, for Uncle Sam!"

The United States military has long prided itself on molding raw recruits into hardened soldiers. Perhaps none have undergone a transformation quite like that of Ms. Hamdan.

Forbidden by her husband to work, she raised five children behind the drawn curtains of their home in Saudi Arabia. She was not allowed to drive. On the rare occasions when she set foot outside, she wore a full-face veil.

Then her world unraveled. Separated from her husband, who had taken a second wife, and torn from her children, she moved to Queens to start over. Struggling to survive on her own, she answered a recruiting advertisement for the Army and enlisted in May.

Ms. Hamdan's passage through the military is a remarkable act of reinvention. It required courage and sacrifice. She had to remove her hijab, a sacred symbol of the faith she holds deeply. She had to embrace, at the age of 39, an arduous and unfamiliar life.

In return, she sought what the military has always promised new soldiers: a stable home, an adoptive family, a remade identity. She left one male-dominated culture for another, she said, in the hope of finding new strength along the way.

"Always, I dream I have power on the inside, and one day it's going to come out," said Ms. Hamdan, a small woman with delicate hands and sad, almond eyes.

She belongs to the rare class of Muslim women who have signed up to become soldiers trained in Arabic translation. Such female linguists play a crucial role for the American armed forces in Iraq, where civilian women often feel uncomfortable interacting with male troops.

Finding Arabic-speaking women willing to serve in the military has proved daunting. Of the 317 soldiers who have completed training in the Army linguist program since 2003, just 23 are women, 13 of them Muslim.

Ms. Hamdan wrestled with the decision for two years. Only in the Army, she decided, would she be able to save money to hire a lawyer and finally divorce her husband. She yearned to regain custody of her children and support them on her own. She thought of going to graduate school one day.

But when Ms. Hamdan finally enlisted, she was filled with as much fear as determination. There was no guarantee, with her broken English and frail physique, that she could meet the military's standards or survive its rigors.

"This is different world for me," she said at the time.

'This Is the Army'

It was around midnight on May 31 when a yellow school bus brought Ms. Hamdan and 16 other new soldiers to Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio, a spread of parched grass and drab, low-lying buildings.

Ms. Hamdan had not scored high enough on the required English examination to go directly to basic training, so she was sent here for intensive language instruction.

At Lackland, soldiers enlisted in the Army linguist program known as 09-Lima have 24 weeks to improve their English and pass the exam. In that time, they follow a strict military regimen. They rise at 5 a.m. for physical training. They march to class. They drop to the ground for punitive push-ups.

When the bus arrived at the barracks that evening, Ms. Hamdan said, she hopped out first, her camouflage cap pulled low on her head.

DOJ_NMG_0106644

Standing by the metal stairs was Sgt. First Class Willie Brannon, an imposing 48-year-old man with a stern jaw and a leveling stare. He ordered the soldiers to change into shorts. Ms. Hamdan explained softly that she was Muslim and could not do this.

"This is the Army," he replied. "Everybody's the same."

Ms. Hamdan burst into tears.

The issue had arisen at the base before, and some of the Muslim women had been permitted to wear sweat pants instead of shorts. Officially, it would be Ms. Hamdan's choice.

But from the sidelines came two opposing directives, one in English and the other in Arabic. The drill sergeants wanted Ms. Hamdan to get used to wearing shorts, while several of the male Muslim soldiers tried to shame her into refusing.

"You're not supposed to show your legs," they told her.

For three weeks, she wore the blue nylon shorts, hitching up her white socks. Then she switched to sweat pants, even as the summer heat surpassed 100 degrees.

It helped, Ms. Hamdan thought, that there were so many similarities between Islam and the Army.

The command "Attention!" reminded her of the first step in the daily Muslim prayer, when one must stand completely still.

Soldiers, like Muslims, were instructed to eat with one hand. The women ate by themselves, and always walked with an escort, as Muslim women traditionally traveled.

The Army taught soldiers to live with order. They folded their fatigues as women folded their hijabs, and woke before sunrise as Ms. Hamdan had done all her life. They always marched behind a flag, as Muslims did in the days of the Prophet.

Nothing felt more familiar than the military's emphasis on respect. Soldiers learned to tuck their hands behind their backs when speaking to superiors.

When Ms. Hamdan tried this with Sergeant Brannon, she thought of her father. Her eyes automatically dropped to the floor, with customary Muslim modesty.

"Look me in the eye," the sergeant said. It was a command he had learned to deliver with care.

Sergeant Brannon, an African-American Baptist from North Carolina, had never met a Muslim before coming to Lackland. He soon concluded that the Muslim women in his charge had survived greater struggles outside the military than anything they would face inside it.

"They've been through a lot," he said.

Life Before the Service

Fadwa Hamdan was always a touch rebellious.

One of seven children, she was raised by her Palestinian parents in Amman, Jordan. Her father worked as a government irrigation official while her mother stayed at home with the children. They expected the same of their daughters.

But as a teenager, Ms. Hamdan rejected her many suitors. She wanted to see the world. At 19, she said, she secretly volunteered as a nurse with the Jordanian police, infuriating her parents. That same year, a visiting Palestinian doctor who lived in New York spotted her in the street.

He tracked down her home address, and spoke to her father. The next day, Ms. Hamdan learned she was engaged.

"Your dream has come true," Ms. Hamdan recalls her mother saying. "You're leaving Jordan."

Ms. Hamdan joined her husband in Staten Island in 1987. She felt nothing for him. He was 10 years her senior, and she found him stiff and dictatorial. He only let her leave the house with him, she said. If she upset him, he refused to speak to her for months.

She had children to fill the void. She became more religious, and began wearing the face veil known as a niqab. Eventually, the family moved to Saudi Arabia.

Weeks after Ms. Hamdan delivered her fifth child in 2000, she learned from her mother-in-law that her husband was taking a second wife in the West Bank city of Ramallah. Ms. Hamdan was shocked.

"I couldn't talk," she said.

The next summer, on a family vacation in Amman, her husband disappeared one evening with three of their children, she said. Days later she located two of her boys in Saudi Arabia, and learned that the new wife would be joining them.

DOJ_NMG_0106645

Ms. Hamdan's 8-year-old girl had been left with her grandparents in Ramallah. She tried to get the girl back, but her husband had kept the child's passport, she said.

When reached by telephone in Saudi Arabia, a man answering to her husband's name said, "This is her choice and I don't have anything to do with it," apparently referring to her decision to join the Army. Then he hung up.

It never occurred to Ms. Hamdan to seek a divorce. She feared that it would bring shame to her family. From Jordan, she fought for legal custody of the children. In 2002, a judge ruled that she could keep the three youngest children, but allotted her a meager alimony, not enough to cover their schooling. Reluctantly, she returned them to their father.

Alone in Amman, she felt like an outcast.

"The neighbors, they look at me," she said.

In September 2002, she moved to Queens to live with her brother and his wife. She returned to wearing a regular head scarf, or hijab, and started classes at a local community college. One night she came home late, she said, and her brother told her to leave. "She did not follow the rules of the house," the brother, Sam Saeed, said in an interview.

Ms. Hamdan did not know where to turn. Her father had refused to speak to her since she left Jordan. Over the next 10 days, she rode the subway at night and slept on a park bench in Queens. Finally, she walked into a hair salon in Brooklyn and approached a Lebanese Muslim woman.

"She was hysterical crying," said the woman, Helena Buiduon.

Ms. Hamdan stayed with Ms. Buiduon until she found her own apartment. She taught the Koran to children and worked in a doctor's office while earning an associate's degree in medical assistance.

Her life remained a struggle. She lived in a small, drafty apartment in the Bronx. Other Muslim immigrants found her puzzling.

Some people suggested that she was a "loose woman," she recalled, a notion that amused her given how little she wanted another relationship.

"I can't feel anything for anybody," she said. "I lived like jail. Just imagine you have a bird and the door is open. You think he will go back to this jail again? Never. He's just flying."

In 2003, she spotted an ad for the Army in an Arabic-language magazine. She met with a recruiter but cut the conversation short after learning she would have to remove her head scarf before enlisting.

Secretly, though, she kept imagining a new, military life. In March, she made up her mind.

"I broke the law with God," she said of her decision to remove her hijab. "I had to."

She put her belongings in storage. She began lifting 20-pound weights. She slipped off her veil in public a few times. She felt naked.

Two days before she left, she stopped by her brother's video shop in Queens to say goodbye.

Mr. Saeed was kneeling in prayer, as a Spanish rap video blasted from a television set. He stiffened at the sight of Ms. Hamdan, then kissed her on the cheek. They had not seen each other all year. Within minutes, an argument began.

"She'll never make it," Mr. Saeed said, looking away from his sister.

"Oh yeah?" she replied, her eyes widening.

"A Muslim woman is not allowed to travel alone," he said.

"What about working?" she said, her voice quivering. "Look at your wife, she works!"

"She likes to spend time here," he said.

Ms. Hamdan ran from the store crying.

"She won't make it," Mr. Saeed told a reporter after she left. "Woman always weak. She need a man to protect her."

Later, when Ms. Hamdan heard what her brother had said, she was silent.

"Why didn't he protect me?" she said.

What Happens Next

Life at Lackland — where soldiers cannot chew gum, wear makeup or leave the base — reminded Ms. Hamdan of her marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0106646

“Sometimes, when I’m by myself, I wonder how I have stayed here for six months,” she said as she sat outside her barracks one recent evening. “But I did it.”

She was among 39 men and women in the Army linguist program, in a company of 119 soldiers. The rest were immigrants from around the globe, there to improve their English in the hopes of entering boot camp.

Everyone, it seemed, had a sad story.

The women talked quietly after the lights went out. A Sudanese woman had come to the United States after most of her family died in a bombing in Khartoum. A 23-year-old woman had lost her Iranian mother in an honor killing.

A teenage Iraqi girl cried herself to sleep every night. She, like many other soldiers, began referring to Ms. Hamdan as “Mom.”

“They come into my arms,” said Ms. Hamdan, who was older than most of the others.

She missed being a mother, yet she rarely talked about her own children. She was learning not to cry, and that was a subject that broke her down. Privately, she called them in Saudi Arabia twice a week with 20-minute phone cards, four minutes per child.

As the summer wore on, it became clear that Ms. Hamdan was floundering in her English studies. She failed the exam repeatedly.

Physically, though, she was growing stronger. Push-ups and sit-ups no longer scared her. She found she was a fast runner.

On Aug. 10, she won the one-mile race for female soldiers in seven minutes flat, in sweat pants. The next week, she became a squad leader and bay commander, directing a column of soldiers during marches and keeping order in the female barracks.

Days later, she decided to wear the shorts again.

“What, we have a new soldier here?” Sergeant Brannon called out as she walked deliberately down the stairs.

“I am going to show the men I’m like them,” she told him later. “I’m a man now.”

“No, you’re not a man” he said.

“Yes, I’m a man.”

“No,” he said. “You’re a strong-willed woman.”

That became his nickname for her: strong-willed woman.

As Ms. Hamdan’s status rose with the drill sergeants, so did her standing among the soldiers.

“Sometimes I’m tough on them,” she said one recent weekday as she patrolled her floor. The women smiled from their bunk beds. “I like everything clean.”

Another morning, she sat in the mess hall, eating her daily breakfast of Froot Loops followed by nacho-cheese Doritos. A drill sergeant called out that the group had three minutes to finish, just as a clean-shaven soldier walked past Ms. Hamdan with a tray full of food. She shot him a hard look.

“Three minutes,” she repeated. “You hear that?”

The greatest shift for Ms. Hamdan came in her relationship with the male soldiers. They stopped taunting her about wearing shorts. When she gave orders, they listened.

“It seems like a heavy burden has been lifted from her,” Sergeant Brannon said.

Yet even as she felt herself changing, she remained steady in her faith. She never stopped praying five times a day. She attended the base’s mosque each Friday and fasted through the holy month of Ramadan.

On a recent Friday, she sat with her eyes closed on the mosque’s embroidered carpet, wearing a white veil and skirt over her Army fatigues.

“Staying on the straight path is not an easy matter, except for those who Allah helps to do so,” the Egyptian imam said in Arabic over a loudspeaker.

In November, Ms. Hamdan’s English score was still too low, by 11 points, even though she was performing better on the weekly quizzes. She was given a one-month extension, and one more chance.

She took her last exam in December, and failed again. She ran from her classroom.

“Don’t come looking for me,” she recalled telling a startled drill sergeant.

DOJ_NMG_0106647

By herself, Ms. Hamdan began walking across the base. Tears streamed down her face as she reached the two-story, concrete building that had long been her refuge.

She climbed the stairs of the mosque. Alone, she knelt on the carpet and prayed. Finally, she sat in silence. She felt at peace.

Ms. Hamdan will be discharged on Dec. 15. She is unsure of what the future holds. She may stay in Texas and look for a job. She may no longer wear a hijab in public. All she knows is that she is different now, and no less a Muslim for it.

"I can face men," she said. "I can fight. I can talk. I don't keep it inside."

She thought for a moment.

"I changed myself," she said. "I'm a new Fadwa. Strong female. I like this."

4 Are Killed And 22 Hurt In Bomb Attack In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 14 — A suicide bomber detonated his explosives in the center of a busy shopping street in the town of Qalat in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing four civilians and wounding 22 people, the provincial police chief said.

"The attack occurred around noon today, when a highway police car was driving by in the bazaar," said the police chief, Gen. Noor Mohammad Paktin. He said that four children and two policemen were among the wounded.

Also on Thursday, President Hamid Karzai wound up a visit to southern Afghanistan with a speech at a boys' high school in Kandahar in which he blamed neighboring Pakistan for supporting Taliban insurgents and suicide bombers.

"Pakistan hopes to make slaves out of us, but we will not surrender," Mr. Karzai said.

Pakistan denies supporting the Taliban, but officials have admitted that some insurgents are infiltrating Afghanistan from Pakistan and that suicide bombers are being trained in Pakistan's tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

A large number of tribesmen demonstrated Thursday in the eastern town of Khost against NATO's bombing on Tuesday of a compound in which five people were killed, including a 13-year-old girl, and four more people were wounded.

"The demonstration was peaceful today, but the demonstrators promised to continue their protest unless the government finds who gave the wrong information to NATO," said the provincial police chief, Muhammad Ayub.

An investigation is under way to find out exactly what happened. A private bank administrator and an Afghan intelligence officer were among the four people wounded in the bombing, Mr. Ayub said.

NATO expressed regret in a statement on Wednesday about the killing of the 13-year-old girl, but said its soldiers came under fire after surrounding the compound and calling on the people to surrender.

NATO planes bombed what the Atlantic alliance said was a Taliban command compound in the Panjwai district in Kandahar Province, killing some insurgents, Agence France-Presse reported, quoting a NATO spokesman.

Pakistan Will Have To Reckon With Tribal Leaders, Negroponte Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

With new fighting expected to break out next spring in Afghanistan, the Pakistani government will soon have to decide what it can do about the tribal authorities who have not been living up to their agreement to prevent Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters from moving back and forth across the border, according to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

"Sooner or later, the government will have to reckon with it," Negroponte said yesterday at a lunch with Washington Post editors and reporters. But with elections in Pakistan coming, the United States understands that President Pervez Musharraf "has a domestic political balancing act to perform," he added.

In September, representatives of the Pakistani government signed accords with tribal elders in North Waziristan in which those leaders agreed that they would not allow border crossings "for any kind of militancy." In return, Pakistani army units withdrew from that area. Negroponte said yesterday that the "tribal authorities are not living up to the deal" and that back-and-forth travel by the Taliban and others "causes serious problems."

DOJ_NMG_0106648

Although Negroponte said that the growing Afghan insurgency is "no threat to the central government in Kabul," he noted that it is not clear whether the NATO forces there are large enough to handle the renewed fighting expected in the spring when the weather clears.

His downbeat assessment was supported by a recent report by Anthony H. Cordesman, a former Pentagon official who has just returned from Afghanistan where he received briefings from a U.S. Embassy team, including U.S. military commanders.

The Afghan insurgency grew in the past year because of financial and military aid from a sanctuary in Pakistan, while the weak Kabul government has not received enough military and economic support from NATO and the United States, according to Cordesman.

"Patience, a long-war strategy and adequate resources can make all the difference," said Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh A. Burke Chair in Strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He said in his report that he came away from Afghanistan believing that the effort could be successful, but that the "development of effective government and economy will take at least 5-10 years; no instant success is possible."

He told reporters on Wednesday that a plan, approved by both the State and Defense departments, is now before the Office of Management and Budget. The proposal from the U.S. Embassy team in Kabul calls for a twofold to threefold increase in aid, to nearly $6 billion. But he added that even if the expanded aid is included in a supplemental budget that will go to Congress in January, "it won't make a difference for at least a year."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed yesterday that a "big commitment" to Afghanistan is under consideration, with emphasis on "the reconstruction side." After 75 years of warfare, she told Post reporters and editors, the country has no infrastructure and no basis for an economy other than the poppy production financed by the drug trade.

"A major al-Qaeda and Taliban presence is building up in both Afghanistan and Pakistan" for a new offensive next year, Cordesman said. "These groups have de facto sanctuary in Pakistan, a major presence in the east and south, and a growing presence in western Afghanistan."

Judging from the declassified intelligence briefing he received, Cordesman said, the U.S. and NATO forces there are "insufficient" to secure the south and the west. He said more special forces are needed in the east where the troops "are spread very thin."

From sanctuaries in western and southern Pakistan, where the government has ceded control over border areas, al-Qaeda and Taliban cadres provide both financial and manpower support to the insurgent groups, Cordesman said. "This is a two-country war," he said, and the problems "are ultimately as dangerous to Pakistan as to Afghanistan and the U.S."

From a military standpoint, Cordesman said, "we are winning tactically but losing strategically." He noted that, during the Taliban offensives this fall, it was air power that led to success in the killing of many insurgents but that afterward there was no follow-up on the ground. The air war was more intense than most people realized, he said, noting that the U.S. military flew "as many sorties in Afghanistan as in Iraq" during that period.

He said what is needed is a U.S. and NATO commitment "that will extend to 2013 or longer and provide the necessary support and resources." In addition, at least five or more years will be necessary to create an effective Afghan government that can provide security and services to the country. "Political legitimacy in Afghanistan, as in most of the world," he said, "does not consist of how a government is chosen, but how well it is perceived to govern."

"We cannot afford to lose two wars -- in Iraq and Afghanistan," Cordesman said.

Gift Of Wreaths Touches Nation (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, December 15, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. — The rows of gravestones stretched out before him like time itself. But when John Lechler saw the date on one particular tombstone, he knew where to lay his wreath. And for a moment, Army Air Corps 2nd Lt. Gordon H. Sterling Jr., who died on Dec. 7, 1941, lived again.

The balsam fir wreath was from Maine — made by hand, decorated by hand, wrapped, boxed and loaded on a truck by hand, then driven 750 miles to Arlington National Cemetery.

DOJ_NMG_0106649

This is the miracle of Arlington. “When you first look at that sea of stones, you don’t get the impression of individuality,” says Tom Sherlock, the cemetery historian. “But if you stop for just a moment and look at the name on the stone, in that moment they’re thought of again, and they live again.”

Lechler was one of about 600 volunteers at the cemetery Thursday for what has become a new holiday tradition: placing Christmas wreaths — supplied by a Maine businessman who never got over his first sight of the cemetery — on more than 5,000 veterans’ graves.

“It’s great that we came together to show our gratitude, considering how tough it is for everybody with this war going on,” says Lechler, 42, an Ashburn, Va., resident who runs a sports training business and who never served in the military.

Every December for the past 15 years, Morrill Worcester, owner of one of the world’s largest holiday wreath companies, has taken time in the midst of his busiest season to haul a truckload of wreaths to Arlington from his small Downeast Maine town of Harrington.

For years, he and a small band of volunteers laid the wreaths in virtual obscurity. But in the last 12 months that has changed, thanks to a dusting of snow last year at the cemetery, an evocative photograph, a sentimental poem and a chain e-mail. And this year, Worcester went national. A new program, “Wreaths Across America,” shipped a total of about 1,300 wreaths to more than 200 national cemeteries and vets’ memorials in all 50 states.

Worcester, 56, says he wants to help Americans remember and honor deceased military veterans, particularly at Christmas, when they’re missed most. On the Wreaths Across America website, he makes this comment: “When people hear about what we’re doing, they want to know if I’m a veteran. I’m not. But I make it my business never to forget.”

On Thursday he looked at the crowd of volunteers — five times as many as last year’s — and said, “I didn’t realize there were this many people that felt like I do.”

This year, Worcester’s wreaths got to Arlington in a red, white and blue semi-trailer that followed U.S. Highway 1, escorted by a military veterans motorcycle group. In some towns, flag-waving crowds turned out to welcome the convoy as it passed through.

The wreaths were placed in a hilly, wooded section of the cemetery that has the graves of forgotten doughboys and GIs, as well as those of astronaut moonwalkers, Dr. Walter Reed and the general at Bastogne during the Battle of the Bulge who told the Nazi commander demanding his surrender “Nuts.”

“We want to honor the veterans, and we do it with the products we make ourselves,” says Worcester’s wife, Karen. “We’re like the Little Drummer Boy. He had his drum. We have our wreaths.”

Morrill Worcester’s road to Arlington began in 1962 when he won a trip to Washington for selling new subscriptions to the Bangor Daily News on his newspaper route.

He was 12, an impressionable age to visit a city filled with unforgettable sites. What struck him most was the national cemetery — now the final resting place of more than 300,000 — and its endless lines of perfectly aligned stones:

“That stuck with me all these years, the enormity of the cemetery,” Worcester says. “And the fact that everyone buried there had a personal story, and aspirations and plans for the future, like we all do.”

Years later, as a sophomore at the University of Maine, he realized there was money to be made in Christmas wreaths. He could buy wreaths that local people made at home and take them to Boston to sell to a wholesaler. That first year he sold 500.

It was the beginning of the Worcester Wreath Co., which in 1982 became a supplier for Maine’s mail order giant, L.L. Bean.

In 1992, during one of his company’s periodic expansions, Worcester got a call in December from one of his warehouses. “We’re up to our knees in wreaths,” his foreman announced — they’d overproduced several thousand.

“I said, ‘Well, I’m not just gonna throw them away,’ “ he recalls. “That’s when I thought of Arlington.” He called Washington for permission to lay his wreaths. To his surprise, he got it.

But when he arrived at Arlington, Worcester was stunned by the size of the area to be covered. It was just Worcester, his son and about a dozen others. It was raining. It took six hours. Afterward he was wet, tired — and exhilarated. There, buried in the Virginia soil, he had found the cost of freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0106650

Every December after that, Worcester, his family, his employees and his friends gathered on a Sunday to decorate wreaths and load them on a truck provided by a local company. Worcester and a few others drove to Arlington, laid 5,000 wreaths and were back at work within a few days.

Each year, Worcester was assigned a different part of the cemetery, usually an older section whose graves received less attention. Every stone got the same simple 20-inch wreath, adorned only with a red bow. Before leaving, the volunteers laid wreaths at the graves of John F. Kennedy and Robert F. Kennedy, the USS Maine memorial and the Tomb of the Unknowns.

When Worcester started his business in 1971, he was 21 — the average age, he would point out, of U.S. servicemen killed in World War II. He had a college draft deferment, but he never forgot the sacrifices of those who did serve.

"I'd been lucky," he says, "and I wanted to give back."

Christmas wreaths had made him rich. Now, he felt he was reclaiming the true meaning of a wreath, showing it as something more than a glitzy holiday ornament: "We wanted to get back to the simple idea of what a wreath represents — respect, honor, victory."

This was a different kind of victory, though — a victory of remembrance, a victory over death itself.

But, he is asked, what was the point of their sacrifice? Did the doughboys make the world safe for democracy in World War I? Did the Spanish-American War keep America free? And what about Iraq, a war which has steadily lost public support?

"This is non-political," Worcester replies. "These people died for us. If they died in vain, I don't know. But they all deserve our respect."

The tradition grew slowly. Every year there were a few more volunteers in Harrington to load the truck and a few more in Arlington to lay the wreaths. Every January there'd be a few more calls, e-mails or letters. Worcester says that apart from a newspaper story here and a broadcast report there, "it was almost a private thing."

Until December 2005.

When the day was almost over and all the wreaths had been laid, it started to snow. Around the same time, an Air Force news photographer covering the event went back for a final picture before heading back to the Pentagon.

Master Sgt. James Varhegyi had shot hundred of images that morning. In accordance with photojournalistic convention, almost all had people in them.

But this time Varhegyi took a picture that had no people, just rows of graves, decorated with bowed wreaths, on snowy ground. White, green, red — the colors of Christmas. He didn't think it was anything special.

When the Worcesters returned to Harrington, things quieted down as usual after Christmas. Except that instead of declining in January, the appreciative calls and e-mails began to increase.

Varhegyi's photo had been posted on an Air Force website, from which someone — the Worcesters don't know who — had lifted it, put it in an e-mail, and added a poem:

Rest easy, sleep well my brothers.

Know the line has held, your job is done.

Rest easy, sleep well.

Others have taken up where you fell, the line has held.

Peace, peace, and farewell …

"Please share this with everyone on your address list," the e-mail read. "You hear too much about the bad things people do. Everyone should hear about this."

The e-mail became an Internet sensation. It spread like a virus, so far and so fast that Snopes.com, a website devoted to exploring myths and rumors, investigated and confirmed its existence.

More and more people contacted Worcester Wreath Co. with questions, thanks and requests. By February, the company was getting 30 to 40 e-mails a day. People sent checks, which were returned. Company staffers found themselves devoting more and more time to phone calls about the Arlington effort.

One night, Sherry Scott, the office manager, was working late, trying to get caught up, when the phone rang:

"It was an elderly woman from Texas. She says, 'Tell me you're the company that lays the wreaths at Arlington.' When I said we were, there was silence. Then she started crying. She says, 'My Dad's buried at Arlington.' Then I started crying."

DOJ_NMG_0106651

Karen Worcester says that many people seemed to appreciate that even though they couldn't go to Arlington to visit a loved one's gravesite, "it's like we go for 'em." She'd print the e-mails out and read them to her husband at night. Sometimes they'd wind up crying.

She rose before dawn to read e-mails and write replies. She did not consider herself eloquent: "What do you say when someone tells you, 'I just buried my son.' ?"

By summer, hundreds of e-mails were coming in each day. Karen began to notice a refrain: "They said, 'Can you do that here where we are? Can't I get a wreath?' I thought, 'We can't do every grave. But we can do every cemetery.' "

Fine, said her husband: How?

By August, they knew.

Worcester Wreath would send six wreaths to veterans' cemeteries in every state. Members of the Civil Air Patrol, a national organization that has chapters in every state, would see that they were distributed.

UPS offered to ship the wreaths at no charge. A company in New Jersey provided 3,000 small flags. A Worcester Wreath employee was delegated to work solely on coordinating the program.

"And to think," Karen Worcester says, "it all started with, 'We made too many wreaths!' "

A final word about Lt. Sterling, courtesy of military historian David Aiken. When Japanese planes attacked Wheeler Field in central Oahu during their assault on Pearl Harbor, Sterling was on the ground. He was an assistant flight engineer; he'd passed his flight tests but had not progressed as rapidly as the other pilots. He saw that a group of P-36 fighters was beginning to taxi out, but the formation was short one plane. It sat empty on the tarmac, its engine idling.

Sterling climbed into the cockpit, handed his watch to the crew chief, and said, "Give this to my mother! I'm not coming back!"

He didn't. His plane was shot down off Oahu's eastern shore in a fight with a Japanese Zero and was never recovered. He is the only Air Force pilot still counted as missing in the battle.

Sterling was one of those who had, as Morrill Worcester puts it, "aspirations and plans for the future." His fiancée was a nurse at nearby Schofield Barracks. They had a date that afternoon.

In The 83rd Congress, A Senate In Constant Turmoil (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson's sudden illness has consumed the political class the past two days. Everyone is talking about what happens if the South Dakota Democrat leaves the Senate and is replaced by a Republican to create a 50-50 split. Democrats and Republicans alike are rushing out statements saying the standard "our thoughts and prayers are with him." That is, at a minimum, half true.

But the unsettled situation pales when compared with the bizarre 83rd Congress in 1953 and 1954, during which nine of the then-96 senators died, including one who committed suicide, and one resigned.

When the Senate convened on Jan. 3, 1953, the GOP was in charge 48 to 47, plus one former Republican, Sen. Wayne L. Morse-- an independent so independent that he moved his seat to the Senate aisle and would not vote with the Democrats to organize.

By Aug. 3 of that year, when the first session adjourned, three members -- including Majority Leader Robert A. Taft (R-Ohio) -- had died. When the next session began in January 1954, the Democrats had become the majority, 48-47-1, but they did not assume control. At one point during that session, as various members died, the D's even had a two-vote lead, but they never challenged Republican control of the body. The Senate adjourned Aug. 20 back where it had started, with the GOP holding a one-vote majority.

So why didn't the Democrats take over? For one thing, seems the "minority" leader, Sen. Lyndon Baines Johnson (D-Tex.), didn't particularly want to. He preferred to have the Republicans deal with Sen. Joseph McCarthy (R-Wis.), according to Senate associate historian Donald A. Ritchie.

DOJ_NMG_0106652

It was an ugly time at the Senate. Sen. Lester Hunt (D-Wyo.) committed suicide, shooting himself in his office in the Old Senate Office Building on June 19, 1954. McCarthyites were after Hunt, who strongly opposed McCarthy, and they threatened to reveal that Hunt's son had been arrested the year before, accused of soliciting a male undercover police officer in Lafayette Square. The McCarthyites wanted Hunt to announce he would not run again. He did so, then killed himself.

More important, there was "no way the Democrats could have claimed a majority," Ritchie said, "because the Republicans could have blocked them" with a filibuster, and in the Senate, most everything can be filibustered -- even by the minority.The Democrats' Five-Figure Fete

Mark your calendars! The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's first invite of the new year is to a "Swearing In Brunch and Celebration Concert" honoring Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi on Jan. 4. The brunch is at 10:30 in the Members of Congress Room of the Library of Congress. "Please RSVP by December 20th."

The concert at the National Building Museum features Tony Bennett, Carole King and Wyclef Jean. Should be a most excellent show, though perhaps not worth each PAC's $15,000 "requested contribution" for two tickets. Make checks payable to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Checkbook a little depleted these days? Not to worry. They give you till the end of next month to pay up.

Hmmm . . . 15 large? Tom DeLay would be proud.A Diplomat and a Scholar

For those of you keeping score, another name has emerged as a strong contender to become the next Saudi ambassador here. He's Mishal bin Abdullah, son of the Saudi king and now at the United Nations in New York. He's minister-in-charge at the Saudi ministry of foreign affairs.

Meanwhile, Loop Fans, after checking their yearbooks and memories, have been writing to say that although outgoing ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal attended Georgetown University, he never graduated. Indeed, the Saudi Embassy bio does not say that he did. Turki "pursued an undergraduate degree at Georgetown University," the bio says, but it doesn't say whether he ever caught one.From Foreign to Domestic Musical chairs . . . Douglas Holtz-Eakin, the former director of the Congressional Budget Office who now sits in the Paul A. Volcker Chair for International Economics at the Maurice R. Greenberg Center for Geoeconomic Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations here, will be sitting next month in the Economic Policy Chair, John McCain2008, the Exploratory Committee, which is in Arlington.

In his new job, Holtz-Eakin will be lining up against advisers to another potential presidential candidate, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney: R. Glenn Hubbard and N. Greg Mankiw, both former White House Council of Economic Advisers chairs for President Bush. (Okay, maybe they don't have hyphenated last names, but their names each begin with an initial.) So the early indications are that Romney will be the tax cutter and McCain will be the spending cutter? And we know what the voters have always preferred.A One-Sided Conversation

Noted Bush observation. At his news conference last week, President Bush said: "I talk to families who die."

DOJ:

FEDERAL DIARY: Nearing Takeoff: Compensation For Justice Lawyers' Travel Time (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

After a long flight through Congress, legislation that would permit Justice Department lawyers to claim time off for travel during off-duty hours has been sent to the president for his signature.

Congress approved legislation in 2004 creating compensatory time off for federal employees, but the Justice Department decided it did not apply to the department's 9,000 lawyers because of a 1999 congressional restriction that limits their overtime pay.

The law permits federal employees to receive time off when they travel on official business during off-duty hours, such as flying on a Sunday to attend a Monday morning meeting. Previous rules made it difficult for employees to qualify for compensation while traveling outside normal business hours.

Justice's interpretation of the law triggered complaints inside the department. The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents about 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, worked with Congress and the department on a legislative solution.

"It took us nearly two years of persistent effort," said Richard Delonis, president of the association.

After House members and senators introduced the comp-time bill to extend eligibility to Justice lawyers, Democratic and Republican senators kept it grounded to use as a bargaining chip on other issues. As Congress neared adjournment, the lame-duck Senate cleared the bill for takeoff to the White House.

Key supporters of the legislation included Sens. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), Susan Collins (R-Maine), Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) and Reps. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), Danny K. Davis (D-Ill.), Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

Delonis said assistant U.S. attorneys and other Justice lawyers sometimes must travel on nights or weekends for court appearances and other duties, losing time that could be spent with their families. "This comp-time legislation passed by Congress sends an important message to these dedicated public servants, assuring that they do not bear an extra burden that Congress did not intend to impose," he said.

Congressional aides said they expected the president to sign the bill.Nader's View on the Post Office

A nonprofit group founded by consumer advocate Ralph Nader has released a new book on the U.S. Postal Service that calls for giving the public a greater role in setting postal priorities.

"The lack of citizen-consumers' involvement in the recently passed postal reform legislation has highlighted the need for a public dialogue about the future of our postal system," Nader said. "The book provides a starting point for that conversation."

The book, "Preserving the People's Post Office," is sponsored by Nader's Center for Study of Responsive Law and written by Christopher W. Shaw, a project director at the center.

Shaw and Nader call for creation of an independent Post Office Consumer Action Group as a way to give the public an organized voice to help counter the influence of large corporate mailers and private-sector parcel and express-mail companies.

Congress recently approved a measure that would overhaul Postal Service business operations for the first time since 1970, in part to provide magazines, credit card companies and banks with more predictable increases in postal rates.Talk Shows

Kathryn K. Troutman, founder of the Resume Place Inc., will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Vice Adm. John C. Harvey Jr., chief of naval personnel and deputy chief of naval operations for manpower, personnel, training and education, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

U.S. Attorney John McKay Announces Resignation (AP)

By Gene Johnson

AP, December 14, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- U.S. Attorney John McKay, the Justice Department's top lawyer in Western Washington, said Thursday he will resign next month to return to the private sector.

The announcement came the same day McKay was notified that he would not be nominated to be a federal judge in Seattle, but the timing was purely coincidental, he said. McKay had hoped to fill the position created by U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour's elevation to senior status.

"I'm disappointed I didn't get the judgeship, but I'm excited about the new opportunities," he said.

McKay was nominated to the job by President Bush on Sept. 19, 2001, and confirmed by the U.S. Senate on Oct. 24 of that year. During his tenure, his office handled the sentencing of terrorist Ahmed Ressam, the indictment of an alleged eco-terrorism ring responsible for the firebombing of the University of Washington's horticulture center, and the prosecution of those responsible for building the first tunnel discovered under the U.S.-Canada border.

McKay said his resignation would take effect Jan. 26. He said he has no immediate plans for the future, but would begin speaking with law firms after he steps down and would probably take time off before starting a new job.

"I have been privileged to serve President Bush, and the people of Western Washington as United States attorney. Our work in the United States attorneys office has increased the safety and security of our community, while carefully safeguarding civil rights," McKay said in a news release.

Before his appointment, McKay was president of Legal Services Corp., in Washington, D.C., a private nonprofit corporation that provides legal representation for low-income Americans.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez has the authority to appoint an interim U.S. attorney whose term lasts until a permanent replacement can be nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

In an interview Thursday, McKay said his greatest regret was that the assassination of 18-year Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Crane Wales, who was shot to death less than a month after McKay was nominated, remains unsolved.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sycamore: Ex-exec Thwarts Options Probe (BZJRNL)

Boston Business Journal, December 14, 2006

Sycamore Networks Inc.'s stock options problems have taken a new twist.

The Chelmsford, Mass.-based communications equipment company says it hasn't been able to comply fully with subpoenas from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission because a former employee won't cooperate.

In a suit filed in Suffolk Superior Court last month, Sycamore says Katherine B. Galli, who helped manage the company's stock option program for several years, has refused to return crucial documents Sycamore needs to respond to the federal investigators.

Dell Delays Filing Quarterly Report, Cites SEC Probe (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Dell Inc., the world's second-largest personal-computer maker, delayed filing its quarterly report for the second time this year, citing an accounting probe by government regulators.

A report for the quarter ended Nov. 3 will be filed as soon as possible, Round Rock, Texas-based Dell said today in a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission filing. The company also hasn't submitted a report for the second quarter ended Aug. 4.

Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins said in August the SEC has been reviewing the company's revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. Dell disclosed last month the SEC had stepped up the probe into a formal investigation. The U.S. Justice Department is also reviewing the company's accounting.

"No determination has been made as to whether restatements of prior period financial statements will be required," Dell said in today's filing. "The company is not currently able to predict the extent or significance of any such changes, and those changes could materially affect previously announced results."

Dell reported third-quarter profit that beat analysts' estimates, according to preliminary figures released Nov. 21. Net income was $677 million, or 30 cents a share, on sales of $14.4 billion.

Federal scrutiny comes as Rollins works to boost sales and profit after losing U.S. customers alienated by Dell's poor customer service. Hewlett-Packard Co. recaptured the PC market lead last quarter after trailing Dell for three years.

Shares of Dell rose 80 cents, or 3.1 percent, to $26.87 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They've lost 10 percent this year.

Coherent Faces Informal SEC Probe (CFO)

By Stephen Taub

DOJ_NMG_0106655

CFO.com, December 14, 2006

Another company's options granting practices are being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Coherent Inc., which makes lasers for commercial and scientific uses, said it received an informal inquiry from the San Francisco office of the SEC relating to the company's past granting of stock options.

The company, whose market capitalization is slightly less than $1 billion, assured investors that it intends to cooperate with the inquiry. As a result of the probe, however, Coherent said it will delay the filing of its annual report due to its internal review into its option practices and related accounting. Coherent also noted that it will not be able to file its annual report prior to the end of the 15-day extension provided by SEC rules. Coherent also said that it has not determined whether it needs to restate any previous financial statements or if it needs to record any non-cash adjustments. advertisement

The Associated Press said that a little more than 100 companies are currently under investigation by the SEC and/or the Justice Department for possible options backdating.

Apollo Finds Issues With Option Grants (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

PHOENIX — For-profit education provider Apollo Group Inc. said Thursday a special committee found that certain former officers took steps "that may have been intended to mask failures" in the company's process for approving the grant dates for stock options.

In its final findings from its review of past stock option grants, the special panel confirmed preliminary findings that recorded grant dates may not have matched the actual day stock options were granted, but instead coincided with dates on which the company's stock traded at low levels.

Such a practice, known as backdating, increases the potential windfall from exercising the options. The practice itself is not illegal, but failure to disclose it can have legal and tax ramifications.

Apollo said the findings do not apply to any members of Apollo's current executive team. The company didn't name the former officers in a statement Thursday. Former chief financial officer Kendra B. Gonzales and former Controller Daniel E. Bachus left the company last month.

Apollo also said it will need to restate certain financials and file necessary amendments with the Securities and Exchange Commission, but has not yet determined when the filings will be made nor the magnitude of additional past liabilities.

Apollo also said it is unable to file its quarterly report for the period ending May 31, and its annual report for the fiscal year ending Aug. 31 on time and has requested an extension.

Apollo expects to take a charge of about $34 million related to bad-debt expensing.

Meanwhile, Apollo named 49-year-old K. Sue Redman, senior vice president and chief financial officer of Texas A&M University, to its board of directors.

There are currently 104 companies being reviewed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and/or the Department of Justice as of Dec. 14, according to an AP review. There are at least 90 other companies that have launched or completed internal reviews of their stock options practices that aren't currently facing a SEC or Department of Justice probe.

Shares of Apollo rose 9 cents to $40.13 in aftermarket electronic trading following a rise of 96 cents, or 2 percent, to $40.04 in the regular trading session on the Nasdaq.

S.E.C. Eases Regulations On Business (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals, the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday issued a flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection.

In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that has come under attack from many companies.

DOJ_NMG_0106656

It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. A number of companies have asked to withdraw, and officials said the current rules discouraged companies from listing on United States exchanges if they did not have the option of withdrawing later.

"We hope these proposals, when combined, will make the U.S. markets more attractive and we will get more companies here," said John W. White, director of the commission's division of corporation finance.

Among other noteworthy proposals the S.E.C. issued was one that would increase the financial qualifications for investors in hedge funds, to a net worth of $2.5 million from the current standard of $1 million. Officials said the proposal had the effect of adjusting the original rule for inflation, just as hedge funds are becoming more popular among some less wealthy people. The agency also proposed a new provision on fraud to protect hedge fund investors.

Some officials said the two proposals could blunt attempts to impose other tougher regulations or disclosure requirements on hedge funds. Six months ago, a federal appeals court said the commission exceeded its authority when it tried to force hedge fund managers to register with it.

The S.E.C. also adopted a rule that would save corporations the expense of mailing financial reports and proxy statements by enabling them to communicate with the vast majority of their investors through the Internet. (Investors can continue to receive paper copies of proxies and other material through the mail if they request them.)

And it proposed rules that would make it easier and less costly for banks to offer brokerage services.

Taken together, the proposals and rules are expected to provide enormous savings for public companies and Wall Street investment houses. Senior officials at the commission said the proposals and rules would not reduce the regulatory protections already afforded to investors.

The S.E.C.'s deregulatory push came a day after the Justice Department, in response to similar complaints, imposed new limits on federal prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. Under those new guidelines, prosecutors in the field will now have to obtain permission from senior officials before trying to get companies that are under investigation to waive their attorney-client privilege.

In weighing whether to seek the indictment of a company, the prosecutors will also no longer be permitted to consider whether the company is paying the legal fees of an employee involved in the inquiry.

In recent weeks, Bush administration officials and business groups have criticized some of the changes in corporate law, securities rules and criminal procedures that were enacted in the wake of accounting frauds five years ago at Enron, WorldCom and other highflying companies.

It remains to be seen whether the decisions by the commission and the Justice Department will take political pressure off Congress to go further, or whether the business groups that have been critical of the S.E.C. rules and the Justice Department's approach will be able to persuade lawmakers to retrench further.

The commission's votes on all the measures Wednesday were unanimous, testimony to both the changed regulatory climate and the political skills of the agency's chairman, Christopher Cox, a former Republican member of Congress. He tailored the changes to avoid the divisiveness that had troubled the tenure of his predecessor.

Mr. Cox said the unifying theme of the proposals and the new rules was to increase the competitiveness and transparency of companies and markets.

"If America's markets aren't competitive, investors lose," he said. "If America's markets are not transparent and open, investors lose."

Like the decision at the Justice Department, the changes announced by the commission on Wednesday fell short of what some companies and groups had sought. In the case of the auditing rules, for instance, many businesses had sought an exemption from the requirements of Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. That provision requires public companies to assess the controls they have put in place to ensure that their financial reports are reliable.

Instead of a blanket exemption, officials said, the proposed guidance would give many small companies a powerful new tool in restricting their auditors from engaging in what the executives viewed as expensive and unnecessary audits of financial controls that had minimum impact on financial statements. A companion new auditing standard is to be proposed next week by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

DOJ_NMG_0106657

Under the guidance proposed by the S.E.C., executives would evaluate the design of only those financial controls that might carry the risk of having a material impact on financial statements. Commission officials emphasized that the guidance is being drafted to be less onerous on smaller or less intricate companies.

"Companies of all sizes and complexities will be able to conduct their evaluations more effectively and efficiently by following the proposed guidance," Mr. Cox said. "As smaller companies have less complex internal control systems than larger companies, this approach enables smaller companies, in particular, to scale and tailor their evaluation methods and procedures to fit their own facts and circumstances."

Auditing Reform: Mission Accomplished! (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Wonderful news!

The tough new federal regulators who were deputized to clean up the accounting industry after Enron, WorldCom and the other scandals have been busy reviewing the work and procedures of the Big Four accounting firms.

And guess what?

Everything is now hunky-dory. There's no need to worry any longer about channel stuffing, accounting for derivatives or backdating of stock options. The auditors have it covered.

We know this because not a single member of any Big Four accounting firm has been sanctioned or censured since the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board opened its doors in 2003. In fact, from what has been made public -- not much -- one might surmise that shoddy auditing has been found exclusively at a handful of small accounting firms.

Just as encouraging, the PCAOB -- "Peekaboo" to its friends in the industry -- has declared that the Big Four accounting firms have made "substantial, good-faith progress" toward fixing the systematic problems board investigators found with their internal quality controls. In fact, there's been so much progress that, under the agency's authorizing statute, no investor or corporate audit committee will know those deficiencies ever existed.

What we have here is yet another success for what is called "supervisory" or "prudential" regulation -- a concept that is all the rage these days. Rather than an antagonistic, enforcement-oriented regulatory regime that makes examples of wrongdoers and requires detailed rules, prudential regulation rests on behind-the-scenes collaboration between regulator and regulated.

Everyone's favorite model is Britain's Financial Services Authority, whose "light touch" approach to regulation is alleged to be one reason London has pulled ahead of New York as the place to list and trade stocks. In the United States, prudentialists want to bring the industry-friendly approach used by regulators at the Federal Reserve, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the PCAOB to the heavy-handed lawmen of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

There's only one thing wrong. It's a terrible idea.

First, as former SEC chairman Arthur Levitt and others wisely point out, there's a big difference between bank regulators, who care only about maintaining the "safety and soundness" of the financial system, and securities regulators, whose aim is to provide full disclosure, fairness and a level playing field for investors. If regulators like those at the Fed had been in charge of securities regulation, they would have lent Enron whatever it needed to avoid collapse, hushed up the investigation into financial chicanery and sent Ken Lay into a luxurious retirement.

Second, as current SEC Chairman Chris Cox explains, principles-based regulation doesn't work so well in the context of the U.S. legal system.

The theory is that regulators would set down general principles and leave it to each company to decide how to implement them, without all the thou-shalt-nots. The regulator, however, reserves the last word in deciding whether a company's actions or policies pass muster. That's the way it works in Britain, where nobody dares defy the FSA.

But in this country, as soon as some company disagreed with the regulator, it would head straight to federal court to complain about "arbitrary" and "capricious" government oversight. In truth, the business community doesn't want to get lawyers out of the regulatory process -- just the government's lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0106658

Perhaps the biggest problem with "prudential" regulation is that, by its nature, it overlooks the worst kind of abuses -- those that become so commonplace that everyone thinks they're acceptable. Recent examples range from "managing" quarterly earnings to doling out hot stock offerings to favored customers. At some level, the lawyers, the auditors and the regulators understood that they violated basic principles of fair dealing. And yet few thought to question these practices.

In the end, it took whistle-blowers and outsiders like journalists and state attorneys general to expose these abuses and force new rules. But in the closed loop of a prudential regulator system, none of that would have happened. The whole idea is to keep the heathens out and work things out behind the scenes, without lawsuits, public sanctions or disclosure of embarrassing details.

And that brings us back to the good folks at Peekaboo.

Pardon my skepticism, but I have trouble believing that, as the PCAOB asks us to believe, the Big Four have miraculously transformed their corporate cultures, pushed out the bad apples and fixed all their quality-control problems.

Could it be true? Perhaps. But as long as the PCAOB shrouds its every action involving the Big Four under a cloak of prudential secrecy, we'll never know, will we?

Street Chiefs In For Big Paydays (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig, Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Record profits at Wall Street's big brokerage firms are already translating into big paychecks for the Street's chief executives, with the first out of the gate, John Mack of Morgan Stanley, hauling in an estimated $41 million.

But Mr. Mack's mark, disclosed yesterday evening, is likely to be eclipsed soon by one or more of his rivals. Compensation for Lloyd Blankfein, chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., will exceed $50 million, believed to be a record for big-firm CEOs, according to a person familiar with the matter. Last year, as president of Goldman, Mr. Blankfein made $38 million.

Analysts say they expect a handful of other CEOs could hit $40 million to $50 million or higher, including James Cayne of Bear Stearns Cos., Stan O'Neal of Merrill Lynch & Co. and Richard Fuld of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. The three made $30.3 million, $35.5 million and $34.5 million, respectively, last year.

Morgan Stanley yesterday said Mr. Mack received 461,821 shares valued at $36.2 million when awarded Tuesday, as well as options on an additional 178,945 shares valued at $4 million. The firm said the stock and options amounted to 100% of his 2006 compensation above his base pay, which was $337,534 last year. Mr. Mack took over the Wall Street firm in mid-2005 in the wake of a civil war in the executive suite. He received a signing bonus of $26.2 million when he landed, and the firm awarded him $13 million for his five months on the job last year, less than his peers.

During his first full year at the helm, Morgan Stanley reported nine-month profit more than doubled to $5.27 billion as net revenue rose 27% to $25.2 billion. Since the start of the year, its stock price is up 40%, second only to Goldman shares, which have surged 57% in the period.

It is bonus week on Wall Street, which is coming off a record year thanks to outsize trading and investment-banking returns across the board. "This has been another excellent year on Wall Street with earnings and stock up significantly, and CEOs will be paid accordingly," says Glenn Schorr, a stock analyst at UBS AG.

Goldman kicked things off with a bang Tuesday when it weighed in with record profits and plans to pay its employees $16.5 billion in compensation, the most ever for a Wall Street firm. Yesterday, Lehman and Bear disclosed their annual compensation payouts will be $8.67 billion and $4.34 billion, respectively. This translates into $334,000 per employee at Lehman and $320,000 at Bear. At Goldman, if the money were distributed equally, each employee would make $622,000.

Morgan Stanley is expected to report its annual compensation payout numbers Tuesday when it releases its fourth-quarter earnings. Merrill's numbers are due out in January.

All the money has Wall Street abuzz about who will make what this year. Bonuses are everything on Wall Street, a place where about half of all revenue is allocated to compensation and firms often pay out multimillion-dollar bonuses to make sure their best talent stays put. Top traders and bankers on Wall Street typically make a base salary of $100,000 to $250,000 -- the rest comes in a bonus. Employees tend to get their bonus numbers in the first two weeks of December -- with the cash coming early in the new year. Overall, bonuses are expected to be up 15% to 20% over 2005, with those at Goldman seeing increases as high as 30%.

DOJ_NMG_0106659

"Goldman's revenues are up about 50% and the rest of the peer group is up 25% so when your employees are delivering that sort of revenue growth you would expect their compensation would rise accordingly," said Jeff Harte, analyst in Chicago with Sandler O'Neill.

Lehman was the first to give investors a glimpse of its CEO pay when it filed notice with the SEC this week that it had awarded Mr. Fuld, its top executive, nearly $11 million of restricted shares. This 141,543-share grant was down from last year's $14.9 million, but Lehman has yet to disclose other parts of Mr. Fuld's compensation package, including his cash bonus and options.

In 2005 Mr. Fuld made $34.5 million, including a cash bonus of $13.8 million and 450,000 stock options with an estimated value of about $5 million. Like most other firms, his total package is expected to be disclosed in February. He got more good news earlier this month when the firm disclosed plans to award him stock valued at $186 million over the next 10 years, by changing terms of grants dating back a decade.

These are heady numbers even in financial-services circles. Jim Weddle, senior partner at St. Louis brokerage firm Edward Jones, the country's fourth-largest brokerage based on number of financial advisers and the largest based on number of brokerage offices, made $6.8 million in 2005.

Executive Compensation Comes Into The Clear (WP)

By Terence O'Hara

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Shareholders can expect a clearer picture of how much top executives are paid as new rules go into effect today, requiring companies to clearly explain their compensation practices.

The new regulations mark the biggest change to corporate pay disclosure in 25 years. They will force companies to release more information about different kinds of compensation and to more clearly justify those payments.

The Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the changes this year in response to a rising backlash against annual double-digit percentage increases in executive pay. The Corporate Library said this year that pay for chief executives at more than 1,700 public companies grew 16 percent in 2005, down from 30 percent in 2004.

Executive compensation practices have played a key role in several high-profile corporate accounting scandals, including those at Fannie Mae and Enron. More recently, the SEC has launched investigations into allegations that more than 100 companies improperly backdated stock-option grants.

Rising compensation has been fueled by the growing use of incentive pay, such as cash bonuses, stock options and other awards. Those incentives have made it hard for investors to get a total pay number on top executives.

Starting today, companies must add a section to the annual proxy statement sent to shareholders that analyzes compensation. In this section, company directors and managers must describe in detail how they determined compensation for the chief executive and other top officials.

The rules also mandate the inclusion of a compensation table laying out the pay for the top five executives. The table includes items that previously were not considered part of a current year's compensation, such as stock-option awards and the change in pension value in the event of an executive's retirement. The SEC has also tightened rules for valuing and disclosing perks, including use of the company jet, club memberships and personal trainers.

"The new disclosure will allow not only shareholders but directors and management to compare themselves with other companies," said Andrew Gibson, a partner at accounting firm BDO Seidman, who has helped about 100 companies prepare for the new rules. "We'll get the numbers, see what other people are doing and go from there."

Some of the changes were driven by recent instances of hefty retirement pay and perks made available to prominent executives after their retirement, including former General Electric chief executive Jack Welch, that weren't clearly disclosed to shareholders.

DOJ_NMG_0106660

The new regulations do not include a provision commonly known as the "Katie Couric rule," which would require companies to disclose the pay of up to three non-executive employees whose compensation exceeds that of the top five executives. Business groups have resisted this proposal because of fear of poaching of highly valued and highly paid employees, such as celebrities and salespeople.

The SEC is working on a more limited version of that rule. Companies may be required to disclose the pay of employees who aren't necessarily among a company's top five officers, but only if they have significant authority or control over important parts of the business. Under that scenario, Couric wouldn't qualify for inclusion in CBS's proxy.

While the new rules promise to reveal more about how executives are paid, many compensation experts doubt they will curb the double-digit growth in pay for chief executives.

"It's a data-collection issue for most companies," Gibson said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Criminal Inquiries Look At U.S. Oil-Gas Unit (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property.

The new investigations are still in the early stages, said Congressional officials who were briefed this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator.

The investigations are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters.

One Justice inquiry involves Interior Department officials in Denver who manage the government's fast-growing program to collect "royalties in kind," which are royalties in the form of oil and gas rather than in financial payments, people briefed on the investigation said.

That investigation is being run by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which examines suspected criminal violations by federal employees. The focus of the second investigation is unclear, but it is being conducted by the inspector general with help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Devaney, the department's inspector general, is already conducting two other investigations into suspected mismanagement of the minerals agency. And just last week, he issued a scathing criticism of the agency's system for auditing oil and gas royalty payments.

Mr. Devaney is also finishing up an investigation into how the Interior Department signed 1,100 oil and gas leases in the late 1990s that inadvertently permitted companies to avoid up to $10 billion in royalties over the next five years. The errors were made during the Clinton administration, but people briefed on Mr. Devaney's investigation said he had concluded that high-ranking agency officials either knew or should have known about the problem at least two years ago.

Representative Ed Markey, a Democrat from Massachusetts, said Thursday in a statement that Mr. Devaney had briefed his staff.

"The two criminal referrals by the Department of Interior's inspector general to the F.B.I. and Justice Department are proof positive that the conflicts of interest between Bush administration regulators and those they regulate in the oil and gas industry are costing the American taxpayers billions in royalty revenues," Mr. Markey said.

Word of the criminal investigations surfaced just as the Interior Department announced Thursday that five big oil producers had voluntarily renegotiated leases and agreed to not exploit a loophole that could save them hundreds of millions of dollars each.

DOJ_NMG_0106661

The leases gave companies an incentive to drill in deepwater in the Gulf of Mexico by letting them skip royalties on millions of barrels of oil and gas. But the leases omitted a standard escape clause that would have required the companies to pay in full if oil prices rose above about $34 a barrel. Interior officials have said the mistake, if left unchanged, could cost the government as much as $10 billion.

The Interior Department said Thursday that it had concluded new deals with BP, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil, Royal Dutch Shell and Walter Oil and Gas. Those companies hold about 17 percent of the flawed leases, according to Interior data.

But about 50 other companies have not yet agreed to change their leases. Among them is Chevron, one of the biggest potential beneficiaries of the error. Chevron and several partners could save more than $1 billion in royalties in years to come if the lease language is not changed.

Don Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron, said company executives had met several times with government officials to resolve the matter. Mr. Campbell said his company "put a reasonable offer forward" and would "look forward to further discussions."

The new agreements did little to mollify the Interior Department's Republican and Democratic critics in Congress.

The incoming Democratic chairman and the retiring Republican chairman of the House Government Reform Committee sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, suggesting that the leases might never have been valid and that the government might be able to force the companies to pay up.

Officials have provided few details about the new criminal investigations, except to say they are "related" to previous inquiries of the royalty-management program.

Started about six years ago, the royalty-in-kind program has become a multibillion trading program run from Denver. Since President Bush took office, Interior officials and many of the industry's biggest producers have argued that the government should collect as much of its royalties as possible through "in kind" payments because, they say, the accounting is much simpler.

In 2005, the Interior Department collected about $3 billion worth of royalties in oil and gas — about a third of the total. The government funnels much of the oil it receives to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, but it sells virtually all its natural gas and sends the cash to the Treasury.

Congressional officials briefed this week by Mr. Devaney said he had cautioned that both of the criminal investigations would last several more months. Mr. Devaney said it was possible the investigations would not lead to criminal charges, though he suggested that they should at least lead to disciplinary actions.

5 Oil And Gas Companies To Pay Royalties (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Five oil and gas companies, including Shell, ConocoPhillips and BP, have agreed to pay royalties on future production under flawed drilling leases in the Gulf of Mexico, the government said Thursday.

The companies are among 59 energy producers that hold the leases at issue from 1998 and 1999. Because of a government mistake, the leaseholders have avoided royalty payments on oil and gas taken from federal waters. The leases omitted language requiring royalties when prices reached a certain level.

The agreements with the five companies are "a step in the right direction" and may lead others to find a way to rework the flawed leases, said the Interior Department's assistant secretary, Stephen Allred.

Some members of Congress have estimated that the royalty exemptions have cost the government $2 billion. Allred put the amount at "somewhat less than $900 million."

Congressional auditors have put the total government loss for past and potential future production under the leases as high as $10 billion.

The companies that reached agreement to begin paying royalties as of this past Oct. 1 are Shell Oil Co., BP PLC, ConocoPhillips Co., Marathon Oil Co. and Walter Oil & Gas Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0106662

More than 1,040 of the leases were issued and about 570 are actively held by 59 companies, according to the Minerals Management Service, the agency that manages the leasing program. The companies that settled hold all or parts of 131 of the flawed leases.

"They're significant players," Allred told reporters.

He said other major leaseholders have refused to rework the deals and that some have refused even to discuss them.

Allred also acknowledged that the agreements Thursday deal only with royalties from future production and not oil and gas already taken.

"We do not believe that we have any ability to unilaterally change a contract," he said, explaining why the department is not seeking to recover royalties already lost from production.

The refusal of most of the companies to even discuss ways to correct the error in the 1998-99 leases has produced a political firestorm in Congress.

Both Democrats and Republicans have threatened to bar companies from future Gulf of Mexico drilling leases unless they agree to renegotiate the flawed leases.

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said on Thursday that resolving the matter will be a priority in the House's first 100 legislative hours after Democrats take control in January.

Allred, however, said banning companies from future leases if they do not rework the flawed ones would lead to legal fights and significantly could reduce domestic oil and gas production.

"Our fear is that our program would shut down" if companies were banned from future lease sales, Allred said.

Reps. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, and GOP Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, the current chairman, asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday to review the Interior Department's claim it cannot legally recover past royalty losses.

They cited a private law firm's analysis that argued the government has "legal recourse to immediately seek recovery of lost taxpayer revenue" from past production under the defective leases.

"It appears that the assertions by MMS that there are no available remedies may be incorrect," Waxman and Davis said.

Interior Strikes Deal On Owed Fees With Oil Companies; Foregoes Collecting $900 Million In Back Royalties (FEDT)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, December 15, 2006

The Interior Department today announced that six oil companies will begin paying the government its due for off-shore oil drilling under federal leases that lacked price thresholds with which to calculate the royalties.

But the deal with BP, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil Co., Shell, and Walter Oil and Gas Corp. is not retroactive. The companies began paying royalties on the leases as of Oct. 1, 2006, meaning that an estimated $900 million already lost will not be recovered.

The agreement applies to 131 of the 570 leases still active today that were signed in 1998 and 1999. A total of 1,040 leases were signed in those two years without price thresholds, said Gary Strasburg a spokesman for the Minerals Management Service, which oversees the program.

Price thresholds are typically included in federal drilling leases that Interior signs with oil companies and they determine when and how much companies must pay the government for the oil it extracts from federal properties. Price thresholds were not included in the drilling leases Interior inked with companies in 1998 and 1999, resulting in those companies not paying any royalties. At Congress' request, the department's inspector general is investigating why they were not included in those leases. A spokesman for the department said the investigation will continue and the report is still expected out in the coming weeks.

The Minerals Management Service is working on agreements with the other companies that are still not paying royalties, Strasburg said.

DOJ_NMG_0106663

The news of Interior's deal came just hours after leaders of the House Government Reform Committee sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to re-evaluate whether lost payments from the off-shore drilling leases can be recovered.

The Minerals Management Service has said nothing can be done to recover this revenue retroactively.

However, the House committee leaders told Gonzales that one expert analysis found that the government has legal recourse to collect the lost revenues. The analysis was done by Stephen Lowey, of New York law firm Lowey Dannenberg Bemporad & Selinger P.C.

"If you disagree with his analysis, we would like you to provide the committee with a legal analysis explaining why the department takes a different position," said the letter, dated Dec. 14 and signed by Reps. Tom Davis, R-Va., Henry Waxman, D-Calif., Darrell Issa, R-Calif. and Diane Watson, D-Calif.

Complicating matters, according to the letter, is the fact that MMS has reportedly offered to forgo any federal claim to lost revenues in the past if oil companies begin to pay royalties in the future.

"Nearly two months ago, the director of MMS announced that the agency and oil companies were very close to agreement. If these agreements were premised on an erroneous assumption that MMS has no legal remedies, they may not adequately protect the interests of the taxpayer," the letter said.

Duke Athletes Ask Judge To Bar Use Of Photo Lineup (WP/AP)

By David Scott

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C., Dec. 14 -- The woman who said she was raped at a party thrown by Duke's lacrosse team misidentified her alleged attackers in a photo lineup that was "an incoherent mass of contradiction and error," defense lawyers argued in court papers filed Thursday.

Attorneys for the three indicted players filed a motion asking a judge to bar prosecutors from using the photo lineup at their clients' trial and prevent the accuser from identifying the players from the witness stand.

Duke University law professor James E. Coleman Jr. said the case would be "effectively dismissed" if the court finds the lineup inadmissible "and rules that it is so suggestive that there can't be an in-court identification."

Within Thursday's motion, the defense highlights what it considers numerous holes in the accuser's story.

Among the details cited are examples of how the accuser's story changed in the hours and days after the party, that she has a history of bipolar disorder, that she identified two people as having attended the party who were not there, and that she identified four attackers during the April photo lineup.

An earlier defense motion argued the lineup was "unnecessarily suggestive" because the accuser was shown only photos of lacrosse players.

Thursday's motion adds details about efforts by police investigators and District Attorney Mike Nifong to assist the accuser in identifying the three men she said gang-raped her in a bathroom at a March 13 team party where she had been hired to perform as a stripper.

Based in part on those identifications, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans were indicted on charges of rape, kidnapping and sexual offense. All three players have insisted they are innocent.

"There is quite simply no evidence that any of the accuser's identifications or descriptions of her alleged attackers are in any way reliable," the defense motion says. "Rather the state is left with an incoherent mass of contradiction and error, one which not only raises the issue of a 'substantial likelihood of misidentification,' but which establishes that the accuser has in fact misidentified the defendants."

Nifong, who has generally refused to comment about the facts of the case, did not return a message seeking comment.

A hearing is scheduled for Friday, but it is unclear whether the defense might argue their motions filed Wednesday and Thursday. The hearing had been expected mostly to deal with scheduling.

Polygamist Leader Ordered To Stand Trial (USAT/AP)

By Jennifer Dobner And Paul Foy, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0106664

USA Today, December 15, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah — A polygamist church leader accused of forcing a 14-year-old girl to marry and have sex with an older cousin in 2001 was ordered Thursday to stand trial.

Warren Jeffs, 51, pleaded not guilty Thursday in state district court to two counts of rape by accomplice. The leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints could face up to life in prison if convicted. A trial was set for April 23.

Prosecutors said the girl had no choice but to obey Jeffs, whose influence over his followers has been described as extraordinary, dictating everything from where they live to whom they should marry.

The girl "expressed her disdain, reluctance, opposition and total dislike of sexual relations," Judge James Shumate said.

Jeffs was charged with two counts because prosecutors have said they believe they can prove at least two instances of sex.

"The state has overcharged Mr. Jeffs. And shame on the state," said defense lawyer Wally Bugden, who argued that Jeffs had acted no differently than a priest, rabbi or marriage counselor.

Bugden said Jeffs is being prosecuted for his faith, which holds that polygamy will bring men and their wives glory in heaven.

Washington County prosecutor Brock Belnap said: "People are entitled to whatever religious beliefs they want. But religion is no excuse for child abuse."

The woman, now 20, was not in the courtroom to hear Shumate's decision. She testified last month that she felt "completely trapped and defeated" during a ceremony at a Nevada motel — the "darkest time of my entire life."

The woman, identified as Jane Doe No. 4, left the sect after 3 1/2 years, remarried and had a baby last week.

Outside court, her attorney Roger Hoole said she was pleased with and relieved by the ruling.

In closing arguments, Bugden told Shumate he would be making a "factual leap" to find probable cause for a trial.

"Saying I don't want to get married is not the same as saying I don't want to have intercourse," Bugden said.

Prosecutors said Jeffs, who performed the wedding ceremony, was responsible for any trauma because he counseled her to submit to her husband, "mind, body and soul."

The girl and her cousin united in an FLDS religious ceremony but never held a valid marriage license. The cousin has not been charged.

Jeffs also faces felony charges in Arizona, accused there of arranging a marriage between a 16-year-old-girl and a 28-year-old man who was already married.

Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list when he was arrested Aug. 28 in a traffic stop north of Las Vegas. He is being held without bail.

Jeffs' sect traces its roots to early Mormon theology, which promoted plural marriage. The modern Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints disavows polygamy and renounced the practice in 1890 as a condition of Utah statehood.

FLDS members consider themselves "fundamentalist Mormons," although the mainstream church disavows any connection. They also consider Jeffs a prophet of God with dominion over their salvation.

The church has 10,000 members mostly living in Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah, on the Utah-Arizona border.

Authorities Launch Crackdown On L.A. Schemes (LAT)

By Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

L.A.'s skid row has become a magnet for fraud schemes that use the area's homeless population to rip off the federal government, authorities said this week as they launched a crackdown on the activities.

In just the last few months, state and federal investigators have busted two food stamp scams, one of which involved a merchant who allegedly gave homeless people 50 cents on the dollar for their stamps, then charged the entire value — $6 million — to the government.

In November, officials filed charges against a MacArthur Park-area clinic for allegedly rounding up homeless people with Medi-Cal or Medicare cards and giving them a battery of medical tests charged to government programs. Authorities allege the bogus tests cost taxpayers at least $1.6 million and perhaps much more.

DOJ_NMG_0106665

Another hospital in South Los Angeles is under investigation to determine whether it recruited homeless people for short stays at federal expense, according to law enforcement sources.

The incidents are the latest crime problem in skid row, a long-troubled area of downtown that is home to an estimated 10,000 homeless people and the largest drug-dealing bazaar in Los Angeles. The city is in the midst of a major effort to clean up the district.

But police worry that these latest scams are helping fuel skid row's drug trade by allowing homeless people to get cash to buy drugs.

"We have taxpayer money meant for food being converted to cash that goes to buy drugs from dealers and gang members," said LAPD Capt. Andrew Smith, who oversees policing on skid row.

Smith and other LAPD officials said there is also evidence that some drug dealers themselves are using food stamps as a form of currency.

In May, officers arrested eight people for allegedly running a crack cocaine ring in skid row. They found numerous food stamp debit cards in the hotel room where the ring operated. Detectives concluded the suspects were holding the cards as collateral for drug purchases.

Homeless advocates said skid row is a particularly easy target for scam artists because many of the transients receive government assistance. Though the government places strict limits on the kinds of items that can be purchased with food stamps, they said unscrupulous merchants with food-stamp card readers can cheat the system.

Stores that accept food stamp cards use an ATM-like machine in which people swipe their cards to purchase items. The machines, which require a personal identification number, were designed to reduce fraud.

But prosecutors alleged that in both of the skid row cases, the defendants used the machines to charge homeless people for items. Instead of food, the transients received a fraction of the dollar value credited to their cards, and the suspects recouped the full amount from the federal government, they said.

"It makes you sad and cynical the way some people take advantage of people here," said Andrew Bales, president of the Union Rescue Mission.

The mission's vice president of operations, Scott Johnson, said his team earlier this year began noticing vans soliciting homeless people several times a day with Medi-Cal or Medicare cards. He soon learned the people were being taken to an East Los Angeles clinic for medical tests.

"They'd pay $30 a day," he said.

The three owners of Workplace Industrial Management Clinic — Rudik Avakyan, Gayane Abramyan and Lusine Khatchatryan — were arrested in November on 37 felony counts and accused of fraudulently billing $1.6 million during the last two years. They have pleaded not guilty.

Court documents show that homeless people were brought by vans to the clinic two or three times a week. They were treated by the clinic's medical director, who prosecutors said was the late Mother Teresa's onetime personal physician. The state attorney general's office stressed in court documents that the doctor was not a part of the fraud and is considered an unwitting victim.

Prosecutors claim the clinic submitted bills for hundreds of "patients" — including 35 who were in fact deceased. In addition, the investigation revealed that the defendants billed the federal government for treatments when the physician was out of the country helping tsunami victims in Sri Lanka.

Last month, the U.S. attorney's office filed an even larger skid row case, this one involving mini-mart chain owner Tigran Malkhasyan and his assistant.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Doug Axel said that by government estimates, Malkhasyan used his corner markets throughout skid row to defraud the federal food stamp program of more than $6 million.

Much of the activity allegedly occurred at Malkhasyan's Hollyfood Marts, at the southeast corner of 5th and San Pedro streets. That one store took in $5.2 million in food stamps during the last four years — a staggering amount considering the business reported $380,000 a year in total sales.

He was arrested in an undercover sting by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

DOJ_NMG_0106666

According to court records, Malkhasyan asked undercover agents for their food-stamp cards and their personal identification numbers and told them to come back later to collect 50 cents on the dollar.

Malkhasyan, a Pasadena resident, wrote $1.4 million in checks to himself from the markets' bank accounts, and an assistant received $784,000, authorities allege. Malkhasyan and employee Karine Atikyan last week pleaded not guilty to 22 counts of fraud and conspiracy and were freed on bond.

The alleged scam is one of several that prompted the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors on Tuesday to order an investigation into the trafficking of food stamps. The county wants to know how much the scams are costing the county, which administers the stamps. Police officers said they have their work cut out for them on skid row.

Days after Malkhasyan was arrested, another man appeared at 5th and San Pedro streets, police said.

With transients lined up on the sidewalk, Willie Andrew Bassett allegedly swiped their food stamp debit cards through an electronic reader and gave the cardholders a fraction of the sum in cash.

When officers arrested him earlier this month, Bassett had $3,900 in his pockets.

Anti-Piracy Program Halting Cash Payouts To Employee Tipsters (IBD)

By J. Bonasia

Investor's Business Daily, December 15, 2006

Anyone who sees pirated software in the workplace may want to file a report by New Year's Eve, when the Business Software Alliance plans to suspend a year-old bounty program for whistle-blowers.

Under the program, the BSA offers rewards of up to $200,000 for workers who provide details about pirated software being used at their company. Payouts are based on reports that lead to a settlement.

The rewards program is being put on hold on New Year's Day as a way to motivate workers "to go from thought to action" in reporting cases before the year ends, said Jenny Blank, chief of enforcement at the BSA. Blank says the program will resume; she didn't say when.

"Our job is to educate those who do not take copyright laws seriously," she said. "Our view is that software piracy is primarily an ethical issue, and it can be hard to find a technology solution."

The program seems to work.

Tuesday, Burlington Coat Factory paid $300,000 to settle claims it used unlicensed software from Microsoft and McAfee.

The BSA also says Payless ShoeSource paid $124,057 to settle claims for unlicensed copies of software from Adobe, Borland, Internet Security Systems, McAfee and Symantec.

Payless agreed to delete any unlicensed software and buy replacements. The case was reported through the BSA's online form.

Symantec on Wednesday said it is suing a network of distributors the company claims sold counterfeit versions of its products. Named in the suit are ANYI, SILI, GT Micro, ASP Solutions, Mark Ma, Mike Lee, John Zhang and other affiliates.

Using illegal software can result in fines of up to $150,000 for each infraction. Since the BSA launched the program, the trade group has received 3,000 leads in the U.S. alone.

The BSA recently paid out $15,500 total to three people whose tips led to settlements. Ten others have also received various awards.

All money raised by the program through settlements helps fund efforts piracy education efforts.

In 2005, worldwide losses from such theft rose 5% from 2004, reaching $34.3 billion. Of personal computer software in the U.S., 21% was unlicensed, resulting in $6.9 billion in losses, says research firm IDC.

Pirating hurts software makers through lost sales, the BSA says. That translates to fewer industry jobs and less tax revenue for local economies.

The Justice Department has begun to crack down on the most egregious cases. In November, a three-person ring in California and Oregon was found guilty of a software piracy scheme that cost Microsoft more than $60 million.

Mirza Ali, 59, Sameena Ali, 52, and Keith Griffen, 55, were convicted of a conspiracy to sell discounted software for full price to dealers.

DOJ_NMG_0106667

In August, Danny Ferrer, 37, of Lakeland, Fla., received a six-year prison sentence and a $4.1 million fine for copyright infringement.

Ferrer pirated and sold bogus products from Adobe, Macromedia (now a unit of Adobe) and Autodesk, says the Software & Information Industry Association.

"This is not just a slap on the wrist anymore," Blank said. "The federal government takes this matter very seriously."

Ironically, the software development field itself is one of the leading culprits for piracy. Other industries most involved include sales and distribution, engineering, manufacturing, telecom and advertising.

Central and eastern Europe represented the biggest problem with a 69% piracy rate. Latin America was right behind at 68%. North America had the lowest rate, just 22%.

Vietnam and Zimbabwe topped the list of problem nations last year, both with a piracy rate of 90%.

"Piracy is so common in some of these countries that you almost have to wonder if they have more than one disk of software in the whole country," Blank said.

But because of the size of the U.S. market, it was responsible for the largest dollar-value losses last year.

Engineer Indicted For Alleged Espionage (NSDY/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- A Chinese engineer was charged Thursday with stealing trade secrets from a Silicon Valley company that made military training software and attempting to sell them to Asian governments.

Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, a Chinese national with Canadian citizenship, was indicted on 36 felony counts, including the rare charge of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government and various violations of military technology export laws.

In an unrelated but similar economic espionage case, two other engineers pleaded guilty Thursday to stealing proprietary computer chip designs from four technology companies and attempting to smuggle them to China.

Prosecutors say Meng stole the code for software made by his former employer, Quantum3D Inc., that's used to train military fighter pilots, and tried to sell it to the Royal Thai Air Force, the Royal Malaysian Air Force and a company with ties to China's military.

Under U.S. law, anyone attempting to sell such information overseas must first obtain a license from the State Department and is subject to strict regulations. Meng never applied for such a license.

No foreign government or agent was named as a conspirator in the case, and prosecutors declined to discuss whether any of the secrets were sold or whether any foreign officials or agents knew about the alleged scheme.

In economic espionage cases, the law does not require proof of complicity by a foreign government, and investigators often don't know the extent of foreign involvement.

Meng's case marks only the third time in a decade prosecutors have charged someone with economic espionage to benefit a foreign government, the most serious crime under the Economic Espionage Act of 1996. A conviction carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison.

Meng's defense lawyer, Angela Hansen, called the charges "baseless" and said in a statement the government has "misinterpreted innocent acts."

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the case highlights the threat U.S. businesses face from thieves looking to sell hard-won intellectual property overseas. Few cases allege intent to benefit a foreign government because it's difficult to prove, but he said U.S. companies are frequently targeted by overseas concerns.

"Silicon Valley understands full well the threat they are faced with here," he told The Associated Press. "It's not only a threat to the economic value of the products being produced, but in some cases it's a threat to our national security and military infrastructure."

In the second case, Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China, pleaded guilty in San Jose federal court to two counts each of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government as part of a deal with prosecutors. Ye and Zhong initially faced 10 counts each, and had been scheduled to go to trial in January.

DOJ_NMG_0106668

They were charged with stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from their employers and attempting to smuggle them to China. The indictment alleges they planned to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies.

Ye and Zhong were arrested in 2001 at San Francisco International Airport, attempting to board a flight to China. Their luggage was allegedly crammed with thousands of pages of trade secrets stolen from four Silicon Valley companies -- NEC Electronics Corp., Sun Microsystems Inc., Transmeta Corp. and Trident Microsystems Inc.

The indictment alleges the men, former employees of those companies, stole schematic drawings of computer chips under development, internal instructions for the design and layout of circuits and components, and other confidential information from the companies.

Documents seized from their homes included a corporate charter and a fundraising application touting the project's ability to raise China's stature in the field of integrated circuit design, according to the indictment.

Other documents allegedly show a panel of Chinese government officials had reviewed the company's business plan, deemed it feasible and encouraged agencies to provide financial support.

A business partner who tipped off the FBI told investigators the startup, called Supervision Inc., had received $2 million in funding from two Chinese cities, Hangzhou and Guangzhou, to develop the new microprocessor, according to an affidavit.

Both said little during Thursday's 40-minute hearing, and afterward declined to comment through their defense lawyers.

Ye and Zhong, who remain free on bail following their pleas, are scheduled to be sentenced April 23. Each face a maximum of 30 years in prison.

James Pooley, an intellectual property litigator and adjunct law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said the conviction -- the first of its kind -- was a much-needed victory for the Justice Department.

"You're finding people who aren't just trying to take something opportunistically from their employer. They're going places, planning to take trade secrets, and combining secrets from many different places," Pooley said. "This shows the problem is real and it's big."

The only other case to allege economic espionage involved two researchers indicted in Ohio in 2001 for allegedly stealing genetic materials used for Alzheimer's disease research and funneling it to a Japanese government-funded corporation.

But the case fizzled after Japan refused to extradite one defendant, Takashi Okamoto, because a Japanese judge ruled he had not violated U.S. laws. The other defendant, Hiroaki Serizawa, pleaded guilty in the U.S. to a much lesser charge of making false statements to investigators.

California Man Charged In Theft Of Military Secrets (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

A former Chinese national has been charged in a 36-count indictment in the theft of military trade secrets that authorities said he sought to sell to China, Malaysia and Thailand.

U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan in California said Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, of Cupertino, Calif., is charged with stealing military combat and commercial simulation software and other materials from his San Jose, Calif.-based former employer, Quantum3D Inc.

"This case highlights the vital importance of protecting the intellectual property and trade secrets not only in Silicon Valley but also for our country's businesses," Mr. Ryan said in announcing the indictment, which was handed up Wednesday.

"The alleged economic espionage and theft and export of trade secrets such as these -- visual simulation training software that has military application, no less -- has real consequences that could jeopardize our country's military advantages in the world, in addition to creating substantial financial losses for our businesses, which legitimately developed and owned this information," he said.

Mr. Ryan said the economic espionage charges accuse Mr. Meng, a former resident of Beijing of stealing trade secrets from Quantum3D with the intent they would be used to benefit the governments of China, Thailand and Malaysia.

DOJ_NMG_0106669

The indictment said Mr. Meng stole numerous Quantum3D products, including "viXsen" and "nVSensor," which were used exclusively in military applications, and designed for precision training of military fighter pilots in night-vision scenarios among other applications. Both products are classified as defense articles on the U.S. Munitions List and cannot be sent outside the United States without an export license.

Many of Quantum3D's products were designed primarily for military purposes, including combat training in simulated real-time conditions and the use of advanced infrared, electro-optical and night-vision goggles.

According to the indictment, Mr. Meng took up employment with a competing company, Orad, to "pursue other career development opportunities in China." At one point, it said, Mr. Meng altered the Quantum3D's Mantis program to reflect the name of a program, which belonged to Orad, and used that program as part of a demonstration project in China.

The indictment includes three conspiracy counts, three counts of economic espionage and attempted economic espionage, two counts of violations of the Arms Export Control Act, 12 counts of theft of trade secrets and attempted theft of trade secrets, 15 counts of foreign and interstate transportation of stolen property, and three counts of making false statements to a government agency.

"The FBI is committed to aggressively pursue those attempting to illegally obtain and export trade secrets vital to maintaining the United States' position as a world leader in innovation," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Charlene B. Thornton, who heads the bureau's San Francisco field office.

"Today's indictment highlights the value of cooperation between law enforcement and private industry in effectively conducting these investigations," she said.

Mr. Ryan said Quantum3D cooperated fully in the government's investigation.

Mr. Meng is scheduled to be appear before U.S. Magistrate Judge Howard R. Lloyd in San Jose on Monday. He initially was charged by criminal complaint on Dec. 9, 2004, and the original indictment remains under seal. He currently is free on $500,000 bond. If convicted, he faces 55 years in prison and fines totaling $2.5 million.

Paper Company Denies Misconduct (MJS)

By Joel Dresang

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 15, 2006

The Finnish parent of Wisconsin-based Stora Enso North America denied Thursday that it conspired to fix the prices it charged for coated papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs in the United States.

"Stora Enso denies any wrongdoing and will enter a plea of not guilty when it appears before the court at the arraignment to respond to the indictment," the company said in a statement issued Thursday. The indictment came Wednesday from a federal grand jury in Connecticut.

The indictment alleges that Wisconsin Rapids-based Stora Enso North America illegally set prices through an agreement with competitors from about August 2002 to June 2003.

About the time U.S. antitrust authorities from the Justice Department began investigating Stora Enso in May 2004, their counterparts in the European Commission started similar probes in Europe.

Last month, the European Commission notified Stora Enso that it had dropped its investigation of a suspected publication paper cartel in Europe. In August, European Commission investigators told Stora Enso they had stopped looking into allegations of anti-competitive pricing on fine writing paper in Europe.

"Both of these major European Union cases, the investigations have been stopped," Kari Vainio, executive vice president for corporate communications at Stora Enso, said in an interview from London.

"They are not related," Vainio said of the cases. "They just happened to start about the same time."

Vainio expressed confidence that, like the other cases, Stora Enso will prevail in the U.S. case.

"It's time for the legal process to decide what is the outcome, which we feel will be positive from our point of view," Vainio said.

If found guilty, the company could be fined up to $10 million, U.S. Justice officials said. But the fine could be increased to twice the gain derived from the alleged crime or twice the loss suffered by alleged victims if either of those is higher.

DOJ_NMG_0106670

Stora Enso North America has about 2,700 employees at six mills in Wisconsin. The Finnish company acquired the company six years ago through a $4.4 billion buyout of Consolidated Papers Inc.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Dallas Jail Violates Rights Of Inmates, U.S. Report Says (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, December 15, 2006

DALLAS - The Dallas County Jail, one of the largest in the country, violates the constitutional rights of inmates by failing to provide adequate medical and mental healthcare, according to a federal report.

Page after page of violations are detailed in a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice, which also found that prisoners are not kept in safe or sanitary conditions at the detention complex, the seventh largest in the United States.

Among the more egregious examples were an HIV-positive prisoner who died in October 2005 from an infection after his antibiotic was withheld for 11 days and a woman who hanged herself in January 2003. Her records included an inmate request form she filled out two days earlier.

"I need to see the doctor to get my medicine straightened out. I am not getting my meds that my doctor faxed prior orders for me, and I brought in the medication myself and paid for it," it said. "I cannot afford to be treated this way! Please help me! I need my medicine."

There is no indication that the woman, identified only as M.K., received the medicine.

The 47-page letter, dated Dec. 8 and signed by Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, was addressed to County Judge Margaret Keliher, who was defeated in the November election and leaves office at the end of the month. She did not immediately return a phone call from The Associated Press.

Dallas Sheriff Lupe Valdez has not seen the report, said spokesman Raul Reyna, who referred questions to Keliher.

The letter indicates that federal authorities expect to resolve the problems by working with county officials. If they are unable to, they warn that a lawsuit could be filed.

In February 2005, a separate report found that lapses in medical care in the Dallas County jail system resulted in undetected illnesses, excess costs and risks to the public. That report was produced at Keliher's request by Health Management Associates, partly as a response to the near death of James Mims. The mentally ill inmate's psychiatric medications were withheld for two months.

"If you listen to the local leaders, everything's fine. 'Problem? What problem?'" said Dallas lawyer David Finn, who represents Mims in a federal lawsuit.

In November 2005, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division notified the county that it would investigate conditions at the jail.

L.A. County Hate Crimes Jump 26% (LAT)

By Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

Reported incidents of hate crimes in Los Angeles County increased for the first time in four years, while such incidents in schools have more than doubled from last year, according to a report released Thursday.

The 26% spike in reported countywide hate crimes last year was fueled primarily by a nearly 50% jump in racially motivated offenses, especially toward immigrants and between African Americans and Latinos, according to an annual analysis by the county Commission on Human Relations.

The report tracked hate crimes reported to law enforcement or other agencies, but did not address which ones led to criminal charges or arrests.

Conflicts between blacks and Latinos erupted on the streets, in jails and at schools, with school-based hate crimes soaring by 111%. Many of these incidents on or near campus occurred in South Los Angeles, the report said. The figure does not include 11 of 14 large student scuffles last year. The commission did not receive reports on those incidents because it was difficult to determine if they were racially motivated.

DOJ_NMG_0106671

"All it takes is one incident," Supervisor Yvonne Brathwaite Burke said.

The rise in hate crimes reported across the county bucks state and national downward trends, the commission found. The city of Los Angeles also measured a roughly 10% dip in hate crimes, said Assistant Chief Earl Paysinger of the Los Angeles Police Department.

Yet the number of reported hate crimes recorded last year — 633 — is still the second-lowest number since 1990. The 2004 tally was 502 incidents.

Violent acts of prejudice are "a virus in the petri dish of our society," Paysinger said. "It remains a significant challenge. The first step in inoculating us from this disease is awareness."

Nearly two-thirds of incidents last year were racially motivated, with 15% caused by religious intolerance and 15% related to sexual orientation. Attacks related to sexual orientation dropped by about a quarter from last year.

Blacks were the most common victims of hate crimes in 2005, followed by Latinos; gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender individuals; and Jews. Violence and vandalism were the most widespread offenses.

"The first step to solving this problem is identifying it," said Amanda Susskind, regional director of the Anti-Defamation League. "This is not a problem that's going away soon."

The commission's report highlighted simmering tensions between blacks and Latinos: the majority of suspects in anti-black crimes were Latino and vice versa, according to the organization's data. Hostilities sparked by heated debate regarding immigration could account in part for the increase in anti-Latino incidents, said Robin S. Toma, executive director of the commission.

The commission analyzed white supremacist crime for the first time and found 17% of hate crimes were perpetrated by such groups locally, compared with just 5% nationwide.

Commission members stressed that hate crimes still are widely underreported, and true statistics could be far greater than the numbers presented Thursday, especially in schools, jails and juvenile detention halls. Language barriers, distrust of law enforcement and fear of retaliation discourage people from reporting hate crimes, Toma said.

Toma also attributed gang-related hate crimes — 11% of the racially motivated attacks from last year — to a lack of opportunities for youth, struggling schools and scarce jobs. He said the bulk of these crimes occur in low socioeconomic groups.

"The lack of resources creates an environment of violence," said the Rev. Eric P. Lee, executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Los Angeles.

The county commission defines hate crimes as offenses involving bias, hatred or prejudice based on a victim's "real or perceived" race, religion, national origin, disability, gender or sexual orientation.

Two-thirds of the data came from the Los Angeles Police Department and the county Sheriff's Department, with the rest provided by local police forces, school districts, community organizations and victims.

NJ Lawmakers Approve Civil Unions (AP)

By Geoff Mulvihill

AP, December 15, 2006

Ordered by New Jersey's highest court to offer marriage or its equivalent to gay couples, the Legislature voted Thursday to make New Jersey the third state to allow civil unions.

Democratic Gov. Jon Corzine said he would sign the measure, which would extend to same-sex couples all the rights and privileges available under state law to married people. The bill passed the Assembly 56-19 and the Senate 23-12.

"Love counts," Democratic Assemblyman Wilfredo Caraballo, a chief sponsor of the bill, said as the debate opened. "The gender of whom one loves should not matter to the state."

But Republican Assemblyman Ronald S. Dancer said: "It's my personal belief, faith and religious practice that marriage has been defined in the Bible. And this is one time that I cannot compromise my personal beliefs and faiths."

DOJ_NMG_0106672

Massachusetts is the only state to allow gay marriage. Vermont and Connecticut have civil unions, and California has domestic partnerships that work similarly. Since 2004 New Jersey has had a more limited version of domestic partnerships.

Among the benefits gay couples would get under New Jersey's civil unions bill are adoption rights, hospital visitation rights and inheritance rights. Officials could begin granting civil unions 60 days after the governor signs the legislation; Corzine did not say when he would do so.

The bill was drafted in response to a New Jersey Supreme Court ruling in October that required the state to extend the rights and benefits of marriage to gay couples within 180 days. The court, in its 4-3 ruling, left it up to the Legislature to decide whether to call such unions "marriages" or something else.

Gay rights groups have argued that not calling such unions "marriage" creates a different, and inferior, institution. But they welcomed Thursday's legislation as a step toward gaining the right to marry.

Some lawmakers also considered Thursday's action to be an interim step on the way to full marriage rights.

"This should be called what it is — marriage." said Democratic Sen. Loretta Weinberg, a sponsor of the bill. She said the title should be changed after there has been some time to study how the civil unions bill works.

Steven Goldstein, director of the gay rights advocacy organization Garden State Equality, said he expects gay couples to be able to get married in New Jersey within two years.

Legislators Vote For Gay Unions In New Jersey (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

TRENTON, Dec. 14 — The Legislature voted on Thursday to make New Jersey the third state in the nation to recognize civil unions for same-sex couples. In doing so, it moved quickly to fulfill a court mandate to provide equal rights to gay couples but frustrated people on both sides of the emotional issue.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine, who is expected to sign the measure into law, said, "I think we're doing the right thing."

In joining Vermont and Connecticut in establishing the parallel institution of civil unions, New Jersey shunned the option of opening marriage to same-sex couples. Massachusetts is the only state that allows gay marriage, and it has a residency requirement; some same-sex couples have married in Canada.

New Jersey's new unions, which would take effect 60 days after the governor gives the nod, would expand on the domestic partnership arrangements the state has had since 2004. Gay couples would gain benefits like adoption privileges, inheritance rights and the ability to take a partner's surname without going to court.

But gay-rights advocates continued to contend Thursday that the separate institutions were inherently unequal and promised to keep pushing for nothing short of marriage itself.

"We're planning a massive rally the day the civil union law takes effect, to pre-empt the idea that this is a day for celebration," said Steven Goldstein, the chairman of Garden State Equality, a gay-rights group.

Still, about 20 supporters of gay rights who had gathered in the gallery for the hourlong floor debate cheered when the Assembly voted 56 to 19 in midafternoon to approve the measure. They also applauded when Assemblyman Reed Gusciora, a Princeton Democrat, said, "The distance between nothing and civil unions is greater than the distance between civil unions and marriage."

But Assemblyman Ronald S. Dancer, a Republican from Ocean County, said that the bill was an affront to the Bible, and that "this is one time that I cannot compromise my personal beliefs and faiths."

The Senate passed the bill 23 to 12.

The civil union law was written under pressure, in response to a directive by the New Jersey Supreme Court seven weeks ago that the state grant gay and lesbian couples exactly the same financial benefits and legal rights as married heterosexual couples.

The Supreme Court gave the Legislature 180 days to decide whether gay couples should be allowed to marry or placed on a separate, parallel track. Both houses quickly settled on the civil union route, sending it through in just 10 days from introduction to final votes.

DOJ_NMG_0106673

While the Legislature was instructed not to fall short of equality in the benefits it extended, conservatives lobbied to reserve the word "marriage" for heterosexuals, and on Thursday Republicans tried unsuccessfully to amend the bill to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

"I believe the foundation of our state is families, marriage, one man, one woman," said Senator Robert W. Singer, the Republican from Jackson who sponsored the amendment proposal. "Why do you want to crumble that? We're not taking away anyone's rights, just sanctifying what marriage is."

Without the amendment, the legislation leaves open the possibility of allowing same-sex marriage.

"Give us two to five years," said Assemblyman Wilfredo Caraballo, the Newark Democrat who introduced the civil unions measure. "In a year and a half or two years we'll see that the world hasn't collapsed, heterosexuals are still getting married and God hasn't thrown fire and brimstone on us."

Mr. Caraballo said proponents of gay marriage could not have pushed through a full marriage bill by the court's deadline in April.

He noted that just three years ago, it was a struggle to enact the limited package of rights and benefits that characterize domestic partnerships. "We had to twist arms to get 41 votes," he said.

But Mr. Goldstein pointed to the legislators, including some Republicans, who had said the civil union bill did not go far enough. "Today's debate for civil unions could be summed up in two words: buyer's remorse, for legislators who wish they were voting for full marriage equality," he said.

David Buckel, of the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, said after the Senate vote, "This law hit with a dull thud."

Mr. Buckel represents the couples whose lawsuit led to the Oct. 25 Supreme Court decision, in which the justices held unanimously that to deny them the full rights accorded married heterosexual couples violated their equal protection rights. He said he would consult his clients about going to the court again to argue that the new law does not meet its mandate.

Few legislators have said explicitly that they oppose civil unions. In the floor debate Thursday, several Republicans raised other objections (no Democrat voted against the measure).

Assemblyman Richard A. Merkt of Morris County contended that the Supreme Court had overreached, saying, "I expect once again this Legislature will surrender its authority as it has many times in the last 40 years."

Social conservatives had focused their efforts on retaining the traditional definition of marriage. Len Deo, the president of the New Jersey Family Policy Council, said at a news conference Thursday with Senator Singer that the civil union bill "moves us toward same-sex marriage."

"People have a right to rights," Mr. Deo said, "but they don't have a right to redefine an institution that's served us well for 2,000 years."

New Jersey Lawmakers Approve Gay Civil Unions (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

NEW YORK — Ordered by the state Supreme Court to allow gay marriage or create a legal equivalent, New Jersey lawmakers on Thursday chose to allow civil unions, making New Jersey the third state to do so.

Vermont and Connecticut allow civil unions, which include all the legal rights of marriage. Massachusetts is the only state that allows gay couples to marry.

Seven weeks ago, New Jersey's Supreme Court ruled by a 4 to 3 margin that gay couples are constitutionally guaranteed the benefits of marriage. But the majority ruling left it to legislators to resolve the thorny question of whether to call their unions "marriage," reasoning that "the great engine for social change in this country has always been the democratic process."

The ruling gave legislators six months to resolve the matter.

New Jersey's elected officials -- among them Democratic Gov. Jon S. Corzine -- made it clear immediately that they preferred civil unions. The bill was hurried through the process in 10 days, giving marriage advocates little ability to argue their case, said Lambda Legal Defense Fund attorney David Buckel, who represented seven couples who sued the state for the right to marry. "The irony is that the court referred this matter to the legislature because it did not want to short-circuit the democratic process," he said. "The legislature is doing just that."

DOJ_NMG_0106674

Others saw Thursday's vote as a victory for gay rights. By guaranteeing same-sex couples rights equivalent to marriage, lawmakers "have told the world that marriage no longer matters," said Robert Knight of the Media Research Center, who opposes gay marriage. "This is a social wrecking ball."

Steven Goldstein, chair of Garden State Equality, said he was "jubilant for the future," because so many elected officials had committed to press for marriage rights later. A marriage equality law would expand the legal definition of marriage to include same-sex couples.

"Mark my words, New Jersey will see the marriage equality law passed by this legislature within the next year or two," he said.

In the days after the New Jersey Supreme Court's long-awaited ruling, one thing became clear: Voters in New Jersey were at ease with the notion of civil unions. A Quinnipiac University poll taken in early December found that 60 percent of respondents supported civil unions, and 35 percent opposed them. Asked whether gays should be able to marry, 50 percent said no, while 44 percent said yes.

There was little backing for a constitutional ban on gay marriage. Fifty-eight percent of voters opposed that idea; 37 percent supported it.

"We need to take a deep breath and a hard look at political reality at this point in time in New Jersey," wrote Democratic state Sen. Loretta Weinberg, who sponsored the civil union bill, in an editorial last week in the Record in Bergen County.

"I have no doubt personally that we eventually will have gay marriages in New Jersey without any word symbols to diminish the beauty of two committed people of the same sex who love each other," she continued. "It would be wrong to delay providing the needed rights of marriage that will come with enactment of this legislation because of a dispute over words."

Matt Foreman, executive director of the Washington, D.C.-based National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, said he was greatly encouraged by New Jersey's embrace of civil unions. Six years ago, when Vermont legislators passed a similar bill, it was only after a debate "that took months and nearly tore the state apart," he said.

"What I think is remarkable is that civil unions isnow widely seen by almost everyone as a fallback position, not a huge leap forward," he said.

The civil unions bill passed the state Assembly by 59-19 and the state Senate by a vote of 23-12. Corzine has said he will sign it. The law will create a 13-member Civil Union Review Commission, which will study how well the unions work, evaluate similar statutes in other states, and make changes to improve the law.

Legal challenges by gay couples seeking to marry are still pending in Maryland, Connecticut and California. Twenty-six states have sought to pre-empt rulings by explicitly banning the practice in their constitutions. Supreme Courts in Washington and New York last July upheld state laws limiting marriage to one man and one woman.

Death Sentences Decline, And Experts Offer Reasons (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The number of death sentences in the United States has dropped to its lowest level in decades, according to recent studies, including one released Thursday that predicts the trend will continue because of publicity about cases in which people are wrongly accused of crimes.

The Death Penalty Information Center, a group based in Washington, reported that the number of death sentences, which had remained at about 300 a year in the 1990s, began to drop steadily in 1999 and has declined almost 60 percent since then.

At the Justice Department, the Bureau of Statistics reported last week that there were 128 death sentences in 2005, down from 138 the year before. While the department study does not include an estimate for 2006, the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes the death penalty and tracks cases closely, says the number for this year will be about 114.

Defense lawyers, prosecutors, and groups that study the application of the death penalty all say there are several reasons for the trend. Among them are increased publicity about cases other than murder in which DNA testing resulted in freeing people who had wrongly been convicted of crimes, producing skepticism about the reliability of verdicts; recent Supreme Court decisions requiring that juries be told when life in prison without possibility of parole is an option, and improved legal representation for capital defendants, including a sharp increase in using specialists to develop arguments for mitigation.

DOJ_NMG_0106675

Mitigation specialists assist defense lawyers by investigating and presenting evidence to persuade juries to spare the defendant's life.

Richard C. Dieter, who heads the Death Penalty Information Center, said in an interview that the number of executions and the total population on death rows throughout the country had also declined in recent years.

But Mr. Dieter said that the annual rate of death sentences was the best index for judging the trend because it showed what verdicts were rendered by juries in particular time periods. The other figures can be misleading. For example, if executions went up suddenly, that would mean an abrupt decrease in the death row population.

A Gallup poll earlier this year showed that for the first time, Americans were almost evenly split when asked to choose which is a better penalty for murder, a death sentence or a life sentence without possibility of parole. Until recently, the public had overwhelmingly responded in favor of the death penalty.

Mr. Dieter said that the effect of the exposure of cases in which DNA established a person's innocence after conviction was hard to measure but probably significant.

"You could call this the DNA era," he said. "It's been quite a phenomenon over the last eight years and has had a great impact in raising doubts about the reliability of verdicts."

Joshua Marquis, the district attorney in Clatsop County, Oregon, agreed that the publicity over wrongful convictions overturned by DNA evidence might be a factor.

But Mr. Marquis, a vice president of the National District Attorneys Association, said it was not one of the significant reasons but was promoted by groups like Mr. Dieter's who want to "create the myth of innocence, that the public should be fearful of the death penalty because we're executing innocent people."

Mr. Marquis said DNA testing, usually used in crimes like rape, had never established that an innocent person was executed. The reasons for the decline in the death penalty, he said, generally involved greater discrimination among prosecutors in bringing capital cases and the significant drop in the rates of violent crime and murders.

Christina Swarns, director of the criminal justice project at the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said the fact that there had been no proven case of DNA testing demonstrating an innocent person's having been executed, might soon change with investigations of three executions in Missouri and Texas.

Other possible factors in the reduction of death sentences, experts say, are the truth-in-sentencing laws and recent Supreme Court opinions that require juries to be told when a sentence of life in prison without parole means just that. Mr. Marquis said that in Oregon, people sentenced to life used to serve little more than eight years on average.

The Supreme Court, in a series of rulings chastising South Carolina courts over several years, said juries must be told when they are able to impose a sentence of life that will insure that the inmate will never be released. Mr. Dieter said that in the past juries often imposed death sentences because they believed, sometimes correctly, that the defendant could be released before death.

Robert Rothman, a member of the American Bar Association's committee on the death penalty, said that the increased use of mitigation specialists by defense lawyers has also contributed to the decreasing frequency of the death penalty.

Mr. Rothman, an Atlanta lawyer, said that the specialists were experts at investigating a defendant's background and preparing it for presentation to a jury. He said the bar association's guidelines now make clear that a lawyer has an obligation not only to argue a client is innocent but also to present a thorough argument for the mitigating circumstances.

Executions In U.S. Drop To A 10-year Low (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

Executions in the U.S. declined to their lowest level in a decade this year, according to a study released Thursday by the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes capital punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0106676

Fifty-three people have been executed this year, with no more scheduled until 2007.

That is down from 60 last year and a significant drop from the peak of 98 executions in 1999, the Washington-based organization said in a year-end report.

Two-thirds of Americans still support capital punishment, the Gallup Poll found this year, but for the first time in two decades, it found that more Americans prefer that the penalty for murder be life without parole rather than death, by 48% to 47%, noted the Death Penalty Information Center.

The attitude is a marked change from last year, when the Gallup Poll reported that 56% of Americans preferred the death penalty compared with 39% who supported life without parole.

This year's developments come amid exonerations of individuals who had been sentenced to death and amid challenges to the lethal-injection process that have led to execution stays in several states, including California, for most of the year.

A ruling is expected soon from U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose on whether California's lethal injection procedure presents an unnecessary risk of inflicting severe pain on condemned inmates and thereby violates the constitutional prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.

Similar challenges have delayed executions in Arkansas, Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota and in three federal cases.

Further fuel was added to the lethal-injection controversy this week when an execution in Florida took 30 minutes — twice as long as usual. Witnesses said the condemned man, Angel Diaz, appeared to be grimacing. Gov. Jeb Bush said an investigation would be conducted.

In addition to the decline in executions, fewer people were sent to death rows by juries, said Richard Dieter, executive director of the organization that released the study.

Dieter estimated that based on the most recent statistics available, the number of capital sentences imposed this year would total 114. That compares with 125 death sentences last year, according to Bureau of Justice statistics, and is a steep decline from the 276 imposed in 1999.

"The American public has turned an important corner in this debate," Dieter said.

"Support for the death penalty is on the decline, and more people are embracing the alternative sentence of life without parole, which is now available in almost every state."

Thirty-seven states permit capital punishment.

"Capital punishment is risky, expensive and could result in irreversible error," Dieter said.

"Fewer people are now willing to put their faith in such a flawed policy."

Less crime may be a factor

Joshua Marquis, vice president of the National District Attorneys Assn., strongly disagreed, attributing the drop in death sentences instead to a recent nationwide reduction in violent crime generally "and murder specifically," as well as to jurors and prosecutors who were "becoming appropriately more discriminating about when to respectively seek and impose a death sentence."

The Gallup Poll found this year that 63% thought an innocent person had been executed in the last five years and 64% thought the death penalty had no deterrent effect.

On the other hand, 60% said they thought the death penalty was administered fairly, and only 21% thought the death penalty was imposed too often.

Death penalty foes said they were heartened by a number of developments this year beyond the decline in death sentences and executions.

New Jersey became the first state to enact a moratorium on executions through legislation, and it joined states including California and North Carolina in forming a commission to study the fairness and reliability of the death penalty. New York legislators declined to reinstate the state's death penalty statute, which had been thrown out by a court.

Dieter also noted that the American Bar Assn. overwhelmingly passed a resolution in August calling for an exemption from the death penalty for the severely mentally ill.

A similar resolution was endorsed earlier by leading mental health groups.

DOJ_NMG_0106677

Texas still leads

The number of executions may have decreased nationally, but Texas, the nation's perennial leader, executed five more people this year than in 2005. Texas' 24 executions represented 45% of the national total. Ohio was second, with five.

There are 3,316 inmates on death rows nationwide, with California having by far the most at 655.

California executed one person this year — the 13th in the state since capital punishment was reinstated, in 1977.

ANTITRUST:

Feds Defend Approval Of Telecom Megamergers (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET News.com, December 14, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department on Thursday denied allegations that it fudged the analysis that prompted it to approve two telecommunications megamergers now under scrutiny by a federal judge.

In a Thursday filing with U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan in Washington, D.C., Department of Justice lawyers took issue with accusations of wrongdoing lodged by opponents of the twin deals--between AT&T and SBC Communications, and Verizon and MCI--at a November 30 court hearing. The public version of Thursday's document was redacted.

Sullivan had given the Justice Department the opportunity to respond to a lengthy presentation by Silicon Valley attorney Gary Reback on behalf of the Alliance for Competition in Telecommunications, a group formed to oppose the deals. Reback accused the Justice Department of making up facts and ignoring critical considerations while analyzing the competitive impact of the deals.

In its court filing, the Justice Department continued to defend its analysis, arguing that the allegations were "based on mischaracterizations of relevant legal standards, misstatements of United States' positions, and misrepresentations of the factual record."

When approving the mergers, the Justice Department concluded that it needed to place limited conditions--namely, requirements aimed at ensuring that the companies' competitors could gain access to fiber-optic connections in certain commercial buildings where Verizon and MCI or AT&T and SBC had been the only two companies supplying some types of connections.

Reback had argued that the antitrust analysis should have considered situations in which three competitors became just two, or even those in which four competitors were whittled down to three by the melding of the companies.

The Justice Department's filing represents the Justice Department's latest attempt to persuade Judge Sullivan that he should sign off on the deals. Since the summer, Sullivan has been pressuring the government to provide additional information about why it believes the mergers satisfy the "public interest."

A 1974 federal antitrust law called the Tunney Act calls for a court to vet agreements negotiated between the Justice Department and the companies involved to ensure the deals meet that standard. Congress recently amended the law to give judges even greater latitude in reviewing cases.

At the latest hearing involving attorneys for the government, the telephone companies and outside interest groups, attorneys for Verizon and AT&T said they were convinced that the Justice Department's conditions erased any possible antitrust concerns. Sullivan, however, said he did not plan to "rubber stamp" the deals and left no indication as to when he might arrive at a decision.

Stalemate Keeps AT& T-BellSouth Merger Off Of FCC's Agenda (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin J. Martin said yesterday he did not know how soon it would consider AT&T's proposed $86 billion acquisition of BellSouth after the deal was left off the agenda for Wednesday's meeting because of a continuing stalemate between the commission's Republican and Democratic members.

DOJ_NMG_0106678

Martin, an advocate of the merger, told reporters he was "anxious" to set a date for the vote, which would create the country's largest provider of telephone, wireless and broadband services. AT&T and BellSouth have waited more than seven months for the commission to act despite Martin's efforts earlier this year to win quick approval of the transaction without conditions.

The FCC has repeatedly delayed voting on the merger in recent months because of a stalemate between Republican supporters of the deal and their Democratic counterparts, who want to impose safeguards meant to protect consumers and ensure competition within the industry.

One of the main obstacles is disagreement over whether to require a "net neutrality" condition that would bar AT&T from asking different Internet services to pay different prices for using its lines.

To break the deadlock on the five-member board, the FCC's general counsel ruled last week that the potential swing vote, Republican Commissioner Robert M. McDowell, could take part in the consideration despite his concerns of a conflict of interest. McDowell has so far refrained from participating in the commission's review of the proposed merger because he previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, as association that lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth.

The opinion from the general counsel, Samuel Feder, left open the option for McDowell to abstain. McDowell, a Virginia lawyer, has yet to say whether he will ultimately participate in the vote, and if does, where he might stand on the conditions under debate.

In a letter to Feder this month, AT&T and BellSouth senior executives said they would not object to McDowell's participation, suggesting this would shift the dynamic on the commission in their favor, despite his earlier lobbying work.

"Commissioner McDowell stated at his confirmation hearing that he will be 'a fair, judicious, impartial, thorough and thoughtful adjudicator, arbiter and policymaker' and that he will 'prejudge nothing,' and we take him at his word," wrote AT&T Senior Vice President Robert W. Quinn Jr. and BellSouth Vice President Jonathan Banks.

But Gigi B. Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, a public interest group in the District that has opposed efforts to approve the merger without conditions, said last week that McDowell's participation would compromise the FCC's integrity.

"It is unseemly to try to force the commissioner to violate the ethical constraints not only of the commission, but of the Virginia Bar as well," Sohn said. "A better solution would be for Chairman Martin to reconsider his opposition to the pro-competitive and pro-consumer merger conditions."

The proposed acquisition has dramatically increased in value since it was presented to the FCC because of rising stock prices. If approved, the merger would reunite much of the AT&T telecommunications empire broken apart by the federal government 22 years ago because of concerns over competition.

Despite Feder's intervention, it has become increasingly clear in recent days that the merger would likely not be ready for FCC action at its regular meeting Wednesday. Martin said last week it would be difficult for the commissioners to reach an agreement in time. Even if McDowell decides to weigh in, he might need several weeks to familiarize himself with the debate and read the extensive filings by the companies and their supporters and critics, industry analysts said.

Should a majority of commissioners come to an understanding on any conditions, the merger could still be added to the Wednesday agenda or taken up at separate special meeting. The FCC is also not legally required to vote on the deal in public and could approve the acquisition without meeting at all.

Merger Hold Up (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Democrats are back in power in Washington, and one question is whether their wilderness years taught them anything about the wisdom of restraint in regulating business. One early sign that they've learned nothing is their behind-the-scenes effort to delay, and maybe deep-six, the $80 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger.

The deal has the support of Big Labor, was approved by the Justice Department without conditions in October, and would help consumers by bringing more competition to telecom amid enormous technological change and business ferment. But the merger has been held up for months at the Federal Communications Commission, thanks to the political maneuvering of the two Democratic Commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein.

DOJ_NMG_0106679

The pair have cited the size of the deal, the volume of public comment it has generated, and even the Justice Department's approval as reasons for delay. But what's really going on here is an old-fashioned regulatory hold up, in the armed-robbery sense of the word. The two Democratic Commissioners want the combined company to accede to "Net neutrality" commitments that go well beyond the FCC's own policy paper on the matter.

Net neutrality is a solution in search of a problem. It is supposed to require that network operators like AT&T or Verizon behave in a "non-discriminatory" way toward Web site operators like Yahoo or Google. In practice, this means restricting the ability of the telecom companies to set market prices for use of their broadband pipes.

But companies aren't likely to invest in laying those pipes if they can't get a market return. And the conditions the Democrats are trying to extort from AT&T could even exceed those found in the several bills that failed to pass Congress this past year. In all of this they are carrying water for rich special interests, in particular Google and the rabble-rousing left-wingers at MoveOn.org. * * *

In a better world, a Democratic minority on the five-member FCC wouldn't be able to use a merger review to engage in back-door regulating. AT&T has already agreed to abide by the FCC's "four principles" of Net neutrality, which is itself a nonbinding document but the closest thing to a public policy on the matter. But Commissioners Copps and Adelstein still won't let the merger proceed.

The Commission's three Republicans would normally still have a majority. But one of them, Robert McDowell -- who would in all likelihood vote to approve the merger without conditions -- must confront an "ethics letter" presented to the Senate at the time of his confirmation in May. In that letter, Mr. McDowell agreed not to vote on any matter to which his former employer, the telecom industry group Comptel, is a party. And Comptel has since made itself a party by weighing in against the AT&T -BellSouth deal.

Last week the FCC's general counsel gave Mr. McDowell a new letter authorizing him to participate in considering the merger. However, sources with knowledge of the matter tell us that Mr. McDowell feels somewhat less than comforted by this ethics "comfort letter." The political risk he runs is that if he votes to approve the merger, Mr. McDowell could incur the trumped-up "ethics" wrath of the new Democratic committee chairmen who are allied with the FCC Democrats. The likes of John Dingell and Ed Markey could make life miserable or worse for Mr. McDowell, as they did for so many others back when they ran Congress before 1994.

In short, the Democrats on the FCC and in Congress are engaged in a kind of bad cop-worse cop routine with Mr. McDowell: Either he must stay recused on the merger so they can extort more concessions from the new AT&T, or he can vote for the merger and risk spending the rest of his days answering subpoenas. Never mind that if Mr. McDowell does stay recused, the two companies might very well let the merger die rather than submit to regulation that would hamper their ability to recoup their investment in laying broadband pipe.

Strangely, some of our free-market friends in Washington are painting Mr. McDowell as the villain for refusing to step into this bear trap. The AT&T merger was already on the table when Mr. McDowell was confirmed and Comptel's objection to the deal was foreseeable even then. Rather than pillory Mr. McDowell, public attention ought to be on the Democratic minority on the commission as the forces trying to use this merger for their own narrow political purposes. * * *

The real conflict of interest here is not Mr. McDowell's past association with Comptel. It's the Democrats' willingness to carry water for Google and MoveOn.org in the Net neutrality debate. Net neutrality lost so resoundingly in the last Congress that it's unclear even now whether the Democrats have the votes to pass a law imposing it. They certainly do not have the votes at the FCC to impose neutrality requirements via regulation.

A Net neutrality condition has nothing to do with the merits of this merger. If the deal falls apart over this special-interest vindictiveness, it will be a sign that the bad, old anti-business Dems are back in charge.

If More US Airlines Merge, Who Would Benefit? (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

DOJ_NMG_0106680

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

Wall Street is so buoyant about possible mergers among the nation's last six traditional carriers, you'd think airline consolidation was the best thing for the industry since the jet engine replaced the turbo prop.

But an increasing number of analysts are questioning that assumption, and suggesting that all the merger talk may in the end be just that - talk.

"We're in an environment where everyone believes the mantra that consolidation is both necessary and inevitable, but it is neither," says Michael Boyd, president of the Boyd Group, aviation consultants in Evergreen, Colo. "The carriers like American, Northwest, and Continental are making money. Why do they have to merge? We have a very competitive system now."

This latest round of merger talk was sparked by United Airlines' chief executive Glenn Tilton reiterating his stance that "consolidation is good and overdue for the industry" at a shareholder's meeting earlier this week. That prompted a series of still unconfirmed reports that United and Continental Airlines were talking about just such a deal.

Both companies' stock went up more than 5 percent, and it fueled speculation that US Airways' proposed hostile acquisition of Delta Air Lines was gaining momentum. That, in turn, prompted other reports that American Airlines and Northwest were also talking about joining forces - not necessarily because they want to, but because they would have to as a defensive move so they could compete with their potentially merged rivals.

If all the frenzied speculation pans out, the nation would go from six traditional carriers to three. That could put the profitable, but still financially fragile, carriers firmly back in the black, Wall Street analysts crowed.

But an increasing number of airline analysts are raising red flags, noting that federal regulators may not find such a scenario as appealing as the airlines' stockholders and top management teams.

Congressional leaders have also signaled their concern that mergers like a US Airways-Delta one could raise serious antitrust issues. Those two airlines fly similar routes in the South and East, and each owns one of the two shuttles between Boston, New York, and Washington. If a deal were approved, one of the shuttles would have to be sold, say experts. But that wouldn't address other antitrust issues that could drive up prices and reduce consumer choice in a variety of cities.

"If you put US Airways together with Delta, and there's no additional strength there, that's all about reducing competition," says Mr. Boyd. "It's Wall Street wanting to make money that's driving the merger talk."

Advocates of the mergers, like US Airways chief executive Doug Parker, say there is still too much "fragmentation" in the current aviation system, which undermines the airlines' pricing power. That continues to make it difficult for them to fully recover from the past five years' losses, which amount to more than $30 billion. With efficiencies gained from a merged company, Delta and US Airways would be able to further cut costs and reduce capacity by about 10 percent, according to Mr. Parker. Similar moves in the past have already helped his company return to profitability, he says.

"US Airways is the product of several successful mergers, most recently the combination of America West and US Airways," he said last week. "Working together, we have blended employees and cultures to create a new standard in the industry, which combines the best attributes of a low-fare carrier and a full-service airline. We fully expect the 'New Delta' to exceed these already high standards in the marketplace."

US Airways still needs the backing of the Delta creditors' committee to proceed with its takeover plans. Delta's management and most employees are still opposed to a takeover and are determined that the company will emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone entity.

United is reportedly watching the US Airways proposal to determine whether the market, Congress, and regulators would also warm to the idea of a United-Continental merger. If the US Airways-Delta merger fails, United is expected to be less likely to move ahead.

Aviation analysts like Kevin Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa., believe that would be the best scenario. He argues that a flurry of mergers right now would raise prices, overcrowd already-packed planes, and create chaos for customer service for years to come precisely because it is so difficult to merge aviation corporate cultures.

"Of course, Wall Street is going to push it," he says. "What's good for investors, shareholders, and management may not be good for others: Lots of employees will be laid off, and customers can look forward to 20 to 30 percent price hikes and several years of customer-service [misery]."

DOJ_NMG_0106681

Antitrust Wait Ends In $1.1B Sirna Acquisition (BZJRNL)

Silicon Valley/San Jose Business Journal, December 14, 2006

Merck & Co. Inc. and Sirna Therapeutics Inc. said Thursday that the federal regulatory antitrust waiting period has expired for Merck's $1.1 billion acquisition of Sirna.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck (NYSE:MRK - News) and San Francisco-based Sirna (NASDAQ:RNAI - News) agreed on Oct. 30 to the purchase at $13 a share in an all-cash transaction.

The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the sale conditions, and the companies said consummation of the merger -- which is expected to occur in late December or early in the first quarter of 2007 -- remains subject to other customary closing conditions including approval by Sirna stockholders.

Sirna Therapeutics is a clinical-stage biotechnology company developing RNAi-based therapies for serious diseases and conditions, including age-related macular degeneration, hepatitis C, dermatology, asthma, respiratory syncytial virus and Huntington's disease.

Merck-Sirna Deal Clears Waiting Period (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

NEW YORK — The federal antitrust waiting period for pharmaceutical company Merck & Co.'s $1.1 billion buyout of biotechnology firm Sirna Therapeutics Inc. expired Thursday.

Merck and Sirna announced the buyout Oct. 30 and expect the deal to close either this month or during the first quarter.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck offered $13 per share for Sirna, nearly a 102 percent premium over its closing price of $6.45 on the Nasdaq prior to the bid's announcement. Sirna shareholders are scheduled to vote on the buyout offer Dec. 28.

Sirna focuses on developing RNA interference, or gene-silencing technology. Drugs and treatments using the technology target specific genes at the root of a condition or disease, aiming to shutdown that gene, rendering the condition, such as a type of cancer, inactive.

The San Francisco-based company saw revenue of $4.9 million in 2005, compared with Merck's $22 billion in annual sales.

Shares of Merck added 47 cents to $43.81 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while Sirna shares edged up 2 cents to $12.93 on the Nasdaq.

ProSieben Holders To Sell Stake In Private Buyout (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

FRANKFURT -- The controlling shareholders of ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG have agreed to sell their stake in the German broadcaster to private-equity firms Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. of the U.S. and Permira of Europe, according to people familiar with the matter.

The bid for Germany's largest television broadcaster by advertising revenue was in the range of €28 to €29, or about $37 to $38, a share, valuing ProSiebenSat.1 at a bit less than €6 billion, or about $8 billion, these people said.

The bid beat out a rival offer from Turkish media group Dogan Yayin Holding as well as a joint bid from Britain's Apax Partners and the investment arm of U.S.-based Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

KKR and London- and Frankfurt-based Permira are interested in combining ProSiebenSat.1 with SBS Broadcasting, which they acquired last year for €1.69 billion. SBS has television-broadcasting operations in nine European countries, but not in Germany. The addition of ProSiebenSat.1 would create a more powerful rival to big European broadcaster RTL Group, which is controlled by Bertelsmann AG of Germany.

A spokesman for German Media Partners LP, ProSiebenSat.1's controlling shareholder group since 2003, declined to comment. KKR and Permira also declined to comment.

German Media Partners, headed by investor Haim Saban, put ProSiebenSat.1 on the block in October. This is the second time since 2005 that the consortium of private-equity investors has agreed to sell its 50.5% capital stake and 88% voting stake in the broadcaster. An earlier deal that would have transferred control to German publisher Axel Springer AG was blocked in January 2006 by domestic regulators, who feared a tie-up would give Springer too much sway over public opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0106682

German Media Partners had hoped to attract as much as €35 apiece for its shares, valuing the broadcaster at about €6.5 billion. Such a price would have represented roughly four times the group's initial investment and a big increase from Springer's offer of €23.37 a share in August of last year, when Germany's economy and ad market were weaker. ProSiebenSat.1 expects to book an operating profit of close to €500 million this year, about three times that of 2003.

At €28 to €29 a share, ProSiebenSat.1 would be valued at between 11.5 and 12 times earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization, according to one person close to the transaction. That would put it in line with other commercial European broadcasters, the person added.

German Media Partners comprises Saban Capital Group Funds, Bain Capital Partner Funds, Hellman & Friedman Funds, Thomas H. Lee Partners Funds, Providence Equity Funds, Quadrangle Funds and Alpine Funds.

Hearst Expects To Close "Daily Breeze" Purchase This Week (E&P)

Editor & Publisher, December 14, 2006

TORRANCE, Calif. Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Daily Breeze on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators.

The document was filed Wednesday in a pending federal antitrust case involving Denver-based MediaNews and New York-based Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, over their plans to consolidate some of the business operations of their San Francisco Bay area newspapers.

A San Francisco investor is trying to block the deal, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws.

The two companies also said they had finished negotiations in their swap deal. Under the agreement, Hearst will purchase the Torrance-based Breeze from The Copley Press Inc. and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

San Diego-based Copley, whose flagship paper is the San Diego Union-Tribune, cited competitive pressures when it indicated in June it wanted to sell its Copley Los Angeles Newspapers. Those papers include the Breeze, the Palos Verdes Peninsula News and The Beach Reporter.

Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

STEWARTVILLE, Minn. (AP) -- Catheter maker Rochester Medical Corp. said Thursday it reached a $49 million settlement with medical devices company C.R. Bard Inc.

Under the terms of the agreement, Rochester Medical will dismiss C.R. Bard from a lawsuit it filed in March 2004 against C.R. Bard, Tyco International Ltd., Tyco Healthcare Group LP, Novation LLC, VHA Inc. and Premier Purchasing Partners LP.

The lawsuit alleged that C.R. Bard, among others, conspired to exclude it from the market and violated antitrust laws.

C.R. Bard has agreed to pay Rochester $49 million, and it plans to take a fourth-quarter pretax charge to reflect the settlement.

Last month Rochester Medical reached a settlement with Premier Inc. and Premier Purchasing Partners LP that dismisses the companies from an anti-competition lawsuit.

The company said the litigation continues against the other defendants in the case, which is scheduled to go to trial in May 2007.

VHA and Novation said they believe the charges in Rochester Medical Corporations lawsuit are without merit, and they plan to vigorously defend against the claims.

The other defendants named in the lawsuit were not immediately available to comment.

Shares of Rochester Medical were trading at $12.35 in the after-hours session, up 97 cents, or 8.5 percent, from Thursday's closing price of $11.38 on the Nasdaq.

Municipal Bond Probe May Spur Damage Claims, Legal Experts Say (BLOOM)

DOJ_NMG_0106683

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- The federal criminal antitrust probe into the municipal bond market that has yielded more than a dozen subpoenas of brokers, bankers and insurers may also lead to a spate of civil lawsuits by cities, said an antitrust expert at the University of Iowa law school.

Civil claims typically follow in the wake of successful criminal price-fixing investigations by the U.S. Justice Department. For example, a government probe of vitamin producers prompted more than $3 billion in civil settlements beginning in 1999.

"If it turns out there is a nationwide conspiracy to fix interest rates" of investment contracts sold to local governments, "it's got to be big," said Herbert Hovenkamp, 58, a University of Iowa law professor and editor of the most widely cited treatise on U.S. antitrust law.

The basis for civil suits by cities could be a claim they were overcharged by an alleged conspiracy to rig bids on the contracts they buy to invest bond proceeds. Municipalities need to invest the money until it is required for projects.

Among the firms the Justice Department has subpoenaed are New York-based JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest U.S. bank, American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurer, and Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels-based Dexia SA.

The probe is still in its early stages and criminal charges may be more than a year away. Should the probe result in convictions, it would encourage state and local governments to go to court to seek damages triple their actual losses. Damage awards in successful price-fixing suits are automatically tripled, except in cases where the Justice Department grants a company amnesty from prosecution in return for blowing the whistle on the criminal conspiracy.

Lower Returns

In the vitamin conspiracy, evidence of a global cartel led to guilty pleas by Roche Holding AG and BASF AG in a case that prosecutors nicknamed "Vitamins Inc." The pleas helped bulk purchasers of vitamins win a $1.2 billion settlement with the two companies and other participants in the scheme. The two companies also paid criminal fines totaling $725 million.

Another 130 bulk purchasers of vitamins, including such companies as Kellogg Co., Tyson Foods Inc. and Campbell Soup Co., representing more than $2 billion in purchases, negotiated separate settlements that remain confidential.

Those settlements were spurred by the threat of class- action claims by thousands of consumers. Suits against the investment banks and other defendants probably would move at a slower pace.

Class Actions

"You wouldn't necessarily see an announcement of this investigation trigger the filing of a whole bunch of class actions," said Washington lawyer William Isaacson, 46, who represents plaintiffs for the law firm of Boies, Schiller and Flexner in Washington.

City governments will exercise "a fair amount of caution" and would want to first "figure out how much is at stake," he said.

Plaintiffs' lawyers probably wouldn't file a traditional class-action case, in which the court is asked to allow a lawsuit on behalf of all consumers who bought a particular product from a company. In such cases, an individual consumer has the right to opt out of the lawsuit and bring a separate claim.

In the case of the bond probe, governments must consent in the first place to be a plaintiff. Still, a trial lawyer might be able to file a class-action suit on behalf of all cities that choose to participate, Isaacson said.

Also, a state attorney general may be able to sue on behalf of all public borrowers in the state, Hovenkamp said.

Interest Payments

In the almost 200-year-old municipal bond market, states and localities have more than $2 trillion of outstanding debt on bonds sold to pay for projects such as roads and schools.

States and cities buy guaranteed investment contracts from such companies as New York-based AIG and Charlotte, North Carolina-based Bank of America Corp. The cities use the contracts to invest proceeds from bond sales until the money is needed to pay for projects.

Local governments aren't allowed to profit from the reinvestment of tax-exempt bond proceeds and must rebate any earnings, or arbitrage, to the IRS.

Sometimes, cities face a situation when the prevailing market results in a rate on the investment contract that is below the yield on the bonds.

If, for example, a municipality sells bonds with a yield of 4.5 percent and can invest the proceeds in an investment contract at 4.2 percent, the condition is known as "negative arbitrage." A damage claim could arise if a city can prove that an auction was rigged to lower the rate of the contract, below the market rate of 4.2 percent.

Yield Burning

Still, cities may be able to bring a price-fixing claim against banks and brokers who sold them a contract that yielded more than the interest on the bond, said Clinton A. Krislov, 57, a Chicago lawyer who has filed overcharge complaints on behalf of Illinois municipalities.

In an earlier probe of the bond market, Banc One Capital Markets Inc. and seven other securities dealers agreed in 2000 to pay $13.5 million to settle federal allegations that firms overcharged municipalities for Treasury securities.

The practice, known as yield burning, occurs when brokerages raise the prices on the Treasury bonds used by municipalities refinancing outstanding debt. Because municipalities are barred from making money on their tax-exempt transactions, underwriters raise the price and "burn down" the yield on the securities.

Samsung Electronics, LCD Makers May Face Record Antitrust Fines (BLOOM)

By Kevin Cho

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Samsung Electronics Co. of South Korea and liquid-crystal display makers in Taiwan and Japan may face the largest antitrust penalty ever after a probe of possible price-fixing in the $69 billion industry.

Fines may exceed $1 billion should authorities in the U.S., Europe, Japan and Korea uncover panel makers colluded, said analysts at Daewoo Securities Co. and Hyundai Securities Co. That would top the $729 million paid by four computer-chip makers following a U.S. probe that ended this year, and the record $752 million fine imposed on vitamin makers in 2001.

LG.Philips LCD Co., the second-largest panel maker after Samsung, said this week it was under investigation, spurring a two-day stock slide that erased about $1.6 billion in market value from the top five producers. Fines from the probe would undermine earnings in an industry where panel prices are forecast to slide more than 25 percent this year.

"This is just more bad news for LCD makers, which are already struggling," said Lee Seung Jun, who manages $760 million at CJ Asset Management Co. in Seoul. "Investors hate this kind of uncertainty, which could last for a long time."

Seoul-based LG.Philips said on Dec. 11 it was being investigated for "possible anticompetitive conduct in the LCD industry." Samsung, Taiwan's AU Optronics Corp. and Chi Mei Optoelectronics Corp., as well as Japan's Sharp Corp. have since said they are being investigated. All of the companies said they are cooperating with authorities.

More than 10 companies are being questioned for price-fixing, said Akinori Yamada, a director of management and planning at Japan's Fair Trade Commission in Tokyo.

Global Investigation

LCDs are the flat-panels that are replacing bulkier glass- tubes in computer monitors and televisions. Industry sales will rise 14 percent to $69 billion this year, according to estimates by researcher DisplaySearch.

The U.S. Justice Department, the European Commission, and regulators in Korea limited their comments this week to saying they are examining the possibility of anticompetitive behavior in the industry. Taiwan, home to three of the world's five largest LCD makers, is monitoring developments and isn't investigating any companies, the island's antitrust regulator said.

"The combined fines could bloat to top 1 trillion won ($1.1 billion) in the worst-case scenario," said Jason Kang, an analyst at Seoul-based Daewoo Securities.

Samsung, the world's largest LCD maker, may face as much as 952 billion won in fines, while LG.Philips may pay as much as 931 billion won, Hyundai Securities analyst Jeff Kim said. Still, it would probably take years before any fines are paid, he said.

Penalty Rules

The penalties can be bigger than what the two analysts expect. Europe may fine as much as 10 percent of a company's annual revenue, including sales of unrelated products. Suwon- based Samsung's sales last year were 80.6 trillion won.

DOJ_NMG_0106685

The U.S. Justice Department can fine companies $100 million, double the offender's profits, or twice the victims' losses, whichever is largest. In Japan and South Korea, penalties may be as high as 10 percent of the related product's sales during the period of the offense.

Some analysts and lawyers said they weren't able to provide estimates of the penalties because regulators and the companies haven't disclosed when the alleged violations occurred, the types of LCDs involved, or the identities of the possible offenders.

"Details are scarce because this investigation is just beginning," said Lee Eun Jai, a lawyer familiar with antitrust cases at Seoul-based Lee & Ko.

Reversal of Fortune

Authorities are probably investigating possible price-fixing in 2004 or before, when industry profits were peaking, according to JPMorgan Chase & Co. analyst J.J. Park. Average profit margins at the three largest producers in the first half of 2004 exceeded 30 percent, compared with losses now.

Prices of TV panels fall about 25 percent to 30 percent annually, according to Hyundai's Kim. Lower prices prove "healthy" competition, Sharp spokeswoman Miyuki Nakayama said.

In 2001, eight drugmakers including Roche Holding AG and BASF AG were fined a record 855 million euros, equivalent to $752 million at the time, after European Union officials found them guilty of colluding on vitamin prices. The fines were subsequently reduced to 790 million euros.

Price-fixing of chips known as dynamic random access memory led to a $300 million fine for top producer Samsung. Korea's Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Germany's Infineon Technologies AG, and Japan's Elpida Memory Inc. had to pay a combined $429 million.

The probe into the LCD industry follows a global investigation into airlines that began in February. U.S., European and Asian authorities are questioning companies including British Airways Plc, Japan Airlines Corp. and Singapore Airlines Ltd. for possible price-fixing of fuel surcharges.

"This is an important case because of the global nature of the investigation and the size of the industry," said Lee & Ko's Lee. "It's likely we're going to see more of these global investigations."

Japan Returns To Global Stage As An Acquirer (WSJ)

By Andrew Morse, Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Japan is back as a global buyer.

The country's biggest tobacco company is close to agreeing on the nation's largest-ever foreign acquisition, with an offer valued at $14.8 billion. The proposed transaction caps a series of deals that reflects a new assertiveness by Japanese companies as the world's second-largest economy continues to rebound from more than a decadelong slump.

Japan Tobacco Inc. has offered to acquire cigarette maker Gallaher Group PLC of Britain for nearly £7.5 billion, according to people familiar with the situation. They said an agreement could be announced as early as today.

Japan Tobacco confirmed it was in talks with Gallaher, whose brands include Benson & Hedges and Silk Cut, and said it would release details when they were finalized. Gallaher said in a statement yesterday that it was in discussions about a possible cash offer of £1.140 a share.

The proposed deal marks one of the highest-profile foreign forays by corporate Japan since it stirred worries in the U.S. in the 1980s and early 1990s with a wave of investments that resulted in the takeover of such American icons as the Pebble Beach golf course in California, New York's Rockefeller Center and Hollywood's Columbia Pictures.

After a long retreat from the global mergers-and-acquisitions scene in the 1990s and early 2000s, Japanese companies are once again on the prowl. With the population of Japan expected to shrink rapidly in coming years, many Japanese firms are looking to tap into growing overseas markets quickly by acquiring existing companies. So far this year, Japanese firms have bought 294 foreign companies for a total of $18.1 billion, more than in all of 2005 and double the figure in 2004, according to Thomson Financial.

DOJ_NMG_0106686

"The attitude [of Japanese management] has changed," said Robert Snell, the head of corporate banking at Citigroup Inc.'s Tokyo branch.

Sectors that could see more Japanese acquisitions include the car-parts industry, as suppliers to the big Japanese auto makers look for ways to get closer to their main customers' overseas factories. Already Japanese firms such as engine-parts maker Asahi Tec Corp. and bearings maker NTN Corp. have bought companies in the U.S. and Europe. Last week, Japanese tire giant Bridgestone Corp. said it would pay $1.05 billion for Bandag Inc., an Iowa company that makes equipment for retreading tires, a new area for Bridgestone.

Japan's big banks and financial conglomerates are scouting rapidly growing markets in the U.S., China and elsewhere for growth opportunities. Brokerage-firm giant Nomura Holdings Inc. recently spent $1.2 billion to acquire electronic stockbroker Instinet Inc. The deal gave Nomura access to both new markets and new trading technologies.

"There is a pronounced increase in the interest Japanese companies have in looking for overseas acquisitions, particularly in the U.S.," said James Neissa, chairman of global mergers and acquisitions at UBS AG.

The new round of Japanese deal making is markedly different from the one that peaked in 1990, when Japanese acquirers purchased 429 foreign companies for a combined $25.3 billion. During their buying spree they spent top dollar for trophy properties. In many cases, including the Pebble Beach and Rockefeller Center deals, they bought at the height of the market and ended up selling their acquisitions at a loss.

These days, more Japanese companies are thinking strategically about how an acquisition will fit into their operations. Japan Tobacco wants Gallaher because of its strong presence in Russia and Eastern Europe, growing markets that Japan Tobacco wants to crack.

Earlier this year, a consortium led by Toshiba Corp. outbid other interested companies to buy power-plant manufacturer Westinghouse Electric Co. for $5.4 billion because it views nuclear power as a driver of growth in the future.

Japan's new acquisitiveness comes in a banner year for mergers and acquisitions. M&A value globally has topped $3 trillion, according to research firm Dealogic, the second-highest on record, after the dot-com-fueled deal-making frenzy in 2000. Foreign buyers have flocked to Europe, where many industries haven't consolidated to the extent they have in the U.S., and to Britain in particular. Companies from India, Brazil and Spain have all announced deals for British firms that top Japan Tobacco's proposed $14.8 billion acquisition of Gallaher.

In contrast to the 1980s, Japan is finding itself more welcome in foreign markets today. That's partly because it has opened its own markets more widely to imports since then, helping to eliminate a major source of friction with its trading partners. Though it runs a trade surplus with the U.S., which reached $8.3 billion in October, Japan has been replaced by China as the global economic boogeyman. China's trade surplus with the U.S. in October was $24.4 billion.

Japanese companies also are more globally attuned than before, aware that their futures depend on being able to grow overseas. As a result, they are careful not to disturb political sensibilities abroad.

One big change in the way Japanese companies approach deals: They are now more willing to embrace sophisticated financial techniques. That contrasts with their more risk-averse management style in the past, marked by an insistence on paying cash. The shift allows companies to raise more money and embark on bigger deals.

Indeed, some Japanese companies are using lots of debt to make acquisitions. Earlier this year, Nippon Sheet Glass Co. bought Pilkington PLC, a British rival that was twice its size, in a $3.8 billion deal. Nippon Sheet Glass used loans and some of its own equity to pay for the deal, in a structure similar to ones employed by private-equity firms. It managed to do so without crimping its own credit rating by piling the debt onto Pilkington, rather than Nippon Sheet Glass itself. Several other buyers of British businesses have since copied the move.

Others are using complex financial instruments to project more financial strength. Japanese Internet-and-telecommunications conglomerate Softbank Corp. bought the Japanese mobile-phone operations of Vodafone Group PLC this year in a deal valued at $15.6 billion. Softbank arranged the final financing for the deal by pledging the cash flow from the Vodafone operations as collateral for the loans it took out.

That structure, known as a whole-business securitization, walls the mobile-phone unit off from the rest of Softbank until the debt is paid off. Softbank's whole-business securitization deal was the biggest of its kind in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0106687

Some Japanese companies have even risked their reputations by launching hostile takeover bids in Japan. The attempts failed, but they were viewed as a potential harbinger of more aggressive deal making both at home and abroad. In a widely watched takeover battle this summer, Oji Paper Co. launched an unsolicited $1.4 billion bid for rival Hokuetsu Paper Mills Ltd., in the first hostile takeover battle between two Japanese blue-chip companies.

"There are an increasing number of managers who understand that they have to be more aggressive if they want to ensure growth," said Yasu Hatakeyama, who heads the Tokyo office of Lazard Ltd.

Japan Tobacco, beset by slowing cigarette sales in its home market, where the population is aging and smoking is increasingly falling out of favor among younger generations, has been looking to expand in faster-growing markets. Three years ago, it made an unsuccessfully $1.15 billion bid for Tekel, a state-owned tobacco company in Turkey.

Speculation it would adopt a more aggressive overseas acquisition strategy has mounted since Hiroshi Kimura was named president and chief executive in April. That's because Mr. Kimura oversaw Japan Tobacco's 1999 purchase of the international operations of RJR Nabisco Holdings Co., and served as their head.

Analysts said the company will probably have to pay for more than half of the proposed Gallaher transaction with debt. It had $7.8 billion in cash on its books as of March 31, according to its annual report.

Japan Tobacco's proposed deal for Gallaher would far exceed the largest Japanese acquisition of a foreign company to date. That record is held by mobile-phone operator NTT DoCoMo Inc.'s $9.8 billion purchase of a stake in AT&T Wireless Group in 2001. DoCoMo subsequently sold its stake to Cingular Wireless in 2004. Japan Tobacco is in second place with its 1999 RJR Nabisco deal, valued at $7.8 billion.

Merrill Lynch & Co. is advising Japan Tobacco, while Dresdner Kleinwort is advising Gallaher.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Casino Plan For Catskills Moves Closer To Reality With Interior Department's Approval (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

After more than 10 years of delays, tribal recriminations and opposition from Atlantic City gambling interests, the effort to build a Las Vegas-style casino in the Catskills took a major step forward yesterday.

The Interior Department approved an environmental review of the St. Regis Mohawk Indian tribe's $600 million project. Proponents say the casino will bring thousands of jobs and tens of millions of dollars in revenue to a once thriving resort area known as the Borscht Belt.

James E. Cason, the associate deputy secretary for Indian affairs at the Interior Department, said yesterday that he was notifying the Mohawks, whose reservation straddles the Canadian border, that the agency determined that the proposed casino on 30 acres next to the racetrack outside Monticello in Sullivan County would not have a significant environmental impact.

The longtime harness racing track, owned by Empire Resorts, which would build the new casino, is currently the site of Monticello Gaming and Raceway. It now features more than 1,500 electronic gambling machines, including video poker, where patrons can wager from pennies to $10. A similar setup with the electronic machines is in place just north of New York City at Yonkers Raceway, which is about 85 miles southeast of Monticello.

"It's a step in what's been a long process for Monticello," Mr. Cason said of the casino, which would include table games like blackjack, roulette, craps and the more traditional slot machines as well as the current electronic ones.

Mr. Cason, who said "there is not an environmental impediment" to the new casino in Monticello, added that he was sending a notice to Gov. George E. Pataki, who has long supported Indian casinos in the Catskills, asking him to concur.

As recently as May 25, Mr. Pataki urged the Interior Department to expedite its review of the Mohawk casino, which he "strongly supports." A spokesman for the governor said yesterday that Mr. Pataki, who leaves office in two weeks, had not yet received the notification.

The federal determination formally revives a project that first received approval in April 2000, when the Interior Department ruled that a casino at the racetrack would be a boon to both the tribe and the surrounding communities.

DOJ_NMG_0106688

"This is great news for the Mohawk people, as well as the people of Sullivan County who have been waiting for this project to become a reality for well over 10 years now," Chief Lorraine M. White of the Mohawks said yesterday.

The next step in that reality is for the Mohawks and New York State to amend a gambling compact and revenue-sharing agreement before construction can begin. The tribe may also have to fend off a lawsuit by environmentalists.

While Mr. Pataki, a Republican, is expected to send a concurrence letter before he leaves office, the compact negotiations would presumably fall to the incoming governor, Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, who has generally said he supports tribal casinos in the Catskills.

Chief White said the tribe had already agreed to provide the state with up to 25 percent of the slot machine revenues and to collect sales taxes for the state. The Mohawks also agreed to provide Sullivan County and Monticello with $20 million a year.

The political climate nationally has turned against what are known as off-reservation casinos, with Senator John McCain, a Republican from Arizona, leading an effort to curtail or even eliminate them. If the Monticello casino is built, it will be the fourth such casino established since the National Indian Gaming Regulatory Act was passed in 1988.

The Mohawk casino "may actually be the last off-reservation casino," said Prof. I. Nelson Rose of Whittier Law School in California, an expert on Indian gambling.

There are currently four tribal casinos on reservations in New York. But for casino operators and the tribes, the prize has always been the Catskills, which is closer to New York City than either Atlantic City gambling or the two Indian casinos in Connecticut.

Empire Resorts says the casino in Monticello would attract 6.1 million visitors annually. Analysts estimate that it could take a 15 percent bite out of Atlantic City gambling revenues. "It's exciting to get going," said David P. Hanlon, the chairman of Empire.

Under federal law, Empire can transfer 30 acres to the tribe for a casino project. Empire would build and operate the casino under a contract with the Mohawks.

News of the latest move by the Interior Department was greeted with delight and relief by tribal chiefs on the Akwesasne Reservation and, 400 miles south, by officials in Sullivan County.

"This is great news," said Anthony P. Cellini, supervisor of the Town of Thompson, which includes the village of Monticello. "It's about time. This will have a major economic impact on the county. I think you'll see an economic development explosion."

There has been a burst of second-home construction in Sullivan County. But many of the hotels and bungalow colonies that were in the county in the 1940s and '50s are gone. And along Broadway, the once bustling main road in Monticello, there are mostly vacant parking spaces and empty storefronts.

Not everyone is thrilled. The Natural Resources Defense Council has said that the federal government failed to adequately assess the casino's environmental impacts. Rosa Lee, treasurer of Casino-Free Sullivan County, said that a casino would generate road-clogging traffic, pollution and crime, ruining the bucolic environment that now exists.

"The paybacks the casinos are offering don't begin to touch the impacts from the casino," she said.

But elected officials like Senator Charles E. Schumer, Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, State Senator John J. Bonacic and Sullivan County legislators support the Mohawk plan.

If the project goes forward, it will be a victory for Empire Resorts and Robert Berman, a local resident who in 1994 conceived the idea. Mr. Berman suffered innumerable setbacks over the years, including a falling-out with the Mohawks in 2000, but always kept at it.

"After 12 long years, the federal approvals have been secured by Governor Pataki," Mr. Berman said. "Now it's at the state's sole discretion whether thousands of jobs can be created and the Catskills can be revitalized."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pipe Bombs Lead To Arrest (PITTTRIB)

By Jason Cato

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106689

Federal agents arrested a California University of Pennsylvania student Thursday after tests showed he was storing numerous pipe bombs in his dorm room and his parents' Upper St. Clair home.

Agents charged Michael Blattner, 18, with unlawful possession and manufacture of destructive devices.

He was taken into custody at his parents' Harrogate Road home by agents with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Francis X. Caiazza set bond at $10,000 and ordered that Blattner undergo medical or psychiatric treatment. Blattner is being held in a Pittsburgh halfway house for observation, said Tom Stankiewicz, assistant special agent in charge of the Philadelphia ATF office.

ATF agents and members of the Allegheny County Bomb Squad raided Blattner's dorm room and his parents' house Dec. 5. They collected numerous pipe bombs, materials and tools.

"Pipe bombs have been used to kill and maim people and to damage property and are inherently dangerous to people and property," ATF agent Matthew Regentin said in court papers.

Agents recovered at least 22 pipe bombs from the two locations, court documents state. The explosive devices were wrapped in black electrical tape and ranged from 2 to 4 inches in length.

Also seized were journals containing detailed plans for making improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. One drawing was titled "medium pipebomb" and another "Planted IED," court documents show. Agents also found fragments from at least one exploded device, tools such as drills, ammunition used to create the explosive charge and shrapnel.

Blattner told authorities he was experimenting with making "fireworks," according to the criminal complaint filed against him yesterday.

Authorities were tipped off by employees at the Home Depot in Collier, who became suspicious when Blattner bought a length of pipe and end caps on Dec. 2.

Purchase records from Dick's Sporting Goods show Blattner opened a charge account in January shortly after turning 18, the legal age in Pennsylvania for buying ammunition. Agents discovered that Blattner bought more than $170 worth of shotgun shells, other ammunition, carbon dioxide cartridges and .50-caliber pellets at the sporting goods retailer between Sept. 15 and Dec. 1.

When Eric Rudolph detonated a pipe bomb in Atlanta's Centennial Olympic Park during the 1996 Summer Olympics, two people were killed and more than 100 were injured.

In 1999, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold used pipe bombs during their massacre at Columbine High School in Colorado.

In August, police in Salem, Ore., found four pipe bombs scattered around the city. Three were attached to cars, and another was found on a roadside. No one was injured, and police arrested Lonnie Troy Glinski in the case.

The devices found in Blattner's possession were tested in the ATF National Laboratory in Rockville, Md.

"There was some explosive material in the pipes," Stankiewicz said.

Stankiewicz refused to comment on the motive for creating the pipe bombs or whether more arrests are expected. He said the investigation is ongoing.

Blattner will appear in court next on Wednesday.

FBI Hails Phila. Labor Leader's Crime-prevention Work (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 15, 2006

The FBI honored a local labor leader yesterday for her crime-prevention efforts in Philadelphia.

Janet Hammond Ryder is vice president of labor participation for the United Way of Southeastern Pennsylvania, director for labor participation for the Philadelphia Council AFL-CIO, and cohost of the weekly Labor to Neighbor show on WURD-AM (900). Ryder received the FBI Director's Community Leadership Award for her efforts to combat poverty, violence, drugs, gangs, and crime by reinforcing the value of education for inner-city youths.

Briefly... CITY/REGION (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 15, 2006

Police see breakthrough

DOJ_NMG_0106690

in 'Screwdriver Bandit' case

Investigators believe they've made a break in the case of the notorious "Screwdriver Bandit."

Cops said yesterday they have a man in custody who likely is the culprit who robbed nine college-aged women at screwdriver-point in several parts of the city between Nov. 9 and Nov. 17.

The suspect was arrested in an unrelated incident late last month.

One investigator said police are reviewing their evidence and still talking with victims and witnesses. A formal announcement on the case was expected later today.

N.J. woman carjacked,

robbed; suspect sought

A man armed with a knife forced his way into the car of a 20-year-old woman in the Echelon Mall parking lot in Voorhees, N.J., Monday night and drove her to an ATM machine in Gibbs- boro, police said.

The man forced the woman her to withdraw several hundred dollars in cash and then drove to an apartment in Linden wold, police said, where he bought narcotics.

He then drove to a Ramada Inn in Hammonton and was preparing to check them into a room when she broke away from him and ran, police said.

He caught up with her in the parking lot, but she struggled with him and he fled.

Police identified the assailant as Stephen M. Rule, 29.

He is charged with carjacking, kidnapping, robbery, possession of a knife for an unlawful purpose and possession of a controlled dangerous substance.

He is being sought.

Janet H. Ryder receives

FBI community award

The FBI's 2006 Community Leadership Award has been presented to Janet Hammond Ryder, vice president of labor participation for the United Way of Southeastern Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Council.

The award is presented to individuals who have made an outstanding contribution toward crime prevention and community awareness.

Ryder also is co-host of a weekly radio show, "Labor to Neighbor," on WURD (900-AM).

A Travesty Of Injustice (BOS)

By Brian Mcgrory, Globe Columnist

The Boston Globe, December 15, 2006

Spend a couple of days -- or, for that matter, a couple of minutes -- in the Moakley federal courthouse listening to testimony in the lawsuit brought by four wrongfully convicted men against the FBI, and a few simple questions come to mind.

Why is the federal government fighting this? Why haven't Joe Salvati and Peter Limone already been paid for the 30 years they spent in jail? Why are 40-year-old documents being kept secret? Why isn't there a single person in the Justice Department with a shred of common sense?

Don't get me wrong. For pure legal drama, it doesn't get much better than what's happening in Courtroom 3 these days.

First off, there's the parade of swaggering legal eagles like F. Lee Bailey and Jack I . Zalkind taking the witness stand to decimate the FBI. Zalkind, for example, quipped after a long day of testimony, "At $450 an hour, I'd like to get out of here."

There was the cameo appearance of former governor Michael S . Dukakis on Wednesday afternoon. He strode from the witness stand out into the hallway, where he declared the actions of the FBI "disgraceful."

Then there's the unfailingly brainy and always brassy judge, Nancy Gertner, who began Tuesday morning's court session by threatening to haul the director of the FBI in front of her.

The plaintiffs' table is lined with so many lawyers -- nine, most days -- that it looks like a reenactment of da Vinci's "The Last Supper." The government attorneys act as if they haven't slept in a month. Even Gertner appeared to take pity one morning, telling them, "You've been asked to litigate this case with one hand tied behind your back."

But there shouldn't be the need for pity. There shouldn't be any reason for Limone and Salvati to give up more of their lives to dutifully sit in the front row and relive the loss of their freedom.

Because there shouldn't be a trial at all.

In fact, it should be the opposite. FBI Director Robert Mueller ought to fly to Boston, all right, but rather than offer absurd excuses to Gertner, he needs to extend apologies and big payouts to the men who were framed by his agency so many decades ago and the families that have survived them.

Let's not draw too fine a point on this: The Boston office of the FBI was for too many years its own crime family. It sanctioned murders. It turned a blind eye toward drug-running. It wrought havoc on the everyday lives of everyday people, all, supposedly, in the name of ridding the town of the Mafia. And in this case, it intentionally hid evidence that would have exonerated four men who were wrongly convicted in the 1965 murder of a petty thief.

Two of the men, including a World War II hero, died in prison. Two others, Salvati and Limone, were released a few years ago. Salvati has since lived a simple life filled with family and odd jobs and friends who have survived his ordeal.

To this day, the federal government has never offered a settlement. When the two sides met with Gertner earlier this year, the government lawyers said there would be no offer forthcoming.

Salvati and Limone are both in their 70s, and you get the sense the government would rather see them die than compensate them for their loss of freedom.

Contrast that to the government's handling of a case in Oregon, where a lawyer was wrongly implicated by the FBI in the 2004 Madrid terrorist bombings and jailed for two weeks. The Justice Department wrote him a $2 million check last month, accompanied by an apology.

If two weeks in jail are worth $2 million, then by my calculation, Salvati alone would be owed $1.6 billion. Makes you think the geniuses down in Washington should have rethought that stand about not settling.

What the FBI and the rest of the Justice Department are doing in this trial isn't just an embarrassment, but a disgrace -- and it will undoubtedly prove to be an expensive one at that.

2 Plead Guilty In Ski Resort Fire (NSDY/AP)

By Jeff Barnard, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

EUGENE, Ore. -- Two people who have admitted helping in the $12 million arson of a Vail, Colo., ski resort as part of an ecoterrorism campaign formally pleaded guilty Thursday to federal arson charges.

Chelsea Dawn Gerlach and Stanislas Gregory Meyerhoff, both 29, had already pleaded guilty to some of the $20 million worth of arsons committed between 1996 and 2001 by a Eugene-based cell of the Earth Liberation Front known as the Family. Under plea deals with federal prosecutors, they agreed to have charges from the 1998 Vail arson transferred from Colorado to Oregon to be settled along with their other cases.

Prosecutors have recommended a 10-year prison sentence for Gerlach, who is to be sentenced April 18, and 15 years and eight months for Meyerhoff, who has a sentencing hearing scheduled for April 10.

The Vail arson focused national attention on radical environmentalists who ascribed their attacks to the secretive Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, characterized by the FBI as the nation's top domestic terrorism threats. The investigation went nowhere for years until a task force found an informant who got old friends to talk about the crimes in recorded conversations.

Two others indicted in the Vail arson, Josephine Sunshine Overaker and Rebecca J. Rubin, remain at large.

The Vail arson was one of 20 fires in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado blamed by federal investigators on the Family. Twelve people -- 10 in Oregon and two in Washington -- have pleaded guilty in the cases, and others remain at large. The alleged leader of the group, William C. Rodgers, committed suicide in an Arizona jail in December 2005.

The lodge destroyed in Vail, about 100 miles west of Denver, has been rebuilt.

Shiite? Sunni? Some In US Learn Who's Who. (CSM)

By G. Jeffrey Macdonald

DOJ_NMG_0106692

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

Some in Congress may need a primer on Islamic extremists. Five years after 9/11, three members of the House Intelligence Committee in recent interviews couldn't answer basic questions about who's Sunni and who's Shiite in the Muslim world. But other American institutions are already boning up - especially when they have a stake in doing so. For example:

• Law-enforcement agencies, from the FBI to the New York Police Department are learning Muslim customs in attempts to do their jobs more effectively.

• Major hospitals, including one in Tampa, Fla., are training staff to honor Muslim beliefs about the body.

• Business groups are studying Islamic law in order to raise capital among Muslims, who aren't allowed to charge interest.

In general, Americans don't know much about Muslims, surveys show. The Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life found that the share of those saying they knew "not very much" or "nothing at all" about Islam actually grew from 61 percent in 2001 to 66 percent in 2005. In another 2005 Pew finding, 62 percent failed to identify Allah and the Koran as the terms Muslims use for God and sacred scripture.

Certain key sectors of US society also display a dangerous ignorance, Muslim advocates say. Topping the list this month is Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D) of Texas, the incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. In an interview with Congressional Quarterly last week, he could identify the historic Sunni-Shiite split but didn't know that Al Qaeda is Sunni or that Hizbullah, which fought Israel this summer in Lebanon, is Shiite.

GOP Reps. Jo Ann Davis and Terry Everett, also on the intelligence committee, fared worse when the Congressional Quarterly interviewed them last summer.

But even on Capitol Hill, there are pockets of hope, Muslim advocates say. Congressmen tend to know more about Islamic culture when their own futures depend on working well with Muslims.

"In areas where there are large Muslim populations, you tend to see that members of Congress are more in tune with the thinking of the Muslim community," says Corey Saylor, national legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a Muslim advocacy group in Washington. Among those with few Muslim constituents, he says, knowledge of Islamic culture is "better than it was five years ago, but we still have a long way to go."

That same trend shows up in other sectors of society. Where the stakes are high, Americans are doing their homework. FBI beefs up Muslim culture training

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, for instance, will emphasize Muslim culture when it expands introductory training for new agents from 18 to 21 weeks next month. In upcoming sessions, trainees will "drill down deeper" than they have in the past, for instance, into differences between radical Shiite cultures and radical Sunni ones, says Keith Slotter, assistant director of the FBI's training division. For the first time, new agent training will also cover dynamics surrounding suicide bombing.

"When a person from another culture says something, the meaning behind the words may not be the literal translation that an agent might want to jump to," Mr. Slotter says. "There are so many different nuances and aspects [that] to be an effective interviewer ... you're going to need those cultural skills."

Urban police are taking similar steps. About 100 members of the New York Police Department's hostage negotiating team, for instance, earlier this year spent a day learning to foster cooperation by honoring Muslim customs. For example, when entering a home, leave dogs outside and don't step on prayer rugs. In San Jose, Police Chief Rob Davis is a Mormon, but he has in the past fasted each day during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan in order to foster understanding and closer ties with Muslims in his city.

Sometimes, the passion for knowledge has proved fleeting. When the Houston Police Department first offered a monthly continuing education course on Muslim culture at a local mosque in 2003, every class was near capacity with about 30 officers in attendance. But the department discontinued the course last year because not enough officers were signing up. The sharp decline in numbers coincided with a department policy shift.

"We used to have classes on city time, but now that you have to go on your own time, the majority of officers don't want to take this class," says Muzaffar Siddiqi, the department's liaison to Muslims. They're taking other courses online because "they can just sit at home and do it."

Some business people are also trying to learn more. Earlier this year, managers at East Cameron Partners, an energy development firm in Houston, studied Islamic finance in order to raise funds in the Middle East for oil and gas exploration. The result was the first-ever US issue of sukuk, an Islamic bond that generates revenue from sales, profits, or leases rather than interest. In September, International Swaps and Derivatives Association in New York began studying Islamic law requirements in order to craft international standards for more cross-cultural deals. Focus on healthcare concerns

In healthcare, Tampa General Hospital has emphasized Muslim culture in its two-year-old diversity training program, which counts as continuing education for many of the hospital's 5,000 staffers. In March, Muslims will make their fourth presentation - more than any other group - to an expected crowd of about 150.

The education has had immediate on-the-job value for medical staff, according to the Rev. William Baugh, director of pastoral care at Tampa General. They now try to have women physicians visit Muslim female patients "because of the tremendous modesty," he says. And when a patient dies, nurses now accommodate family members who insist on taking the body to wash it.

Guards In Prison Sex Scandal Sentenced (WP/AP)

By David Royse, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- A former federal prison guard who admitted smuggling contraband to inmates for money and sex in a scandal that ended with a deadly shootout was sentenced to a year in prison Thursday.

The judge said he lightened Alfred Barnes' punishment in part because he cooperated with prosecutors in the case, which ensnared six guards at a women's prison.

One of them, Ralph Hill, was killed in a June 21 gunfight he started at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution when federal agents came to arrest them. One of the agents also was killed and a prison officer was wounded.

A second former guard sentenced Thursday, Vincent Johnson, shielded a federal agent who came under fire in the shootout, U.S. District Judge Robert Hinkle said.

Johnson, who was sentenced to a year of probation, was not accused of participating in the sex-for-contraband scheme but admitted coercing inmates to keep quiet about it.

Barnes, 43, of Thomasville, Ga., and Johnson, 40, of Tallahassee, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail fraud in September; the government dropped other charges.

Former guards Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore were convicted and are to be sentenced in January. E. Lavon Spence pleaded guilty but has had his sentencing delayed after suffering a stroke.

None of the surviving guards has been implicated in the shootout.

Murderer Of Witness Gets Life In Prison (PHI)

By Julie Shaw

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 15, 2006

Felix Summers - the reputed South Philadelphia drug dealer authorities say was at the center of a web of witness-retaliation and drug killings in his neighborhood - was sentenced yesterday to life in prison without parole.

Summers, 25, was convicted last month in the March 1999 shooting death of Charlotte Presley, 39, a witness against him in another homicide.

Just two months shy of his 18th birthday at the time of the crime, Summers was not eligible for the death penalty. In a ruling last year, the U.S. Supreme Court banned the execution of juvenile killers.

Yesterday, in a fairly empty courtroom, Common Pleas Court Judge Carolyn Engel Temin handed Summers the automatic life sentence on first-degree murder, topped by 30 to 60 months for witness retaliation.

Summers, a bearded, heavyset man, declined to make any statement.

An aunt, Phyllis Summers, 43, showed up shortly after the brief sentencing ended and said outside the courtroom as she wiped away tears: "I just want to say that he's not the monster people think he is."

DOJ_NMG_0106694

Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega said that the judge's additional sentence on the witness-retaliation charge "highlights the fact that this is not just a murder. It's a pretty horrible murder in that he killed a witness."

Earlier this week, Vega described Summers as the center of a "spider web" of people who were his associates or who were potential witnesses against him. Summers lived on the 500 block of Hoffman Street, near the scene of various killings on or near South Fifth.

The first two juries in the Presley murder case had deadlocked, resulting in mistrials.

Vega argued at last month's trial that Summers killed Presley because she was a witness against him in the Jan. 12, 1999, drive-by shooting death of John Niles, 19, at Fifth and Mifflin. Authorities have said the shooting was drug-related.

Presley had told police she saw Summers pull the trigger.

About 4 a.m. March 29, 1999, Summers, who enlisted the help of neighbor Diana Meirino, went to Presley's third-floor apartment on South Fifth, near Mifflin. When Presley came to the door, Summers shot her twice in the face. She died at the scene.

Summers' then-girlfriend, Sherrie Hewett, testified at last month's trial. Hewett, who is in the district attorney's witness relocation program, was in a minivan outside the apartment when the shooting occurred. She testified that Summers wanted to ask Presley why she was telling police that he shot someone.

Jack McMahon, Summers' defense attorney, argued that this was a case of mistaken identity and that Hewett was a scorned girlfriend.

At the Niles murder trial in 2000, Summers was acquitted. By then, Presley was dead, and another witness failed to show.

Summers was also charged in the Aug. 16, 2001, shooting death of Veronica Rios, 15, a bystander who was at Fifth and Pierce Streets with others when three men in a car came by. Two gunmen jumped out of the car and opened fire, killing Rios and injuring five people, including Joseph Mulhern, 18. Police have said the gunmen believed Mulhern, the intended target, was cooperating in a drug investigation.

A month later, Meirino, 22, was shot to death outside her South Fifth Street home. Police arrested Summers' cousin, Alvin Lawrence. Charges were later dropped after a key witness died of a drug overdose. Summers was not charged in that case.

Vega, however, while not implicating Summers, said this week that "he was the only person in all of Philadelphia who was to gain" from Meirino's death. Meirino was expected to testify against Summers in the killings of Presley and of Rios, which she had also witnessed.

The FBI added Summers to its 10 Most Wanted list after Rios' slaying.

At Summers and his codefendants' 2002 preliminary hearing in Rios' murder, Mulhern reluctantly testified. By the time the case went to trial two years later, Mulhern was dead. Summers and his two codefendants were acquitted.

Mulhern was killed after being shot multiple times in the chest on the 500 block of Sigel Street, near his home, at 11:23 p.m. Nov. 16, 2003, said Officer Beth Skala, a police spokeswoman. Two neighborhood men, Julio Esteves and Paul Luvice, were arrested, but were acquitted in an October trial.

Brian McMonagle, Esteves' defense lawyer, said he did not believe Mulhern's death was related to the 2001 shooting. He said his client and Luvice were acquitted because witnesses in the case were not credible.

Officials Say Man Arrested After Mixing Pills On Flight (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 15, 2006

Passenger held on a charge of interfering with a flight attendant

A 66-year-old man who was arrested after a disturbance aboard a Continental Airlines flight to Houston had mixed his medication during the trip, federal authorities said Thursday.

Noboru Akao, a Japanese citizen and U.S. permanent resident alien, also put his hand up a flight attendant's skirt and "made a mess" in a restroom after mixing his pills, U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy said as she read from a criminal complaint in a hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0106695

Federal prosecutor Michael Schultz declined to specify the medications in open court. Continental spokesman David Messing said he did not know whether Akao was served alcohol during the seven-hour flight from Honolulu.

Houston police arrested Akao on Wednesday morning and handed him over to the FBI after the flight arrived at George Bush Intercontinental Airport. He was charged with interfering with a flight attendant.

According to the complaint, Akao became "disruptive" and "combative" during the last 2 1/2 hours of the flight. He finally was restrained in plastic handcuffs and placed in a jump seat, away from other passengers.

Akao, who moved to the United States in 1986, communicated in court through his interpreter and frequently bowed toward the judge to indicate that he understood the proceedings.

If convicted, Akao faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. A hearing to review evidence and consider bail is scheduled for Monday.

Body In Mexican Park Had U.S.agents' Business Cards (HC/AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 15, 2006

EL PASO — Business cards of two U.S. law enforcement officials were found taped to the head of a man whose bloody body was dumped in a Mexican park last month, federal officials said today.

Mexican authorities said the unidentified victim's body was left in a popular park in Ciudad Juarez, across the Rio Grande, the afternoon of Nov. 23. He was found with a finger stuffed in his mouth, a traditional punishment dealt out by drug traffickers to informers.

Photographs of the victim published in today's edition of the Spanish-language newsapaper El Diario de El Paso, show one of the business cards is from Raul M. Bencomo, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent. Bencomo oversaw a controversial drug informant who led authorities to the bodies of about a dozen men buried in the yard of a Juarez house in 2004.

The second card, which is barely legible in the photos, is believed to be from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Officials with ICE and DEA said today that the agencies were notified about the discovery but do not have any role in investigating the killing.

"This matter is under investigation by Mexican authorities," ICE spokesman Carl Rusnok said in a written statement. "It would be inappropriate for ICE to comment out of respect for the integrity of the Mexican investigation. We have a strong relationship with our law enforcement counterparts and will assist if requested."

Chihuahua Attorney General Patricia Gonzalez told reporters today that her office sent photographs of the body to U.S. authorities in El Paso and requested their help in identifying him. It was unclear who sent the photos to the newspaper.

It also was unclear today what, if any, connection the killing has to Bencomo. His bloodied U.S. Department of Treasury-embossed card appears to be several years old. Treasury officials have not overseen immigration agents since ICE was formed under the Department of Homeland Security in 2003.

Bencomo's informant, Guillermo Ramirez Peyro, who also goes by "Lalo," has been accused of working for the Juarez drug cartel run by Vicente Carrillo Fuentes while he was being paid by U.S. authorities.

An El Paso lawyer for Bencomo, who is being sued by relatives of at least one of the victims found at the Juarez house, was not immediately available today.

Ramirez, who is being held on immigration charges, is in U.S. custody at an undisclosed location. A spokeswoman for the Executive Office of Immigration Review, which oversees immigration cases, said she could not discuss details of the case.

Jodi Goodwin, Ramirez's Harlingen lawyer, said Ramirez is fighting deportation and fears that he will be killed if he returns to Mexico.

Goodwin said today she did not know if the Nov. 23 killing had any connection to her client.

"I don't have any information to be able to make any kind of connection," Goodwin said.

Associated Press Writer Olga Rodriguez contributed to this report from Monterrey, Mexico.

Cyclist Indicted In Steroids Probe (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0106696

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

Filed at 11:11 p.m. ET

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Prosecutors sent a clear message Thursday to Barry Bonds and everyone else linked to the federal steroids investigation: lie to us, and we'll come after you.

Former world silver medalist cyclist Tammy Thomas, 36, was the latest sports figure and first athlete to be indicted for hindering the 3-year-old grand jury probe. She faces three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice.

Thomas was ordered to appear in court Jan. 5. Each count carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

She did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

Kevin Ryan, the U.S. attorney for Northern California, said Thursday's indictment, along with last month's obstruction of justice charges against track coach Trevor Graham, marks a new phase in the BALCO investigation.

"A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury," he said.

The first stage, Ryan said, netted guilty pleas from Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative founder Victor Conte, BALCO vice president James Valente and track coach Remi Korchemny. Also convicted was Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer, who served three months and is back in prison for refusing to testify against Bonds.

Authorities suspect Bonds, like Thomas, lied to the 2003 grand jury when he said he never knowingly used steroids. An investigation of the San Francisco Giants slugger for perjury and possible tax-evasion charges is ongoing.

"On one level, the agents on the BALCO case and the U.S. Attorney's office were unfairly attacked for targeting only certain high-profile people," said Travis Tygart, general counsel for the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. "Now, it appears obvious the only targets in the investigation were those who broke the law, and justice will be served on those who violated it regardless of their fame and notoriety."

The second stage involved the conviction of Patrick Arnold, the Illinois chemist who created the banned substances distributed by BALCO, Ryan said.

Thomas was banned for life in August 2002 after the performance-enhancing drug norbolethone, an obscure and previously undetectable steroid, was found in her urine.

"That was the first proof that there were these designer drugs out there," said Don Catlin, director of the UCLA Olympic doping lab. "It told me that there would be others coming."

Norbolethone originally was tested by Wyeth Laboratories in human trials during the 1960s as a potential treatment to help severely short people grow and for conditions causing weight loss. The company abandoned development of the steroid in the early 1970s, and it never was marketed.

It languished in obscurity until Arnold dusted off Wyeth's recipe and made new batches to boost athletic performance.

USADA didn't test for the steroid until Catlin determined Thomas had used it. This likely was the prelude to THG, the designer drug created by Arnold at the heart of the BALCO investigation.

Thomas' indictment adds cycling, a sport often associated with doping, to a probe that already has exposed steroid use in professional baseball, football and track and field.

The Yazoo City, Miss. native, was a silver medalist in individual sprint at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships. Thomas always has maintained her innocence and said the results might have been triggered by contraceptives she was using.

The indictment accuses Thomas of lying when she told the grand jury in October 2003 that she never used performance-enhancing drugs. She also is said to have lied when she testified that she did not get illegal drugs from Arnold, who currently is serving a three-month sentence in a West Virginia federal prison.

Thomas was granted immunity from prosecution if she told the truth, according to the indictment.

She was subpoenaed to testify after agents raided the BALCO laboratory and allegedly found evidence linking her to steroid use.

DOJ_NMG_0106697

Graham, a coach for track stars Marion Jones, Justin Gatlin and Tim Montgomery, was indicted last month for allegedly lying when he said he did not distribute steroids to his athletes or tell them where they could be obtained. He has pleaded not guilty.

Darryl Seibel, a spokesman for the U.S. Olympic Committee, declined to comment on the specifics of the Thomas indictment.

"We have continually stressed the need to bring more resources to bear in order to eliminate doping from every segment of sport," he said. "This is a national issue, and nothing less than an aggressive, sustained effort with significant leadership from the U.S. government will solve the problem."

AP Sports Writer Eddie Pells contributed to this report

Cyclist Indicted In BALCO Steroid Scandal (SFC)

By Lance Williams And Mark Fainaru-wada, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, December 15, 2006

(12-14) 12:51 PST -- A former world-class cyclist who was caught up in the BALCO steroid scandal was indicted Thursday on charges of lying to a federal grand jury about her use of banned drugs.

Tammy Thomas, who won the silver medal at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships, was charged with perjury and obstruction of justice in connection with her Oct. 30, 2003 testimony before the grand jury that was investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative sports doping case.

In 2002, Thomas was banned from cycling for life after she tested positive for a little-known steroid promoted by an Illinois chemist associated with BALCO.

But the indictment states that the following year, before the BALCO grand jury, Thomas denied under oath that she had ever obtained banned drugs from the chemist, Patrick Arnold, who himself pleaded guilty to steroid conspiracy charges earlier this year.

Thomas also testified that she had never taken steroids and had never obtained steroids from anyone, according to the indictment.

All the statements were lies, according to the indictment, which was handed up by a grand jury in San Francisco.

A perjury conviction carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison.

Thomas is the second sports figure to be accused of lying in the BALCO probe. Last month, track coach Trevor Graham, who has coached Olympic superstars Marion Jones and Justin Gatlin, was accused of making false statements to BALCO investigators when he told them he had never distributed banned drugs to athletes. Graham pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial.

In addition, Giants outfielder Barry Bonds is under investigation for lying to the BALCO grand jury, according to informed sources and to remarks a judge has made in court. Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, has been imprisoned for contempt of court because he refused to testify before a grand jury investigating Bonds.

Thomas, 36, who is thought to live in Michigan, could not be reached for comment.

Thomas is a muscular woman with a husky voice and facial hair. She once told a reporter that people often mistook her for a man, and her cycling career was marred by doping allegations.

In 2000, she was suspended for a year after testing positive for elevated testosterone levels. She claimed she was innocent, and, acting as her own lawyer, sued Dr. Don Catlin, director of the sports doping laboratory at the University of California-Los Angeles, claiming her urine sample had been mishandled there. The lawsuit was dismissed.

In 2002, Thomas was caught using the steroid norbolethone, a drug that had been developed by Wyeth Laboratories in the 1960s for medical purposes but never marketed. Arnold had learned of the drug from an old pharmacology textbook and distributed it to athletes and to BALCO founder Victor Conte as an undetectable steroid, court records show.

Arnold presumed that authorities would be unable to detect the use of the drug because it was unknown to modern science. But Catlin's laboratory found it in Thomas' blood sample, and she was banned from cycling for life.

DOJ_NMG_0106698

On Oct. 30, 2003, the indictment says, Thomas testified that the only product she had ever gotten from Arnold was a legal nutritional supplement. She was asked three times if she had used steroids, and each time she said no, the indictment charges.

Conte, Anderson and two other men pleaded guilty in the BALCO steroids conspiracy case last year.

E-mail the writers at lwilliams@sfchronicle.com and mfainaru-wada@sfchronicle.com.

Former American Cyclist Indicted As Balco Inquiry Takes New Step (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

The federal grand jury investigating steroid use in sports yesterday indicted a former cyclist, Tammy Thomas, for perjury and obstruction of justice, charging that she lied to another grand jury looking into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroids case.

Thomas received a lifetime competition ban in 2002 from the United States Anti-Doping Agency after she tested positive for the previously undetectable steroid norbolethone.

Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney for the Northern District of California, said in a written statement that the charges were part of a new stage of the case targeting people that federal investigators believe lied to them or to the grand jury during the three-year investigation into Balco.

That category includes Barry Bonds, who is still under investigation for suspicion of perjury during his grand jury testimony; Trevor Graham, the track coach, who was indicted last month for allegedly making false statements to investigators; and others.

Graham, who had sparked the Balco investigation by sending a syringe to investigators, has pleaded not guilty and is free on bond. The syringe contained a previously undetectable steroid known as THG, or the clear.

Michael L. Rains, Bonds's criminal defense lawyer, said yesterday that he did not know what the indictment of Thomas might mean for Bonds. "I don't think it's bad news for Barry at all," Rains said, "but keep in mind Greg Anderson continues to reside over in federal prison in Dublin, and they may be waiting to see if he has a nervous breakdown or something and talks."

Anderson, Bonds's childhood friend and former trainer, has defied court orders to testify to the Balco grand jury about Bonds. Anderson was sent to jail for contempt of court, and will be asked again to testify.

Thomas, a world champion cyclist, testified to a grand jury in 2003 that she had never taken performance-enhancing drugs or received them from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who worked with Balco in Burlingame, Calif.

Thomas's failed drug test that led to her lifetime suspension was her second doping offense.

She did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

Ryan said in his statement that the federal investigation has "generally unfolded in three distinct stages."

"In the early stages of the investigation, the individuals who distributed steroids to some of the nation's top-flight athletes were indicted and convicted," he said. "In the second stage, we developed the evidence to indict and convict the creator of the undetectable steroid THG distributed through Balco.

"A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury. Our investigation into each of these stages will continue as the evidence develops."

Cyclist Cited For Perjury (NYDN)

By Michael O'keeffe, Daily News Sports Writer

New York Daily News, December 15, 2006

A federal prosecutor sent a strong warning to Barry Bonds and other elite athletes yesterday after former cyclist Tammy Thomas was indicted for hindering the BALCO investigation: If we can prove you lied, you will be prosecuted.

Thomas faces three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice for allegedly giving false testimony while under oath to the BALCO grand jury.

"Perjury undermines the fundamental mission of our investigative and judicial processes - to uncover the truth," U.S. Attorney for Northern California Kevin Ryan said in a statement. "Lying under oath to a grand jury must be vigorously prosecuted or else this essential truth-finding mission is significantly undermined."

DOJ_NMG_0106699

The indictment accuses Thomas of lying when she told the grand jury in 2003 that she never used performance-enhancing drugs. It also said she lied when she said she did not receive illegal drugs from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who created the once-undetectable steroid THG. Each charge carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Bonds is the focus of an ongoing perjury and tax-evasion investigation, but that probe has apparently stalled because trainer Greg Anderson chose to go to prison rather than testify against the San Francisco slugger. The Thomas indictment, along with obstruction charges brought against track coach Trevor Graham, make it clear that prosecutors won't give up easy.

"The investigation into doping in sports has generally unfolded in three distinct stages....A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury," Ryan said.

The first stage targeted steroid distributors, including Anderson and BALCO founder Victor Conte. The second stage, according to Ryan, focused on Arnold, who created the banned substances distributed by BALCO.

Thomas was banned from competition in August 2002 after norbolethone, a designer drug formulated to evade detection, was found in her urine. Norbolethone was originally tested by Wyeth Laboratories as a potential treatment to help severely short people grow. It languished in obscurity until Arnold dusted off Wyeth's recipe and made new batches to boost athletic performance.

The U.S. Anti-Doping Agency wasn't testing for the steroid until the UCLA Olympic drug testing laboratory determined Thomas had used the once-obscure steroid. The lab also uncovered THG, the designer drug created by Arnold at the heart of the BALCO investigation.

Thomas was a silver medalist in individual sprint at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships, but her attempts to make the 2000 U.S. Olympic team ended because of high testosterone levels. She said the results were triggered by contraceptives and has always maintained her innocence.

The Associated Press contributed to this report

Cyclist Faces Perjury Charge In Balco Probe (MERCN)

By Elliott Almond

The San Jose Mercury News, December 15, 2006

Perhaps Barry Bonds should be more concerned about facing a perjury charge than major league pitching next season.

A turn of events Thursday in the Balco Laboratory case sent a chilling message to athletes connected to the inquiry: Anyone who allegedly lied to a federal grand jury investigating the use of drugs in sports could find themselves in a legal bind.

Former world-class cyclist Tammy Thomas, now a law student in Michigan, became the first athlete indicted in the Balco scandal when she was charged Thursday with three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice. She faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

"A third stage has begun," U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan said in a statement.

Thomas, who was banned for life in 2002 after testing positive for the steroid norbolethone, didn't immediately return calls or e-mails. She has denied using illegal drugs in past interviews with the Mercury News.

The action in the 4 1/2-year-old case is not expected to be the government's last.

"If this is phase three, why not indict Barry?" Bonds' attorney Michael Rains said Thursday. "The simple answer -- they need the testimony of Greg Anderson."

Bonds' trainer, who pleaded guilty to distributing steroids and laundering money, is in prison on a contempt charge because he has refused to testify against the Giants slugger.

Bonds, 42, is being investigated for lying under oath in 2003 when he testified that he believed the substances he took were flaxseed oil and an arthritis balm. Prosecutors believe those substances were "the clear" and "the cream," performance-enhancing drugs distributed by Balco.

Investigators confiscated calendars and ledgers allegedly showing drug schedules and payments for Bonds and other baseball players from Anderson's home.

DOJ_NMG_0106700

"Barry maintains he told the grand jury the truth to the extent that he knows the truth," Rains said. "They hit him with documents he had never seen before."

Bonds could also face charges for failing to report tens of thousands of dollars in income from the sale of memorabilia. Rains dismissed the possibility, saying the government's evidence is weak.

Another possible target for perjury is Marion Jones, an Olympic gold-medal sprinter who also testified in 2003. If she denied using performance-enhancing drugs, Jones might have a problem because her ex-husband, C.J. Hunter, said under oath that he gave the sprinter banned drugs and saw Jones inject herself.

At least two other grand jury witnesses who worked with her former coach, Trevor Graham, have testified in the case. Also, Balco mastermind Victor Conte Jr. has said in interviews with the Mercury News and others that he supplied Jones with performance-enhancing drugs. Jones repeatedly has denied all allegations.

Graham, Jones' coach when she won five medals at the 2000 Olympics, was charged last month for giving false statements to Balco investigators. He has pleaded not guilty.

Former Cyclist Charged With Hindering Steroid Probe (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Bob Bensch

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Tammy Thomas, a cyclist banned from the sport for using performance-enhancing drugs, was charged with hindering a federal investigation into steroid use by athletes. She is the first athlete indicted in the probe.

Thomas, 36, a silver medalist at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships, was indicted on three counts of perjury and one of obstruction of justice, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco said today in a statement. Prosecutors said she gave false testimony to a grand jury.

Thomas declined to comment when reached by phone at her home in Lansing, Michigan.

Thomas was banned for life from competitive cycling by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency in 2002 after testing positive for the steroid norbolethone. It was the second time she failed a drug test. She tested positive for elevated testosterone at the 2000 U.S. Olympic Trials.

Thomas is accused in the indictment of lying when she told a grand jury in 2003 she never took performance-enhancing drugs. She also said she never received illegal drugs from Patrick Arnold, a chemist who pleaded guilty in April to making and distributing the steroid tetrahydrogestrinone, or THG, and supplying it to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or Balco, the California lab at the center of the investigation, the indictment said.

Indictments

Grand juries in the investigation also indicted Balco's co-founders, two track coach and a trainer for baseball All-Star Barry Bonds. The panel has heard testimony regarding steroid use from Bonds and other athletes, including baseball's Jason Giambi, without returning charges against them.

Thomas was ordered to appear in court Jan. 5. Each perjury count carries a maximum five-year prison sentence and a $250,000 fine. Obstruction is punishable by a 10-year sentence and a $250,000 fine.

Thomas was second in the sprint competition at the 2001 World Championships and was ranked second in the world in the event at the time of her suspension.

The case is U.S. v. Thomas 06-0803, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California (San Francisco).

33 Indicted On Drug Ring Charges Tying City, Suburbs (MJS)

By David Doege

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 15, 2006

Waukesha's main line shut down, officials say

In a case authorities say demonstrates the growing ties between urban and suburban drug traffickers, a federal grand jury indicted 33 people Thursday on charges linking large-scale cocaine suppliers in Milwaukee to a tightly controlled network of dealers in Waukesha.

DOJ_NMG_0106701

The indictments and arrests, officials say, dried up the primary source of cocaine in the city of Waukesha while taking a handful of large-scale operators off the streets of Milwaukee.

"This is going to go down as the largest, most significant drug investigation in the history of our county," said Waukesha County Sheriff Daniel Trawicki.

The charges result from a lengthy probe begun quietly in January 2004 by Waukesha County narcotics investigators whose work revealed that a single network of people was responsible for a large share of the cocaine finding its way into Waukesha.

"The buys we were making, the information we were getting kept leading us back to a particular group of people, a particular group of residences," said Lt. Charles Wood, operational supervisor of the Waukesha County Metro Drug Enforcement Group.

After state and federal agencies joined the inquiry, which featured court-approved telephone taps, investigators linked the cocaine peddled in Waukesha to large-scale suppliers in Milwaukee.

"This was an investigation that was not going to just stay in Waukesha," said Daniel Layber, special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the state Division of Criminal Investigation. "It used to be that the drug dealers that you saw in Waukesha were relatively small. It sure isn't that way anymore." Phone calls monitored

Court records show that while the major players were constantly watching their backs and taking steps to insulate themselves from the drugs, money and drug deals carried out by underlings, investigators were secretly monitoring their conversations to keep abreast of their activities while learning of more associates.

"During the court-ordered monitoring of these communications between July 11, 2006, and September 8, 2006, over 1,000 intercepted calls were drug-related," according to a criminal complaint in the case. "Over 50 people involved in trafficking cocaine were identified."

One conversation took place Aug. 11, according to the complaint, when investigators listened as Javier Aguilera, accused of being a major marijuana and cocaine trafficker in Waukesha, told his father, accused of delivering drugs and collecting drug debts for his son as well as himself, where to find cocaine and money hidden in the their Arcadian Ave. home.

"I have it there in the house, in your room," Javier Aguilera told Brijido Aguilera, according to the complaint. "You know, there's a small box in the room where the mirror is.

"I tossed it in there. I don't know if Mom puts her gold in there or what, but I left your earnings in there, too."

In another conversation, according to the complaint, investigators listened as the father complained to the son about his methods during a discussion on what to do with a 10-pound marijuana shipment.

"Listen, I've been calling you for some time, but you don't answer the damn telephone," the elder Aguilera said. "I can't work like that."

After the son told his father to stow the marijuana in the garage until he arrived, the elder Aguilera said, "It's there in the same place, but one thing, don't speak to me in that tone of voice."

As investigators went from phone to phone, the conversations they heard eventually led them to figures in Milwaukee who supplied buyers with kilograms of cocaine.

"I got the buns," Teodoro Meraz told Andrew Oblak during a conversation Oct. 6, after Meraz received a shipment of cocaine and was offering to sell a kilogram - or a bun - to Oblak.

In addition to charging suspected high-, mid- and street-level dealers, the indictment included people accused of packaging and cutting cocaine, and a woman accused of storing it.

On July 31, Javier Aguilera called Kayla Lapp just after she had ordered dinner at a restaurant with her mother; he told her that he needed her to meet him immediately at her Waukesha home so that he could retrieve cocaine from his stash there for an impending deal, according to the complaint.

"Why can't you just wait 'til we're done eating?" Lapp said, according to the complaint.

"Because I need it now," Aguilera replied, the complaint says. "Because it's cash."

Charged in the indictment and complaint with supplying kilograms of cocaine were: Meraz, 27, of St. Francis; Gabriel Urbina, 29, of Milwaukee; Antonio Cruz, 56, of Milwaukee; Oblak, 20, of Milwaukee; Richard Welsh, 18, of Milwaukee; and Ana Hurtado, 37, of Milwaukee.

DOJ_NMG_0106702

Javier Aguilera, 29, was charged in the complaint with being at the top of the Waukesha network, directing his father, 51, and others who distributed multiple-ounce quantities of cocaine to street-level dealers.

The others charged in the case include: Pedro Romo, 27; Alejandro Romo, 21; Fidel Moreno, 21; Jose Meraz, 31; Federico A. Meza, 27; Leonardo Urbina, 30; Elias Perez, 22; Michael V. Popp, 23; Wagas Tariq, 23; Usman Tariq, 22; Jeffrey Scott Wingert, 34; Enrique Urbina, 23; Jose R. Quinonez, 25; Miguel A. Valdez, 29; Christian Gabriel Martinez, 21; Miguel Healy, 34; Jose Godina, 29; Sal Uribe, 27; Juan Carlos Flores-Bobadillia, 20; Rick J. Rivera, 27; Francisco R. Aguilera, 23; Sean D. Kruschke, 30; Jonathan David Colla, 23; Jose Alfredo Aguilera, 21; and Lapp, 19. The complaint did not list their hometowns.

"I think that you can determine the significance of this case by the number of people arrested and the scope of their activity," said James Bohn, assistant special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Search warrants were executed recently at a home in St. Francis, three homes in Milwaukee and five homes in Waukesha, court records say.

"As a result of the search warrants, we're holding 11 cars that we're hoping to seize," said Wood, of the Waukesha County Metro Drug Enforcement Group. "We also seized 2 kilos of cocaine, cash and three residences that we expect will become the subject of forfeiture proceedings."

Five From Hazleton, Freeland Indicted On Heroin Conspiracy Charges (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), December 15, 2006

Five people from Hazleton and Freeland were indicted last week in connection with an alleged heroin distribution conspiracy that operated in the Hazleton area since January, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced today.

Thomas A. Marino, U.S. Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, said the following suspects were charged with conspiracy to distribute more than 100 grams of heroin:

• Anthony Rish, 55, of Freeland
• Sheryl Raab, 46, of Freeland
• Margaret Grohman, 51, of Hazleton
• Anthony Mundo, 36, of Freeland
• Michael Bonney, 27, of Hazleton

Marino said the defendants were also charged with additional counts of distribution of heroin – Rish with four counts, Raab with three counts, Grohman with seven counts, Mundo with six counts, and Bonney with one count.

The charges stem from an investigation by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and Pennsylvania State Police.

Marino said each of the defendants faces a sentence of five to 40 years in prison, a fine of up to $2 million, and a period of supervised release of four years to life to follow any sentence of imprisonment if convicted of the conspiracy charge.

Each count of distribution of heroin carries a potential maximum sentence of 20 years in prison, a $1 million fine and at least three years of supervised release, he said.

Marino said Assistant U.S. District Attorney Francis P. Sempa is prosecuting the case.

Marijuana Co-op Duo Out On Bail (CCT)

By Josh Richman

The Contra Costa Times, December 15, 2006

OAKLAND - Two people arrested in a raid at a Hayward medical marijuana cooperative were selling the drug to anyone, not just people with medical conditions, the federal government contends.

The attorney for Hayward residents Shon Matthew Squier, 34, and Valerie Lynn Herschel, 23, the Local Patients Cooperative owner and manager, respectively, says the two were working legally with Hayward and the Alameda County Sheriff's Office.

Agents arrested the two Tuesday on suspicion of conspiracy, marijuana distribution and maintaining drug-involved premises. Drug Enforcement Administration and Internal Revenue Service agents raided the Foothill Boulevard cooperative and each suspect's home.

DOJ_NMG_0106703

Federal Magistrate Judge Wayne Brazil told them Wednesday that each of the crimes is punishable by as many as 20 years in prison and involve maximum fines of $500,000 to $1 million.

Brazil ordered Squier freed on $300,000 bond and Herschel freed on $100,000 bond, each secured by their homes. Both are due back in court Jan. 5.

Brazil warned Squier and Herschel, 23, that although there's a debate over the conflict between the state's medical marijuana law and the federal ban, "those debates unfortunately are irrelevant to what goes on in this court" and state law provides them no defense. "Congress gets to decide," he said.

Until their properties can be assessed and posted to secure their freedom, their families have signed promises to pay should either defendant leave town. Herschel's parents and Squier's fiancee and sister were in court Wednesday.

After Wednesday's hearing, defense attorney Bruce Atwater noted that IRS agents took part in Tuesday's raid and that prosecutors are emphasizing the money that flowed through Squier's account. Atwater said he believes tax charges will figure prominently when a federal grand jury indicts the two next month. He called it a "backdoor way" for the federal government to persecute medical marijuana providers.

Squier and Herschel "worked well with the city; they worked well with the Alameda County Sheriff's (Office). ... They were compliant with state law," Atwater said. "I guess their crime is that they made too much money."

In an affidavit, DEA Special Agent Kenny Lee wrote: "I believe that Hayward Local Patients Co-op attempts to disguise the breadth of its criminal activity by claiming that it caters exclusively to persons suffering from medical illnesses, when in fact persons without any medical condition can purchase marijuana ... at the retail establishment."

Reach Josh Richman of the Oakland Tribune at jrichman@angnewspapers.com or 510-208-6428.

IMMIGRATION:

The System Is The Problem (WP)

By Tamar Jacoby

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

At dawn on Tuesday more than a thousand Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents descended on six plants owned by Swift & Co., one of the country's largest meat processors. Some 1,300 workers were arrested, and operations at all six slaughterhouses were suspended.

Seen in one light, the raids were perfectly justified. Both employer and employees were breaking the law. It's a law that's being violated on a massive scale from coast to coast, and the public is increasingly upset about it.

The only catch: Swift has been trying for years to comply with our poorly conceived immigration laws, coping as best it could with an impossible situation. Like a driver who finally goes through a broken traffic light, the company and its workers aren't the problem -- the system is.

Both Swift and its employees -- who bore the brunt of the punishment -- are caught in an economic bind far bigger than themselves. Meat processing is dirty and dangerous. Fewer and fewer members of the increasingly educated American workforce are interested in the jobs.

As a result, although it now pays an average of $13 an hour, or $25,000 a year, the industry increasingly relies on foreign workers, not because they're cheap -- $25,000 a year is what trained paramedics and college-educated kindergarten teachers make in meatpacking states such as Iowa and Kansas -- but simply because they'll do the work. If immigrants weren't available, companies such as Swift would have to close, and both meatpacking and the agriculture that depends on it -- cattle and hog producers -- would eventually move to other countries.

Not only that, but U.S. law makes the bind much worse for both employers and employees. Despite the meatpacking industry's well-known need for foreign labor, the United States offers virtually no way for these workers to enter the country legally. Every year the economy as a whole creates some 500,000 more unskilled jobs than Americans want to do, yet we issue only 5,000 year-round visas for the immigrants who might fill them. For companies such as Swift and its workers, there's no good answer, and it's not surprising that many break the law.

DOJ_NMG_0106704

But even that isn't the end of the cruel twists of Swift's story. Far from ignoring or shrugging off the law, the firm has been trying to comply with it. When job applicants started showing up with what the company suspected were false papers, it tried inquiring into their backgrounds -- only to be sued for discrimination by the Justice Department.

When the government created a program meant to help employers verify that their workers were in the country legally by checking Social Security numbers against a central database, Swift was among the first to sign up. And when that program didn't seem to be catching the worst offenders -- people using not false Social Security cards but stolen ones -- Swift came to Washington to testify in Congress about the problem. The reward: That was precisely the offense that ICE raided the company for on Tuesday.

Don't misunderstand: Swift is no band of saints. Everyone involved -- the company, its workers, the U.S. government -- knows that the kind of compliance required to pass muster today is a charade. But it is a charade our dysfunctional immigration system has all but forced the firm and its workers to play.

Does this mean it's all right to break the law? Of course not.

Our nudge-nudge, wink-wink immigration system -- unrealistic laws, all but ignored on the ground -- must be replaced by a law enforcement regime that works: more honest quotas, enforced to the letter, including in the workplace. Raids such as those that took place this week would be justified in the context of an immigration overhaul of the kind proposed by the president and passed by the Senate last spring. Workers need a legal way to enter the country. Businesses need a legitimate way to get workers, plus a reliable verification system -- not unlike credit card verification -- to tell them which workers are legal and which aren't. And once these things are in place, there will be no excuse for breaking the rules.

But until then, raids of the kind that occurred this week can only be counterproductive: Companies trying to do the right thing will be driven out of business, even as those happy to flout the law will find themselves with more of a competitive advantage. And meanwhile illegal workers will be driven further underground.

I happened to be with a group of employers when the Swift raids were announced -- not food-processing companies but contractors, landscapers, growers and others who also count on unskilled workers -- brought together by their growing anger at the broken immigration system and the lies it makes them tell.

"What am I supposed to do?" one employer asked bitterly. "I'm paying $22.50 an hour. I still can't find enough workers. I'm making less and less money as a result -- I've stopped bidding for lots of jobs. And I could go to jail just for trying to get the work done."

And the sad truth is, he can't do much. Only Congress can fix the system he and his workers are trapped in. As the Swift raids remind us, it's a job that cannot wait.

Tamar Jacoby is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute.

Texas Official's Report Ignites A New Border Conflict (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

It is a Texas showdown, a war of words over illegal immigration at the border.

State Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn fired the first shot with a recent report that, for some, says the unthinkable: Illegal immigrants not only pay their fair share in taxes, but they are also good for the economy.

"The absence of 1.4 million undocumented immigrants in Texas . . .would have been a loss to our gross state product of $17.7 billion," Strayhorn said in a statement. Overall, the report said, illegal immigrants put about $420 million more into state coffers than they take out.

Strayhorn billed the report as the first ever by a state finance official, a crucial step forward. But for Texans who believe hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants are overrunning their state, the report is a misstep.

State Rep. Leo Berman (R-Tyler), who introduced legislation that would bar Texas from recognizing children born to illegal immigrants in American hospitals as U.S. citizens, called the report "outrageous."

Dan Stein, a spokesman for the Washington-based Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), which supports measures to deter illegal immigration, ripped the report as a composite of "design flaws, assumptions and conclusions in direct contrast to our years of exhaustive studies on this issue, and to our most recent Texas report, which shows illegal aliens cost Texas taxpayers $3.7 billion annually."

DOJ_NMG_0106705

In these times of tough proposals against illegal immigration in Congress and huge protest marches by illegal immigrant workers and their supporters, it is not surprising that the comptroller's report caused a stir.

An official state document that contradicts the idea that immigrants are a financial burden can carry considerable weight as Democrats take control of Congress, and as potential candidates consider their options in the 2008 presidential election.

Supporters of illegal immigrants embraced the report. John TrasviÃ±a, president of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, said it "confirms what MALDEF and immigration experts have long known -- we all benefit from the contributions of immigrants."

The Texas study may be the first by a state, but it is hardly the first of its kind. Previous studies on the financial impact of illegal immigrants have been undertaken by a number of groups, including the nonpartisan Urban Institute and the Center for Immigration Studies.

Undocumented workers in the Washington area, according to the Urban Institute, pay a hefty share of taxes, but they contribute less than they should because many are paid off the books and do not file yearly tax forms. A report by the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors reduced immigration, said that illegal-immigrant households imposed $26 billion in costs on the federal government while paying $16 billion in taxes. This week, Immigration and Customs Enforcement authorities raided meatpacking plants in six states in search of illegal immigrants they said were using illegally obtained Social Security numbers.

Early in the year, the House tried to crack down on the immigration problem with a tough proposal that would have turned about 12 million illegal immigrants in the country into instant felons.

Opponents said they went too far, and millions of illegal immigrants and their supporters marched in Dallas, Los Angeles, Chicago, Washington, Phoenix and other cities.

That is the environment that Strayhorn stepped into with her report and its bold introduction: "The Comptroller's report estimates that undocumented immigrants in Texas generate more taxes and other revenue than the state spends on them."

Drawing on estimates from a report by the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington, the report said 1.4 million to 1.6 million illegal immigrants live in Texas, about 14 percent of the U.S. total.

Texas has no state income tax, so immigrants pay sales and property taxes, along with various state fees. "Undocumented immigrants produced $1.58 billion in state revenues, which exceeded the $1.16 billion in state services they received," Strayhorn reported.

Strayhorn, an unsuccessful candidate for governor in the last election, favors a guest-worker program, prompting criticism from opponents who say her report was motivated by politics.

FAIR said the report plays down the impact of illegal immigration by not counting the children of illegal immigrants who had become U.S. citizens. In a previous report, FAIR estimated that Texas schools paid more than $1.7 billion to educate illegal immigrants and the legal children of illegal immigrants in 2003-2004.

"This report is a slap in the face to anyone with common sense," Stein said.

Berman deferred to more conservative reports, such as one from the Lone Star Foundation in Austin. It says illegal immigrants drain $4.5 billion from the Texas economy, mostly in health-care costs.

"Parkland Hospital in Dallas, and the public hospital in Houston, has a 70 percent birth rate from illegal aliens," Berman said.

TrasviÃ±a of MALDEF said he hopes Strayhorn's report will compel other politicians to "reject divisive legislation" by Berman and others "aimed at forcing undocumented immigrants further into the shadows."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Sen. Johnson 'Recovering' After Surgery (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick And Tom Raum

AP, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106706

Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition but was described as recovering and holding his wife's hand Thursday after emergency overnight surgery to repair bleeding inside his brain.

His sudden illness had raised questions over whether the Democrats would hold their newly won slim control of the Senate.

The South Dakota lawmaker, 59, was on "an uncomplicated postoperative course," the U.S. Capitol physician said after visiting him Thursday afternoon. Johnson suffered a hemorrhage in his brain caused by a rare and sometimes fatal condition.

"He has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required," said the physician, Adm. John Eisold. He had said earlier, "The senator is recovering without complication."

Johnson was responding to the voice of his wife, Barbara, and following directions after the surgery, the senator's office said in a statement. "He was reaching for and holding her hand."

Johnson was stricken as Democrats prepared to take fragile 51-49 control of the new Senate when it convenes in three weeks. Democrats seized control of both chambers of Congress from Republicans in November midterm elections.

If Johnson were to leave office, a replacement would be named by South Dakota's Republican governor, Mike Rounds. A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 tie and effectively allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Johnson was rushed to the George Washington University Hospital at midday Wednesday after becoming disoriented and stammering during a conference call with reporters.

Eisold, the Capitol physician, said doctors stopped bleeding in Johnson's brain and drained the blood that had accumulated there. "It is premature to determine whether further surgery will be required or to assess any long-term prognosis," Eisold said.

On Thursday afternoon, Johnson underwent an additional procedure to prevent blood clots. The procedure is standard after surgery, said Julianne Fisher, Johnson's spokeswoman. Otherwise, she said, there were no new developments. "No news is good news," she said.

Johnson's condition, also known as AVM, or arteriovenous malformation, causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst. The condition is often present from birth.

Johnson spokesman Noah Pinegar said the senator's diagnosis was a surprise. "No one was aware of it, including Tim," he said.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who is to become majority leader when the new Senate convenes on Jan. 4, said, "We're all praying for a full recovery. We're confident that will be the case."

Reid, who visited Johnson at the hospital Wednesday night and again Thursday morning, told reporters the senator "really looks good." However, Reid declined to provide any details of Johnson's medical condition.

Politically, "there isn't a thing that's changed," he said, adding that he was keeping incoming Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky "totally advised" of developments.

Outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., visited the hospital Thursday afternoon.

Senate historian Donald Ritchie said senators serve out their terms unless they resign or die. He said there was precedent for senators remaining in the Senate even though illness kept them away from the chamber for long periods.

Just this year, Sen. Jay Rockefeller, a West Virginia Democrat, missed three months of votes because of back surgery. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., was away for seven months in 1988 after undergoing surgery for brain aneurysms.

In 1969, another South Dakota senator, Karl Mundt, a Republican, suffered a stroke while in office. Mundt continued to serve until the end of his term in January 1973, although he was unable to attend Senate sessions and was stripped of his committee assignments by fellow Republicans in 1972.

The White House offered best wishes.

"Our prayers are with Senator Johnson," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "Look, he's a great guy, and it's one of these things where everybody's concerned and our thoughts and prayers are with him, his family, his staff, his colleagues."

Johnson, who turns 60 in two weeks, was taken to the hospital by ambulance after experiencing what his office initially said was a possible stroke.

DOJ_NMG_0106707

In a conference call with reporters, Johnson at first had answered questions normally but then had begun to stutter. He paused, then continued stammering before appearing to recover and ending the call.

Johnson spokeswoman Fisher said that after making the call from the recording studio in the basement of the Capitol, the senator walked back to his office but appeared to not be feeling well.

The Capitol physician came to his office and examined him, and it was decided he should go to the hospital.

Arteriovenous malformation is believed to affect about 300,000 Americans, according to the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke. The institute's Web site said only about 12 percent of those have any symptoms. The symptoms, which range in severity, can include severe headaches, memory loss and dizziness.

It's common to take several days for someone to wake up after AVM surgery, said Dr. Sean Grady, neurosurgery chairman at the Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania. Someone who is awake and alert and talking in the first day or two typically has a shorter recovery — in the range of 4 to 8 weeks, he said. If it takes longer to wake up, it in turn takes more months to recover.

"We wouldn't make any immediate long-term prognoses for at least one to two days," he cautioned. "There can be a period of time where the brain is still swollen and the patient may have trouble responding."

The senator's wife, Barbara Johnson, said the family "is encouraged and optimistic."

South Dakota's governor, elected to a second four-year term last month, has been widely seen as the Republican candidate with the best chance to challenge Johnson in two years.

Other than Rounds himself, top possibilities if a replacement senator were needed include Lt. Gov. Dennis Daugaard and state Public Utilities Commission Chairman Dusty Johnson, considered a rising star in the Republican Party. Retiring GOP legislative leaders, such as state House Speaker Matthew Michels and Senate Majority Leader Eric Bogue, also might be considered.

Johnson was first elected in 1996 and is up for re-election in 2008.

The last time the Senate convened with a perfect balance of 50 Republicans and 50 Democrats was in January 2001. Then, the two parties struck a power-sharing agreement that gave control of the Senate to Republicans but gave Democrats equal representation on committees.

Johnson, a centrist Democrat, was elected to the Senate after serving 10 years in the House. He narrowly defeated Republican John Thune in his 2002 re-election bid. Thune defeated Sen. Tom Daschle, the former Senate Democratic leader, two years later.

Daschle visited Johnson in the hospital on Thursday along with Reid.

Johnson is in line to become chairman of the Senate Ethics Committee.

He underwent prostate cancer treatment in 2004, and subsequent tests have shown him to be clear of the disease.

Johnson is the second senator to become ill after the Nov. 7 election. Wyoming Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican, was diagnosed with leukemia on Election Day. He is back at work.

Johnson's Illness Threatens Dems' Power (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, December 15, 2006

Suddenly, the Democrats' grip on the Senate looks very tenuous indeed. With the party poised to take power with a 51-49 edge in January, Sen. Tim Johnson's unexpected hospitalization ignited the possibility of a 50-50 Senate and a return to the unprecedented power-sharing pact that existed during the first half of 2001.

Johnson's illness alone would not create a vacancy in the Senate. Senators have convalesced for months, even years, and retained their Senate seats. Another South Dakota Senator, Republican Karl Mundt, was incapacitated by a stroke in 1969, but served until the end of his term in 1972.

Only resignation, death or expulsion by two-thirds of the Senate can create a vacancy.

If Johnson's seat would become vacant sometime in the next two years, South Dakota Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, would select a replacement. A GOP appointment would split the Senate anew, giving Vice President Dick Cheney the tie-breaking role and, thus, the numerical majority in the chamber to the Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0106708

But that doesn't necessarily mean Republicans would be in charge.

On Jan. 4, the first day of the new Congress, the Senate will vote on a resolution that will officially establish Democrats as the party in the majority, give Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada control over the legislative agenda, set the ratios of committee representation and other organizational matters.

That organizing resolution would still govern, even if the membership of the Senate changed. Senate associate historian Don Ritchie said the resolution could include language that spells out what would happen if there is an even split.

"This is really a matter of discussion between the Democratic and Republican leaders," Ritchie said.

But current and former GOP Senate officials said such a step would be highly unlikely. Indeed, such a move would probably paralyze the Senate.

If a 50-50 split occurs before Jan. 4, however, the parties would likely have to negotiate a power sharing agreement similar to the one then-Republican Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi and Democratic Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota negotiated in 2000.

Under that agreement, the parties split their representation on committees evenly. Committee staff positions and funding were also split equally. Republicans chose the committee chairmen and controlled the agenda on the Senate floor. Under the terms of the deal, any party that gained a numerical majority would then have control of the Senate.

By June 2001, Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont switched from being a Republican to an Independent who caucused with Democrats, putting Democrats in charge.

Before that, Ritchie said, "we have not had any formal means of changing party majorities."

If the Senate splits once again, Republicans would insist on drafting a new organizing resolution, prompting the same kind of difficult negotiations that Daschle and Lott had in 2000.

Absent some kind of deal, the Senate could see itself repeating history.

In 1953-54, Republicans kept control of the Senate even though the deaths of several senators gave the numerical plurality to Democrats. The arrangement made the Senate virtually ungovernable for the GOP.

"I have the responsibilities of being the majority leader in this body without having a majority," Republican Leader William Knowland of California complained at the time.

To which then-Democratic Leader Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas replied: "If anyone has more problems than a majority leader with a minority, it is a minority leader with a majority."

Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery Amid Tide Of Sympathy And Well Wishes (AL)

By Peter Harriman

Argus Leader, December 15, 2006

The tide of concern, sympathy and good wishes that has been rising across South Dakota since Sen. Tim Johnson was stricken by bleeding in his brain Wednesday was surmounted by a little whitecap of optimism today.

Following surgery Wednesday night to drain the bleeding and repair the circulatory defect that caused it, Johnson began to regain consciousness today.

"Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch," announced Admiral John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, cast that dry report in more human, hopeful terms. The senator was responding to her voice and following directions after surgery, she said.

By this morning he was reaching for and holding her hand.

"I would like to thank the people of South Dakota for their love and support as Tim has met this unexpected challenge. Our family is very pleased with his progress and the excellent care he is receiving at George Washington University Hospital. We ask for your continued prayers as Tim continues through the recovery process," she said.

Julianne Fisher, Johnson's spokesman, said there is not yet a reliable forecast on how long it will take Johnson to recover.

Speculation throughout much of the day as South Dakota waited for reports on Johnson's condition swirled around whether Johnson would recover fully or would be left with permanent brain injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0106709

Would he be able to continue to serve out the Senate term to which he was elected in 2002 or would be replaced by Gov. Mike Rounds?

Also, would a lengthy recuperation imperil any time-sensitive legislation Johnson hoped to shepherd through the new Congress next year?

Incoming Sen. Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., maintained a hopeful demeanor even as speculation was at its darkest Thursday morning before news that Johnson was regaining consciousness was widely distributed.

Reid said he had visited Johnson in the hospital before and after surgery. "To me, he looked good," Reid said in a press conference and predicted a full recovery for Johnson.

Sympathy came from both sides of the political aisle, even as Democrats hold onto a narrow advantage in the Senate.

"My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back," said Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, who will serve as the deputy Republican leader of the Senate next year.

"I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

Before he became ill Johnson had planned to be back in South Dakota today for the start of the holiday season, doing the array of serious and sociable things a Senator does in the home state. He had a meeting scheduled with the Lewis Clark Rural Water System board of directors next week, and he and his wife were planning to make an appearance at the Children's Inn celebrity gift wrapping center at the Empire Mall and wrap Christmas presents.

Johnson's sudden brain injury changed all that. In his Sioux Falls field office today, a new artificial Christmas tree remained in a long cardboard carton unopened. The six staff members carried out accustomed duties. But eyes continually drifted to Blackberry and computer screens and ears listened for phones for updates on the Senator's condition.

Floral arrangements and get well cards were on display. Benjamin Ready, Sen. John Thune's field representative, stopped by in mid afternoon to deliver one such card.

"They've been wonderful," Johnson's South Dakota Field Representative Sharon Boysen said of Thune's staff.

In addition, Rep. Stephanie Herseth "and her staff brought us lunch today," Boysen said. "There were Crispy Cremes here this morning. There's a steady stream of people coming by to give us their support.

"The outpouring from South Dakotans has been amazing," she said. "There have been hundreds of e-mails and phone calls from South Dakotans giving us their support and their best wishes to Barb and Tim."

Sioux Falls Mayor Dave Munson observed "that pretty much sums up how people feel about Tim Johnson in South Dakota."

As the state waited for news and wondered about Johnson's future, it also had an opportunity to contemplate its two-term Senator with the understated style and the reputation for penetrating policy analysis, perseverance, meticulous cultivation of consensus, attention to state interests and honesty.

"One of the things I've always admired about Tim is he usually levels with me, even when I have to hear something I don't want to hear," Pierre broadcaster, writer and conservationist Tony Dean mused.

"He is one of our key Native American supporters," said Craig Dillon, a member of the Oglala Sioux tribal council.

Johnson apparently suffered the brain injury at the conclusion of a telephone news conference Wednesday morning, when he had difficulty articulating an answer to a question.

He was able to walk back to his office from the studio where the interview was conducted, but by the time he arrived he had difficulty speaking and was unable to open the office door. The physician attending the Senate was immediately summoned and Johnson was sent to the George Washington University Medical Center by ambulance. He had surgery Wednesday night.

Johnson's immediate family was with him today. Jean Beddow, the mother-in-law of Johnson's son Brendan, said from her home in Sioux Falls "the surgery went as well as expected. ...We don't know anything more than that. It's wait-and-see."

She added she is regularly apprised of Johnson's situation, and "I can tell you that what you are hearing on the news is very accurate from what I know."

Since late Wednesday, the tape recording of Johnson's stumbling speech as the injury apparently afflicted him has been widely broadcast.

DOJ_NMG_0106710

That infuriates Beddow. “It’s one of the most grandiose miscarriages of justice in the world that they are playing that,” she said.

But the sound of the Senator struggling to speak also suggested the seriousness of his injury, and it seemed to sharpen concern for him. Munson spoke to that.

“It’s kind of a tense time for all of us in South Dakota,” the mayor said today afternoon.

“We’re all just sitting, waiting for any news.

“There are a powerful lot of people cheering for him.”

Late today, it seemed, they might have had a bit of good news to cheer about.

Reach Peter Harriman at 575-3615. Wire services contributed to this report.

Advertisement

Partners: Jobs: CareerBuilder.com | Cars: Cars.com | Apartments: Apartments.com | Shopping: ShopLocal.com

Customer Service | Send feedback | Subscribe to The Argus Leader | Jobs with the Argus Leader | PDA version of our site

Copyright ©2006 ArgusLeader.com. Please read our Privacy Policy; Use of this site indicates your agreement to the Terms of Service (Terms updated May 15, 2006). All rights reserved.

Tea-Harrisburg Champion

Special Features

Weather Page

Sponsored by Home Federal Bank.

Athlete of the Week

Coaches, nominate your exceptional sports student for Athlete of the Week.

Dining Guide

Staying in or going out, plan your evening using the Argus Leader Dining Guide.

PheasantCountry.com

Where Pheasant Hunters Come To Roost.

Sports Factory

Your Source for High School Sports <s_suiteID_default value=“argusleader” />

Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery For Bleeding In Brain (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson was “responsive to both word and touch” Thursday evening following emergency brain surgery but the uncertainty of his long-term prognosis casts doubt on the nation’s political landscape.

Adm. John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement the two-term senator has not required further surgery since doctors at George Washington University overnight stopped bleeding. The condition, caused by a malformation of blood vessels, is congenital. It was undiagnosed in Johnson, who turns 60 on Dec. 28.

ON DEADLINE: More details

Johnson was stricken Wednesday afternoon, as he had trouble talking to reporters in a conference call. His illness comes as Democrats prepare to take control of the Senate on Jan. 4 with 51 votes, including those of two independents.

If Johnson is unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, it would be up to South Dakota’s Republican Gov. Mike Rounds to appoint a replacement, presumably from his party.

That would shift the balance of power in the Senate to the GOP because Vice President Cheney, a Republican, would cast the vote to break a 50-50 tie.

Republicans at the Capitol showed no signs that they will press for Johnson to resign. Johnson, first elected in 1996, is up for re-election in 2008.

“My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back,” Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who will serve as his party’s deputy leader next year, said on Fox News. “I’d like to be in the majority, but I don’t want it to be that way.”

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he is continuing to organize for a Senate run by his party. "There isn't a thing that has changed," said Reid, after visiting Johnson at the hospital. "To me, he looked very good."

Wishes for Johnson's recovery came from lawmakers in both parties and President Bush.

"Our prayers are with Sen. Johnson," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "He's a great guy."

Eisold on Thursday morning called it "premature" to forecast the senator's long-term prognosis, or whether he will need more surgery. Patients with Johnson's condition frequently require a second operation to remove the problem blood vessels, according Sean Grady, chief of neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania.

Grady said such operations "can pose a very high risk" depending on where the damaged blood vessels are in the brain.

What The Fate Of Johnson's Seat May Portend (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- "There isn't a thing that's changed," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid said yesterday after visiting his stricken colleague, South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, at the hospital. But Democrats were trying to shake off the nightmare of possibly losing power so quickly after November's elections.

The soft-spoken 59-year-old senator was listed in critical condition after surgery to address bleeding in the brain. Mr. Johnson's family was hopeful for his recovery from what doctors called an arteriovenous malformation, a tangle of blood vessels, usually present from birth, that caused bleeding in his brain. The next 48 hours could tell a lot after surgery to remove the blood and help stabilize the malformation.

But rarely has a senator been stricken in office with more potential impact politically. Since sweeping the midterm elections last month, Senate Democrats have been celebrating the 51 votes they will claim in January. But that power and the accompanying committee chairmanships would slip away if Mr. Johnson doesn't recover and is succeeded by an appointed Republican.

The House will remain Democratic, and incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California already is moving ahead with her own agenda of ethics overhaul, tighter intelligence oversight and other initiatives separate from the Senate. But she and other top House Democrats have close ties with Senate Democratic leaders, many of whom, like Mr. Reid, began their careers in the House. Loss of the Senate would be deeply felt and make it easier for President Bush to try to stare down Congress and isolate the House.

The extent of any lasting brain damage Mr. Johnson may have suffered was unclear. In general, recovery time for such an ailment can range from four to six weeks to as much as six months or a year if the damage is more severe, said M. Sean Grady, chairman of the neurosurgery department at the University of Pennsylvania Health System in Philadelphia.

WASHINGTON WIRE

1

See the expanded online version of Washington Wire2. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire during the day -- every weekday -- with analysis, news and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway.

If Mr. Johnson is recovering but still hospitalized when the new Congress convenes in January, Democrats would retain a 50-49 majority and be able to organize under Mr. Reid. But dates here mean less since, unlike the House, Senate rules permit that body to reorganize at a later date in the new Congress if the balance of power changes.

Under South Dakota law, if a senator dies or resigns, a successor will be named by the sitting governor to serve until the next general election. South Dakota's governor is Michael Rounds, a Republican. Even before Mr. Johnson's cerebral hemorrhage this week, Mr. Rounds was a recruitment target for national Republicans wanting him to challenge the senator in 2008. These ambitions could shape Mr. Rounds's decision, but he must be sensitive to South Dakota's sentiments if he is to run for the seat in two years.

Less clear is what happens if Mr. Johnson is left incapacitated and pressure builds for him to resign. "There are only two things I'm aware of that would create a vacancy at that level ... death or resignation," said Chris Nelson, South Dakota's secretary of state.

DOJ_NMG_0106712

Senate history is peppered with examples of senators staying away for months because of illness or surgery. Republican Sen. Karl Mundt, also of South Dakota, stopped appearing in the Senate after being disabled by a stroke in 1969, but he remained in office until his term expired in 1972.

Mr. Mundt's chief of staff, Robert McCaughey, ran the office, and recalled in an interview yesterday that he couldn't vote or speak for Mr. Mundt at committee meetings. But he briefed Mr. Mundt nearly every day as the senator sat in an easy chair in his home two blocks from the office. Mr. Mundt could speak haltingly and followed Senate business, but didn't always understand conversation, Mr. McCaughey said.

He said he wanted Mr. Mundt, a longtime friend and employer, to resign his seat, but faced opposition from Mrs. Mundt. "He wasn't able to carry out his duties," said Mr. McCaughey. "I felt he was taking a voice from the people of South Dakota." At one point, South Dakota's Republican governor -- fearing a loss of the governorship to a Democrat in 1970 -- pleaded personally with Mr. Mundt to resign. "He didn't seem to understand that he should resign," Mr. McCaughey said.

If Mr. Johnson is succeeded by a Republican, the Senate would be split 50-50, much as it was after the 2000 elections when the two parties had to work out a historic power-sharing relationship. With Vice President Dick Cheney available to break any tie, Republicans retained the majority and chairmanships. But many of the committees were split evenly and special deference was given to the Democratic leadership to make a motion to call up legislation.

Among individual committees, a shift in chairmanships can be significant. Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) the new Armed Services Committee chairman, wants the U.S. to begin to withdraw from Iraq, for example; Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who would succeed him, wants more troops sent.

Sens. Barbara Boxer (D., Calif.) and James Inhofe (R., Okla.), who would trade places at the Environment and Public Works Committee, are at opposite ends of the spectrum on issues like global warming. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) is much more a friend of labor than Sen. Michael Enzi (R., Wyo.), who would reclaim the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. And with a new farm bill in the offing, cotton and peanut interests would be delighted to have Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R., Ga.) take back the Senate Agriculture Committee from Sen. Tom Harkin (D., Iowa.)

But lost in such speculation is the fact that whoever is chairman, nothing gets done in the Senate unless there is some larger consensus on the floor. As well as consigning them to the minority, November's elections left their mark on the mind-set of surviving Republicans as well.

When Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, announced January hearings on the administration's Iraq policy, for example, former Chairman Richard Lugar (R., Ind.) was supportive. And in the closing days of the 109th Congress last week, individual Republicans were showing more independence on budget and other issues from the White House, which can't expect the same level of support as in the past, whoever is in charge.

As A Senator Is Felled, A January Vote Looms Big (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, December 15, 2006

The incapacitation of South Dakota Senator Tim Johnson has put all eyes in Washington on what is normally a little-noticed Senate vote now scheduled for Jan. 4. It is called the "organizing resolution," and is the bit of internal housekeeping that determines how committee memberships will be allotted between the two parties, as well as who will get to serve as chairman and ranking members of each of the panels. These resolutions traditionally stand until the next Congress, even if the makeup of the chamber shifts to put the other party in the majority, which is why precedent would seem to dictate that the Chamber would stay in Democratic hands, even if Johnson is replaced by a Republican.

But don't count on it this time. Even if Johnson ultimately recovers from the congenital blood disorder known as arteriovenous malformation, which required emergency surgery Wednesday night, it now looks highly unlikely that he will healthy enough to vote on Jan. 4. With Johnson unable to vote, Democrats still have enough votes to win, with 50 votes (including the two independent Senators, Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont) to 49 for the Republicans. But Democrats now fear the real possibility that Republicans will filibuster that resolution. They could insist — just as the Democrats did after the 2000 election that left the chamber evenly split, with Vice President Dick Cheney as the tie-breaker and one Republican Senator seriously ill — on an "out clause" that stipulates that control of the chamber goes to them if they somehow manage to achieve a majority during the course of the session. As both sides remember, that clause came in handy for the Democrats a few months later, when Vermont's Jim Jeffords abruptly declared himself an independent and gave the Democrats a one-vote majority. And the same thing could happen again, if Johnson or any other Democrat is replaced by a Republican ovr the course of the session.

DOJ_NMG_0106713

If the Republicans filibuster, and the question drags on into January or even beyond, it presents another truly extraordinary possibility: a chamber with a new Democratic leader, but the existing set of Republican committee chairmen. That is because, until an organizing resolution is passed, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid would have no control over the committees.

Ill Senator Is Called Responsive (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Senator Tim Johnson, Democrat of South Dakota, was said to be in critical condition but "responsive" Thursday after an operation to stop bleeding in his brain, and Democrats declared that his condition would not imperil the narrow majority they will carry into the Senate next month.

The attending physician of the Capitol, Adm. John F. Eisold, who examined Mr. Johnson before he was sent to the hospital Wednesday, said the bleeding was caused by a rare tangling of the blood vessels in the brain, known as a congenital arteriovenous malformation, that physicians say often goes undetected. The operation successfully drained the blood and stabilized the problem, Admiral Eisold said in a statement released by Mr. Johnson's office.

"He has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch," Admiral Eisold said. "No further surgical intervention has been required."

For a second day, Washington and the political world were riveted by Mr. Johnson's condition and the possibility that it could undo the result of last month's Senate elections, which gave control of the chamber to the Democrats. While emphasizing that they were concerned only for Mr. Johnson and his family, members of both parties could not escape the dramatic if hypothetical implications should he die or be unable to continue in office: that South Dakota's Republican governor would name a replacement for the next two years and, assuming that replacement was a Republican, shift control of the Senate back to President Bush's party.

Mr. Johnson, who had attracted little attention outside of agriculture circles in his 10 years in the Senate and decade in the House, was suddenly in the spotlight, with cable news channels breaking in with every update on his progress.

Late in the afternoon, Mr. Johnson's wife, Barbara, said in a statement that he was responding to her voice and following directions after the operation, which began late Wednesday, and that he was reaching for her hand and holding it by Thursday morning.

A spokesman for Mr. Johnson said his doctors were watching to see whether bleeding recurred in the next 48 to 72 hours.

Doctors who specialize in the condition said that in the overwhelming majority of cases the bleeding does not cause long-term damage, particularly for someone who showed the symptoms Mr. Johnson did. But they said the outcome might not be known for weeks or months.

According to precedent, Mr. Johnson, who will turn 60 on Dec. 28, would lose his seat only if he died or resigned. In that case, Gov. Mike Rounds would choose a replacement to fill the vacancy until a special election in November 2008.

Even if Mr. Johnson is unable to vote in January, the Democrats would have a 50-49 majority in the Senate, which would allow them to pass a series of resolutions awarding them chairmanships and majority membership of committees.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, appeared before reporters and cameras on Thursday morning and said that he had just visited Mr. Johnson in his room and that "he looked great."

Mr. Reid declined to say whether he believed Mr. Johnson looked well enough to be able to return to the Senate, saying that anything he said would only raise more questions among reporters. "To me," he said, "he looked very good."

Mr. Reid, who spent much of Wednesday at the hospital, also said that he had spoken to Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the incoming Republican leader, and that both sides in the Senate were proceeding as they were before Mr. Johnson's illness, with the Democrats expecting to assume their 51-49 majority.

DOJ_NMG_0106714

"There isn't a thing that changes," Mr. Reid said, adding that the Republicans selected names for their smaller memberships of committees on Wednesday.

Mr. Johnson's illness highlighted the fragility of the Democrats' new majority. The Senate press gallery handed out copies of the relevant provisions of South Dakota election law, as well a special organizing resolution passed in 2001, when the Senate was split 50-50, that outlined how the two parties shared power.

In the South Dakota capital, Mr. Rounds appealed for prayers for the senator — not speculation about what would happen if he died.

Even some Republican lawmakers and aides criticized news coverage of Mr. Johnson's illness as ghoulish, saying it put too much emphasis on who would control the Senate and not enough on his health. Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, who is to become the No. 2 Republican in the Senate in January, brushed off questions about procedures if the membership split 50-50. "We don't even want to talk about that," he told Fox News, adding, "I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

Mr. McConnell issued a statement titled "The recovery of Senator Tim Johnson" — emphasis on recovery. "I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery," he said. "Our thoughts are with his wife, Barbara, and his family during this time."

Mr. Reid said Mr. McConnell was "thoughtful" in a telephone conversation Wednesday. And Democratic aides said they had not received any Republican requests to discuss any power-sharing rules.

An estimated 300,000 Americans have arteriovenous malformations, said Dr. Jay P. Mohr, the principal investigator in a National Institutes of Health study of the condition and the director of the stroke center at Columbia University Medical Center. Most cases go undetected, Dr. Mohr said, and there is bleeding in only about 30,000. Of the patients with bleeding, Dr. Mohr said, only about 10 percent to 20 percent suffer damage severe enough that they can no longer function as they did before. About half are left with such minor problems, he said, that "they aren't sure they had a stroke."

Noah Pinegar, a spokesman for Mr. Johnson, said the senator began to stutter midday Wednesday during his weekly conference call with reporters from the Senate recording studio in the Capitol, then recovered and ended the call. He then walked back to his office across the street. Aides said that he seemed weak, but that he did not collapse as a Senate official had said earlier, and they summoned Admiral Eisold. The doctor sent Mr. Johnson by ambulance to George Washington University Hospital, where he underwent tests before the operation.

Specialists in the condition, while emphasizing that they did not know the specifics of Mr. Johnson's case, varied in their assessment of the likely damage. Dr. Mohr said that what had been reported — that Mr. Johnson could still hold the phone and walk — "suggests to me that the brain was not totally destroyed." Very likely, he said, doctors discovered blood that had leaked in the ventricles, which could be removed "with very little damage to the adjacent brain."

"He was able to get up and walk around and report to a local hospital," Dr. Mohr said. "These are the things that could make for a favorable result."

Good Wishes Pour In For Sen. Johnson (USAT)

By Peter Harriman And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 15, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — The new, artificial Christmas tree for Sen. Tim Johnson's office here remained unopened in a long cardboard box. Instead, Johnson's office was filled Thursday with flowers and cards brought by a steady stream of well-wishers rooting for the senator's recovery from brain surgery.

One card was delivered by Benjamin Ready, a field representative for Republican Sen. John Thune. Johnson, a Democrat, beat Thune by 524 votes in the closest Senate race of 2002. When Thune was elected to the Senate two years later, the home-state colleagues vowed to make their Senate relationship work.

That bipartisan cooperation was evident after Johnson's surgery.

"They've been wonderful," Johnson's field representative Sharon Boysen said of Thune's staff.

DOJ_NMG_0106715

Rep. Stephanie Herseth, a Democrat and the state's lone member of the House of Representatives, and her staff "brought us lunch today," Boysen said. "There were Krispy Kremes here this morning." Boysen called the outpouring from the state "amazing."

Johnson's willingness to build a relationship with former rival Thune has become a model in the Senate. As South Dakota's senior senator lay in critical condition at George Washington University Hospital in the nation's capital, Johnson's Senate colleagues were following a page from his playbook.

"I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery," incoming Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said in a statement.

Last month's election gave the Republicans 49 votes in the Senate and the Democrats 51, including Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont, elected as independents. Sanders and Lieberman voted for Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., as their leader and have said they will align and vote with the Democratic caucus next term.

If Johnson cannot finish his term and GOP Gov. Mike Rounds appoints someone from his own party as a replacement, power will shift to Republicans because in a 50-50 Senate, Vice President Cheney would break a tie.

No member of Congress has ever been forced out of office for reasons of physical infirmity, according to John Fortier of the American Enterprise Institute.

Fortier studied the history of congressional succession as executive director of the Continuity of Government Commission, a group formed after the 9/11 attacks to determine how Congress could continue if many members became incapacitated. During the 1940s, he said, the Virginia Legislature tried to remove Carter Glass, a Senate Democrat who missed nearly four years of votes before dying in office at the age of 84. That move, Fortier said, "didn't get very far."

South Dakota Sen. Karl Mundt, a Republican, offered to resign after being paralyzed by a stroke in 1969 but only on the condition that his wife be appointed in his place, said Donald Ritchie of the Senate Historical Office. Mundt's request was denied by South Dakota's governor, and the senator remained in office for more than three years, until his term expired. Ritchie said senators have not pressured ailing colleagues to leave.

"The Senate has never vacated a seat," he said. "It has always left that decision to the senator, the family or the voters."

Peter Harriman writes daily for the Argus Leader in Sioux Falls, S.D. Kiely reported from Washington.

Johnson 'Critical' After Surgery (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition last night from surgery to relieve bleeding inside his brain and untangle a malformation of arteries, although doctors and aides said his recovery from the major surgery was going on "without complication."

The South Dakota Democrat, who turns 60 this month, "was found to have had an intracerebral bleed caused by a congenital arteriovenous malformation," said Adm. John Eisold, the attending physician of the U.S. Capitol. "He underwent successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation."

During a brief press conference yesterday morning, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, who had spent much of the previous 24 hours at George Washington University Hospital with Mr. Johnson, said the senator "looks great." He declined to answer any specific medical questions.

Late yesterday afternoon, Dr. Eisold issued another statement saying that Mr. Johnson, "has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch."

It is premature, he said, "to determine whether further surgery will be required or to assess any long-term prognosis."

The senator also underwent an additional procedure to prevent blood clots, which Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said was standard after the surgery. His office also said Mr. Johnson was responsive to his wife's voice.

It is also premature, aides on Capitol Hill said, to determine what affect Mr. Johnson's ailment might have on the Senate, where Democrats will enjoy a 51-49 caucus advantage over Republicans when the next session of Congress begins next month.

DOJ_NMG_0106716

If Mr. Johnson becomes unable to continue serving as the senior senator from South Dakota, a replacement would be named by the state's Republican governor, Michael Rounds. If Mr. Rounds were to choose a Republican as a replacement, it would give the party -- with Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote -- a one-seat advantage.

Well before Mr. Johnson's illness surfaced Wednesday during a telephone interview with reporters, Senate Republicans had been negotiating with Democrats about the exact wording of the organizing resolution that is the first vote by the Senate and establishes ground rules for how the Senate operates.

Normally, there is no provision to allow control to change hands in mid-Congress -- even if the party that controls the chamber, for some reason, loses its majority.

In 2001, the last time the Senate teetered on such a narrow margin, Republicans allowed a clause to be included in the organizing resolution that would change control of the chamber if they lost their slim majority. A few months later, when Sen. James M. Jeffords of Vermont quit the Republican Party and caucused with Democrats, that clause gave Democrats control of the chamber.

Senate Republicans have argued to include the same clause in the upcoming organizing resolution but dropped any public reference to it since Mr. Johnson became ill. Yesterday, they were steering reporters' questions away from any calculations about any change in power.

Incoming Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, issued a statement "on the recovery of" Mr. Johnson.

"I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery," he said. "Our thoughts are with his wife, Barbara, and his family during this time."

Democratic Senator Survives Brain Surgery (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats said Thursday that they expect to take control of the Senate next month as planned, after Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota survived emergency brain surgery hours earlier.

The Capitol's physician, Adm. John Eisold, said an operation to drain blood from Johnson's brain had been successful and that he was "recovering without complication." Nevertheless, the 59-year-old Democrat remained in critical condition.

Aides and lawmakers wouldn't say whether Johnson would be able to return to work when the Senate convenes on Jan. 4, 2007 - or even if Johnson was conscious after surgery.

What mattered from a political perspective was that he was alive. A senator can be incapacitated or indefinitely absent without relinquishing his or her seat. If Johnson remains in office, Democrats will run the Senate with a 51-49 majority. (Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut won re-election as an Independent, but has vowed to join the Democrats for organizing purposes. So has Independent Bernie Sanders of Vermont.) Democrats also won a 31-seat majority - 233-202- in the House of Representatives in November's elections.

However, If Johnson were to vacate his Senate seat, South Dakota's Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, would name a replacement to serve the final two years of Johnson's term.

If Rounds appointed a Republican, that would lead to a 50-50 partisan split in the Senate, with Vice President Dick Cheney, a Republican, having the power to cast tie-breaking votes - including on top leadership posts and how committees are organized, said Senate historian Richard Baker. In that scenario, the Democrats' dramatic victory in November's mid-term Senate elections could be lost before they ever take power.

But that seemed increasingly unlikely Thursday.

"There isn't a thing that's changed," Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the next majority leader, said in a midday update after briefing Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the next minority leader. "The Republicans selected their committees yesterday. We've completed ours. . . .

"We're all praying for a full recovery," Reid said. "We're confident that will be the case."

DOJ_NMG_0106717

Reid spent much of the previous night at the George Washington University Hospital. Johnson was rushed there Wednesday afternoon from Capitol Hill after becoming disoriented and suffering other stroke-like symptoms. Other lawmakers and friends stopped by the hospital throughout the day Thursday.

Doctors ruled out a stroke or heart attack. Instead, they determined that Johnson has a congenital malformation that causes blood vessels in the brain to tangle and burst.

Eisold said Thursday morning that it was too soon to know Johnson's long-term prognosis or whether he would need another operation.

At 5 p.m., Johnson's office issued a second statement from Eisold, saying that Johnson "has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required."

Johnson's staff seemed upbeat. Around noon, several of his staff members gathered privately for pizza. One told a visitor, "He's going to be fine."

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who'll be the second-ranking Republican in the next Senate, told Fox News: "My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back and we'll go to work. You know, I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

In the 20th century, several senators took extended absences for illness without resigning, historian Baker said.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., missed seven months after surgery for a brain aneurysm in 1988. He's now incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Karl Mundt, a South Dakota Republican, had a debilitating stroke in 1969 but refused to leave until his term was up in January 1973.

Clair Engle, a California Democrat, could not talk or walk after brain cancer surgeries, but was brought into the chamber for a key vote on the Civil Rights Act of 1964 the month before he died.

Senator Tim Johnson Has Brain Surgery, Doctor Says (Update6) (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Senator Tim Johnson underwent surgery to relieve bleeding in his brain and treat a congenital malformation of his arteries, his doctor said. Control of the new U.S. Senate may depend on Johnson's health.

Johnson, 59, is having an "uncomplicated" recovery, is responsive to word and touch and has not needed further surgery, Admiral John Eisold, the attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement this afternoon.

Eisold said earlier today that Johnson "was found to have had an intracerebral bleed caused by a congenital arteriovenous malformation." He underwent "successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation."

Johnson's wife Barbara said in a statement that after the surgery, Johnson was responding to her voice, following instructions, and reaching for and holding her hand.

He is in critical condition, said an aide to Johnson who asked to remain anonymous.

Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, was taken by ambulance to George Washington University Hospital in Washington yesterday afternoon after becoming disoriented during a conference call with reporters.

Democrats would have a 51-49 majority in the next session of Congress that begins Jan. 4 if Johnson retains his seat. If his seat were to become vacant, South Dakota Governor Mike Rounds, a Republican, may appoint a Republican replacement, shifting the partisan balance to 50-50 and giving Republicans control through the tie-breaking vote of Vice President Dick Cheney.

Split

The Senate had a 50-50 split between Democrats and Republicans following the 2000 election. The parties negotiated a power-sharing arrangement under which Republican senators chaired committees that had equal numbers of Democrats and Republicans. Leaders of both parties shared control of legislation reaching the Senate floor.

DOJ_NMG_0106718

Democrats took the majority back five months later when Senator James Jeffords of Vermont quit the Republican Party and became an independent who voted with the Democrats.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who recovered from a mild stroke last year, said Johnson looked good during a visit at the hospital and is confident he will have a full recovery.

"There isn't a thing that has changed," regarding Democratic control of the Senate in the next Congress, Reid said.

Confident

Johnson is one of 26 Democratic senators whose death or resignation would jeopardize Democrats' control of the chamber because their successor would be appointed by a Republican governor. That number will fall to 18 in January when the governorships of Arkansas, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts and New York switch to Democratic from Republican control.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said at a press conference today that Johnson "is recovering and we are hopefully going to get some good news." She refused to address how his illness might determine control of the Senate.

First lady Laura Bush said she and President George W. Bush learned of Johnson's condition this morning.

"We're praying, like I know all the people of South Dakota are, for his very, very speedy recovery," she said in an interview on CBS's "Early Show."

Vacancies

While vacancies aren't uncommon in the Senate, they can only occur "by death or resignation," said Richard Baker, the Senate historian.

"There either has to be a death certificate or there has to be a letter of resignation," he said. "Nobody has the power to determine a vacancy for a person who is still living."

Some lawmakers in the past have kept their seats in spite of long illnesses.

In 1969, South Dakota Senator Karl Mundt, a Republican, suffered a stroke that prevented him from voting, according to Slate, an Internet-based daily magazine. He kept his seat for three more years after South Dakota's governor refused his request to appoint Mundt's wife to replace him, Slate reported.

In the 1940s, Senator Carter Glass of Virginia, an 87-year- old Democrat, failed to vote for two years of votes due to illness while refusing calls to retire, Slate reported.

Johnson became disoriented while on a conference call with South Dakota and regional reporters at about 11:45 a.m. Washington time yesterday, according to Noah Pinegar, an aide to the senator.

Stutter

Johnson appeared to stutter in response to a question, then seemed to recover, asking if there were any additional questions before signing off, the Associated Press reported.

Johnson later walked with aides from the Capitol back to his office in the Hart Senate Office Building, a distance of about two city blocks, Pinegar said. Aides called the Capitol's attending physician, and Johnson was later taken by ambulance to the hospital. Johnson was conscious and talking throughout, Pinegar said.

Johnson went into brain surgery at approximately 7 p.m. Washington time last night and emerged at 12:30 a.m. today, according to Julianne Fisher, Johnson's spokeswoman.

"He came through the surgery and is doing well," she said.

The extent of impairment to Johnson's motor and cognitive functions is likely to become clear over the next two to three days, Fisher said.

"After having a surgery like this, the thing to do is wait," Fisher said.

Larry B. Goldstein, a Duke University neurologist, said it appears that Johnson was born with a malformation of brain blood vessels that burst, causing a type of stroke.

'No Symptoms'

"They can cause absolutely no symptoms for a lifetime or they can cause bleeding without warning," Goldstein, a spokesman for the American Stroke Association, said in a telephone interview today.

DOJ_NMG_0106719

Johnson's surgeons would have performed an operation to remove the blood clot and seal off the weakened vessels using one of several approaches, Goldstein said. Strokes can alter speech, memory, personality, vision, gait, and the ability to move one's arms and legs.

"There could be no consequences or, if it's an important area of the brain and it's a large area, they could be severe," Goldstein said.

Johnson, an advocate for U.S. farmers and agricultural commodity producers, is in his second term in the Senate. He was re-elected in 2002 by just 528 votes out of more than 334,000 cast. An attorney, he had served five terms in the House of Representatives from 1986 to 1996 before winning his Senate seat. He is up for re-election in 2008.

Control Of Senate At Issue As Sen. Johnson Undergoes Brain Surgery (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, December 15, 2006

UPDATE (5 p.m.) — Johnson's office has released the following statement: "Admiral John Eisold, Attending Physician of the United States Capitol said, 'Senator Tim Johnson has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required.'"

Written by Martin Kady II and Martha Angle.

Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition in George Washington University Hospital on Thursday following surgery for bleeding in the brain, as Capitol Hill swirled with speculation about the impact of his condition on control of the Senate in the 110th Congress.

Admiral John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement Thursday morning, "Subsequent to his admission to George Washington University Hospital yesterday, Senator Tim Johnson was found to have had an intracerebral bleed caused by a congenital arteriovenous malformation. He underwent successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation."

The statement said Johnson was "recovering without complication in the critical care unit," but cautioned it was "premature to determine whether further surgery will be required or to assess any long-term prognosis."

Johnson's condition immediately raised questions about control of the Senate in the 110th Congress, which convenes Jan. 4. Democrats won a 51-49 edge in the November elections, but the Senate cannot function without the adoption of an organizing resolution.

That resolution is subject to filibuster, and if Republicans refused to adopt it on grounds that Johnson is incapacitated and incompetent to fulfill his duties, the chamber would be at a standstill. At the same time, only Johnson himself — or his family, acting under a power of attorney — could resign his seat, creating a vacancy that South Dakota's Republican governor would fill. A Republican successor would create a 50-50 tie, giving the GOP operational control as a result of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

If Johnson survives, the Democrats would still be in control by 50-49 until and unless he resigned.

The South Dakota Democrat was admitted to the hospital at midday Wednesday after being examined at his Capitol Hill office by a Senate physician. Johnson, who will turn 60 in two weeks, realized something was wrong when he stuttered inexplicably during a conference call interview with reporters earlier in the day.

If Johnson dies or resigns before the end of his term, which runs through 2008, an interim replacement would be appointed by South Dakota Republican Gov. Mike Rounds to serve the remainder of his term. The seat would be filled permanently in the regular 2008 November general election.

Such a scenario would create a 50-50 Senate tie in the 110th Congress, with Cheney giving the GOP control. That was the situation that prevailed at the start of the 107th Congress, when the 2000 elections resulted in a 50-50 tie. Democrats held up adoption of an organizing resolution for months while they negotiated equal representation on all Senate committees and an even division of staff and budgets. But all chairmanships and control of the Senate floor remained with Republicans.

In June 2001, Republican James M. Jeffords of Vermont left the GOP and became an independent aligned with Democrats, shifting control of the Senate to them for the remainder of that Congress. Reid at Johnson's Bedside

DOJ_NMG_0106720

Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada, who is in line to become the new Senate majority leader next month, rushed to the hospital on Wednesday after Johnson was transported there and returned to his colleague's bedside again Thursday morning. He was joined by former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota, who is a close friend of Johnson's.

Reid told reporters Thursday that Johnson "really looks good." But he refused to answer questions about whether the senator was conscious and did not answer directly when asked whether Johnson would be able to serve in the new Congress.

"We all pray for a full recovery and believe that will be the case," Reid said.

Asked about the impact on control of the Senate, Reid said, "There isn't a thing that has changed."

He said he had talked with Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., who will be the top GOP leader in the new Congress, but their conversation focused on Johnson's health, not the impact of his condition on organizing the Senate.

Democrats were proceeding with their preparations for the new Congress on the assumption that they will be in control.

Johnson, who was expected to chair the Ethics Committee, was first elected to the Senate in 1996 after serving five terms in the House. He won re-election in 2002, narrowly defeating Republican John Thune, who went on to oust Daschle from the Senate in 2004 and his now Johnson's colleague.

Johnson is a cancer survivor, having undergone successful surgery for prostate cancer in 2004. No Exact Precedent

Never in Senate history has a death or vacancy switched the balance of power in the way it would if Johnson died or resigned, according to the Senate Historian Don Ritchie. In the House, however, the balance of power switched in 1930 between the November election and the start of the new Congress. Back then, a new Congress was sworn in the March after the election. A total of 14 members died and a variety of special elections switched control of the House from Republicans to Democrats by the time the Congress was actually seated in December 1931, Ritchie said.

In the Senate, no such power shift has ever taken place. During the 83rd Congress, in 1953-1954, Republicans started with a small majority, but nine members died throughout that Congress, giving Democrats the voting majority. However, Republicans maintained formal control of the chamber because the organizing resolution had already been adopted and Republicans could have filibustered any new one that switched control to the Democrats.

Johnson's situation is unique because there is no Congress in session, and his long- term prognosis is uncertain. His family, through its power of attorney, does have the power to resign on his behalf if necessary.

That occurred in Maryland's 5th District a quarter-century ago. Rep. Gladys Noon Spellman, D-Md., suffered a massive heart attack in 1980 but won re-election. She never recovered, however, and her family said she could not serve. Democrat Steny H. Hoyer, who will serve as the House majority leader in the 110th Congress, was elected to succeed her in a special election.

Johnson does not need to be sworn in at the beginning of the 110th Congress because he is in the middle of his term.

Even if Johnson remains unable to attend to his regular Senate duties for a long period, he can still remain in office, according to Senate historian Richard Baker. There is no constitutional provision for the removal of incapacitated senators.

On the contrary, there is ample precedent for senators being absent for long periods due to health issues, including a former senator from South Dakota, who suffered a stroke in 1969. Republican Sen. Karl Earl Mundt (1948-1973) remained technically in office through the final years of his last term because he refused to resign.

In 1964, California Democrat Clair Engle (1959-1964), who had been absent from the Senate for months due to a brain tumor that had paralyzed him, was wheeled into the Senate on a gurney during the roll call vote on the landmark 1964 Civil Rights Act. Unable to speak, when his name was called, he lifted his arm and pointed to his eye, indicating an "aye" vote. He died in office.

More recently, in 1988, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., took a seven-month leave of absence to recover from brain surgery.

Baker said, given the history and tradition of the Senate, a senator remains a senator "as long as he's alive and breathing."

Permalink | NEW! Bookmark This Article: del.icio.us or Newsvine | Related Topics: Senate South Dakota

I think that whatever happens with the technicalities, the Congress should respect the wishes of the voters, who clearly stated their desire for who should lead our country. To swoop in and wrest control seems despicable and opportunistic.

Posted by Stuart at 1:10 PM; Dec. 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106721

If it comes down to an appointment, wouldn't it be something if Gov. Rounds appointed a Dem. After all, the people of SD elected a Dem. It would be an approriate honoring to Sen Johnson and his family. Might even tend to unite our country.

Posted by harold richardson at 1:55 PM; Dec. 14, 2006

It is unthinkable that the whim of a governor could change the balance of power in the congress as decided by the electorate.

Posted by Carl Berge at 2:47 PM; Dec. 14, 2006

As part of my exercising my obligations as a citizen, I have written to Senator Johnson at least once a month since the aftermath of Nov 2004 selection.

I follow his voting record and query him on it. I've urged him to initiate or participate in actions that would bring great changes to this status quo.

Senator Johnson has answered every letter, explaining his position both ideologically and politically in lengthy, literate and clear replies obviously written to me, in no way formated.

While he is not a grand-stander, his ego takes a back seat to getting things done for SD in a manner of bipartisanship that he must have had long before we lost Senator Daschle.

Finding info about him on the net under his hospital was difficult since most references were to meetings, speeches, agreements he was working with them for easing the burdens of seniors v Medicare. Behind the scenes yet in the top third of senatorial power brokers.

Posted by Pamela Rose PhD at 3:41 PM; Dec. 14, 2006

Why will the Senate have only 99 members "unless and until Johnson resigns"? That can happen only if Johnson doesn't vote. If you know that he can't vote in January, please cite your sources. In any case please explain why a 50-49 majority could result in a filibuster. Is it any less a majority than 51-49, or do you have information that a two vote margin would result in a filibuster?

Posted by wallace sanders at 5:06 PM; Dec. 14, 2006

Senator Recovering From Brain Surgery (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And Jeremy Manier

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Colleagues kept a close watch Thursday on Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) as he recovered from brain surgery in a local hospital, offering hopeful reports about his condition while also quietly calculating its potential to determine control of the Senate for the next two years.

Democrats emerged from Johnson's hospital room saying he was doing well in the day following his surgery, although neither prospective Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid nor former Sen. Tom Daschle of South Dakota gave details about Johnson's health. Adm. John Eisold, the Capitol physician, said Johnson had been "responsive to both word and touch" and that he didn't immediately need any more surgery.

Johnson was responding to the voice of his wife, Barbara, and following directions after the surgery, the senator's office said in a statement, adding, "He was reaching for and holding her hand."

While friends adopted a positive tone about Johnson's state of health, staffers and elected officials were analyzing every conceivable version of political events to come over the next few weeks, during which time Democrats have been expecting to assume control of the Senate. If Johnson, 59, were to resign, Republican Gov. Mike Rounds of South Dakota could appoint any replacement he wished.

Reid (D-Nev.) said there is no reason to think Democrats would not take the reins when the new Congress takes office. Johnson "really looks good" and friends are "confident" of his full recovery, he said after visiting the ailing two-term senator on Thursday.

"There isn't a thing that's changed," Reid said. "I have a very busy schedule today, going ahead and getting ready for the next year."

DOJ_NMG_0106722

As long as a senator is alive, there is no way to legally remove him or her from office for health reasons, experts said. The Democrats are set to have a 51-49 majority in January. If Johnson were unable to attend the organizational Senate session and cast a vote, the Democrats and one independent could still vote 50-49 to install Reid and other Democrats in positions of leadership for the next two years.

But Johnson's resignation or death would most likely mean a Republican replacement and therefore a 50-50 split, with Republican Vice President Dick Cheney, who serves as president of the Senate, holding the tie-breaking vote.

Eisold said that Johnson had sustained an intracerebral bleed caused by a malformation of arteries, and that he underwent surgery to evacuate the blood. He said Johnson's surgery was successful and that, as of late Thursday, he had "continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course." Specialists say it can take days to wake up after the kind of emergency surgery Johnson underwent late Wednesday.

More than 90 percent of patients who suffer a brain hemorrhage like Johnson's make a good recovery, though it is common for that process to take several months, experts said. Key points to watch will be whether the senator can hold a conversation, make normal movements and avoid a potentially fatal recurrence of bleeding.

"This condition has a better prognosis than most serious illnesses," said Dr. Matthew Fink, chief of stroke and critical care neurology at the New York-Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center.

Although Johnson's office said Wednesday that he did not have a stroke, medical experts said that is the correct term whenever a patient experiences bleeding in the brain, as Johnson did. In his case, the stroke stemmed from a rare condition in which some major arteries and veins in the brain are connected directly, rather than through a series of smaller blood vessels.

That direct connection produces strain akin to plugging a home appliance into a main power generator, said Dr. Mark Alberts, head of the stroke program at Northwestern University. Over time the strain can weaken veins in the brain and cause them to rupture.

Assuming Johnson's medical team caught his hemorrhage at an early stage, Johnson stands a good chance of recovering in a period of weeks to months, doctors said.

"It sounds like he's stable, which is good," Alberts said.

Once Johnson's doctors are sure they have treated the immediate problem of bleeding, they will need to fix, possibly through more surgery, his underlying disorder, whose technical name is arteriovenous malformation, or AVM. Only thorough treatment of the disorder can ensure that a patient will not experience bleeding again.

Although it is rare for patients to come through a serious stroke with no long-term effects, experts said Johnson's problem is somewhat less likely to produce long-term problems than a stroke caused by blockage of a major artery.

Just weeks after the fall elections spelled a dramatic turnaround of the House and Senate from Republican to Democratic control, Johnson's health scare could possibly mean a surprising reversal for the upper chamber.

But senators have held on to their seats despite serious health problems. One former South Dakota senator, Republican Karl Mundt, had a stroke in 1969 and then refused to resign until January 1973, said Senate historian Richard Baker.

More recently, Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.) suffered a heart attack in 1991 and was out from April until September of that year. Sen. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) was out for several months in 1988 as a result of a brain aneurysm, Baker said.

And in 1964 Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.)—unable to speak because of a brain tumor—cast a critical "aye" vote for the Civil Rights Act by solemnly lifting his hand and pointing to his eye to signal affirmation.

Nothing in the Constitution, in law or in Senate rules provides for the ouster of a member for health reasons, Baker said.

"The Constitution has specific requirements for a senator, such as age, citizenship and residency, but not robust health," he said. "The idea was to give the Senate and its members independence."

Only once in history has control of the chamber changed in the middle of a session. In 2001, Sen. James Jeffords of Vermont, elected as a Republican, announced he would instead caucus with Democrats as an independent, giving Democrats a one-vote majority. And because of the narrowness of the majority prior to that, Democratic leaders had negotiated a deal at the beginning of that Congress that they would change party control if the majority shifted during the term, according to Baker.

In this case, Republicans may still try to negotiate such a deal before the new Congress is sworn in.

Christi Parsons reported from Washington and Jeremy Manier reported from Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0106723

Senate Is Loath To Remove Disabled Members (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Carter Glass was the dean of the U.S. Senate and chairman of the Appropriations Committee when he became incapacitated with heart trouble in the 1940s. The enfeebled octogenarian was absent from the Capitol for four full years, unable to answer a roll call on the Senate floor, cut off from all visitors by his wife.

Local newspapers began to clamor for his resignation, but the Virginia Democrat refused. His Senate colleagues allowed Glass to keep his seat, and even his powerful chairmanship.

That was more than a half-century ago, but it illustrates an enduring tradition in one of the world's most exclusive clubs: Never has the Senate forced its members out of office because they have become physically or mentally incapable of serving.

That hands-off protocol could be a big boon to Democrats today, as they ponder the possibility that Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., could be incapacitated for months or longer following emergency surgery to treat bleeding in his brain. If Johnson dies or leaves office before the new Congress convenes next month, it will erase Democrats' fragile 51-49 majority and return control of the Senate to Republicans.

But if he survives and history is any guide, the only force that will drive Johnson from office before his term expires in 2008 is a decision by the senator himself or his family. The Senate -- not state governors or voters -- has the constitutional power to force a member out, but has been loathe to use it.

"No one in the Senate wants to have that kind of responsibility for judging whether another member is capable or not," said Don Ritchie, associate Senate historian. "The Senate is a family, as well as a club. There's a real sense of sticking together."

There have been a couple of examples of House seats being declared vacant because of inability to serve, but they involved cases where lawmakers were elected while incapacitated and were unable to take their seats. Most recently, Gladys Noon Spellman, a longtime House member from Maryland, suffered a heart attack and went into a coma shortly before election day in 1980, but her name remained on the ballot and she was re-elected. Because she was still in a coma when the new Congress convened, she was unable to be sworn in, and her family eventually asked that her seat be declared vacant.

Aging and infirm politicians are able to linger in the halls of Congress in part because they are surrounded by armies of aides who can obscure a distressing reality, both to the public and the politician.

Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who turned 100 while still in office, was so frail at the end of his career that he could hardly walk onto the Senate floor without gripping the arms of staff members.

"They made sure he showed up to vote, and that's what counted," said Ritchie.

But history is replete with examples of other infirm lawmakers who could not even show up to vote, talk or maintain consciousness -- and yet were allowed to keep their seats.

In the mid-19th century, Sen. Charles Sumner of Massachusetts was absent from the Senate for more than three years after being beaten with a cane on the Senate floor by Rep. Preston Brooks of South Carolina in a dispute over slavery. Despite Sumner's incapacity, the Massachusetts legislature re-elected him.

In 1964, a California Democrat voted in the Senate even when he could not speak. Clair Engle, partially paralyzed by repeated operations for brain cancer, was carried onto the Senate floor to cast a key vote on the Civil Rights Act. Voiceless, he pointed to his eye to signify an "aye" vote.

A previous occupant of Johnson's South Dakota Senate seat, Karl E. Mundt, suffered a debilitating stroke in 1969 and was in a coma for a long period of time. He refused to resign, even under pressure from fellow Republicans who feared the GOP would lose the governorship in 1970, and remained formally in his seat until his term expired in 1973.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., was away from the Senate for seven months in 1988 for brain surgery. While recovering at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, he shared a suite for three months with another incapacitated senator, John Stennis, D-Miss., who continued as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee even after the loss of a leg to cancer slowed him considerably.

When Stennis' predecessor as Appropriations chairman, Glass, refused to quit, Virginia newspapers were near unanimous in calling for his retirement. The Staunton News Leader led the call with a mid-1945 editorial: "It is plainly the duty of Mrs. Carter Glass to make it clear to her husband that his age and physical condition disbar him from further duty in the Senate and to prevail on him to tender his resignation."

DOJ_NMG_0106724

But Glass hung on, even though he was away from the Senate from June 1942 until his death in May 1946. It probably helped that he remained nominally in charge of the committee that holds Congress' purse strings.

"He was a powerful, influential senator, and no one wanted to remove him," said Ritchie.

Democratic Sen. Johnson In Stable Condition After Brain Surgery (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) was in stable condition yesterday after emergency brain surgery, prompting optimism among family and friends and at least temporarily stanching speculation that the Democrats' narrow control of the next Senate might be in jeopardy.

But Capitol aides predicted tough negotiations between the two parties early next month over the rules for organizing the new Senate, particularly those that would address the possibility that a Democratic seat could be vacated because of illness or death.

Even if Johnson recuperates fully, aides and advisers said, Democrats will be painfully aware that they remain one fatal illness -- or one party switch -- away from a Republican claim on their majority, which has stood at 51 to 49 since the Nov. 7 elections. The two parties may clash in particular over an agreement made in 2001 that enabled Democrats to seize the majority after one Republican senator switched parties. Republicans are likely to try to revive the precedent, according to the congressional aides, and Democrats are likely to fight it.

Johnson, 59, was rushed from his Senate office to George Washington University Hospital on Wednesday, suffering from bleeding in the brain caused by a congenital tangle of blood vessels, the U.S. Capitol physician said yesterday.

"He underwent successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation," said the physician, Adm. John Eisold. He later said that Johnson "has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required."

Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and former party leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) visited Johnson at the hospital Wednesday and yesterday. Reid later told reporters at the Capitol that Johnson "really looks good" and was receiving "the best care." He declined to say whether Johnson was conscious during his visits.

The Constitution provides for governors to fill U.S. Senate vacancies, whereas House vacancies must be filled through elections. Johnson can remain in the Senate through the end of his term, regardless of his medical condition. In recent decades, senators have missed up to four years of votes because of illness or old age without giving up their seats.

Should Johnson's seat become vacant before Jan. 4, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could replace him with a Republican, resulting in a 50-50 Senate when Congress opens. Vice President Cheney, as Senate president, would break tie votes in the Republicans' favor, giving them the majority.

If Johnson's or any other Democrat's seat switches to the GOP after the new Senate is underway, however, even Cheney's tie-breaking powers could leave Republicans facing a difficult-to-impossible battle to seize control. Barring an agreement to the contrary, Democrats could filibuster efforts to reorganize the chamber and proceed to assume committee chairmanships.

"There isn't a thing that's changed," Reid said of his party's 51 to 49 edge. Both parties have made their committee assignments, he said, and he is "getting ready for the next year."

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) told Fox News: "My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back and we'll go to work. You know, I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

Although Johnson's illness was the talk of Washington yesterday, politicians in both parties refrained from publicly discussing how the two-term senator's illness might affect the incoming 110th Congress. A few Democratic lobbyists and their spouses were dining Wednesday night at Sesto Senso, an Italian restaurant near Dupont Circle. As they discussed Johnson's condition, they folded their hands as if praying for him, a gesture that appeared tinged with political as well as heartfelt sentiments.

DOJ_NMG_0106725

Daschle said in an interview: "I am encouraged. He is doing reasonably well. . . . There was progress today."

Reid would not entertain the possibility that Johnson's illness could conceivably cost his party the Senate majority before the 110th Congress convenes in three weeks.

Senate seats can become vacant between elections only by death or resignation. "There is no mechanism" to remove even a severely incapacitated senator against his or her will, said the associate Senate historian, Donald A. Ritchie. In the 1940s, he said, then-Sen. Carter Glass of Virginia missed four years of votes and other Senate activities yet held his seat.

In 1964, Ritchie said, then-Sen. Clair Engle of California was wheeled into the chamber despite suffering from a brain tumor. "He pointed to his eye" to indicate his "aye" vote for an important measure, Ritchie said.

If Johnson's recovery should leave him unable to attend the new Congress's opening, Democrats would still hold a 50 to 49 voting edge and the majority.

Republicans have health concerns of their own. Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) won election to a third six-year term on Nov. 7 and began treatment for leukemia two days later. A Senate vacancy in Wyoming would be filled by Gov. Dave Freudenthal, a Democrat.

In 2001, Republicans controlled a 50-50 Senate, thanks to Cheney's tie-breaking authority. The chamber suddenly shifted to Democratic control when Sen. James M. Jeffords (Vt.) left the GOP and caucused with Democrats.

Republicans might have managed to thwart the power shift had they not agreed earlier to an organizing resolution granting majority privileges to Democrats if they achieved a numerical advantage. Without that agreement, Republicans might have been able to filibuster or otherwise block Democrats' efforts to reorganize the chamber in their favor.

Daschle negotiated the 2001 deal for his party. Asked if GOP leaders are likely to seek similar language in the next Senate's organizing resolution, Daschle said via e-mail that "it is reasonable to expect that the precedents we set in '00 and '01 will serve as a guide in '07."

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) declined to comment on such matters yesterday, saying only that he wished Johnson a full and speedy recovery.

Reid's and McConnell's efforts to negotiate the next Senate's organizing rules could prove challenging, because both parties are in a position to block the rules' adoption through unlimited debate. Republicans might cite the 2001 language as a precedent, said Reid spokesman Jim Manley, but Democrats will note that the rules for the subsequent Senate -- which Republicans controlled 51 to 49 -- contained no such provisions.

Congressional aides said the 51 to 49 Democratic edge could play into the hands of senators such as Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.). Elected last month as an independent after losing the Democratic primary, he is the subject of frequent speculation that he might emulate Jeffords by joining the GOP if his Democratic colleagues displease him.

Senators may rush to support Lieberman's bills, one GOP aide said yesterday, "and if he holds a fundraiser, everybody will be there."

Experts Optimistic About Senator's Recovery (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

The experience of other people who have suffered bleeding from arteriovenous malformations inside the brain suggests that Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who underwent emergency surgery for that condition Wednesday night, has at least a 50-50 chance of full recovery.

The 59-year-old senator may need another operation or other procedure to completely defuse the abnormal tangle of blood vessels inside his head that he was born with. But statistics suggest that his chance of suffering another bleeding episode in the near future is less than 10 percent and that his brain function is likely to improve from now on.

"I think his prognosis for recovery is very good," said Laligam Sekhar, a neurosurgeon at Harborview Medical Center in Seattle and former chairman of neurosurgery at George Washington Medical Center, where Johnson was treated. "Any disability now is going to depend on where the malformation was and what his condition was going into surgery."

DOJ_NMG_0106726

Johnson's physicians provided no details on his condition. But the senator's office said he responded to his wife's voice and held her hand, and the Capitol physician, John Eisold, said he is "appropriately responsive to both word and touch" -- suggesting that he is conscious and may be able to communicate.

Many people harbor arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) unknowingly for decades. When they bleed, 10 to 15 percent of patients die within hours, 35 percent suffer permanent disability and about 50 percent recover more or less completely. The prevalence of AVMs is not known with precision, though one estimate is that about one-half of 1 percent of people have them.

They are often described as looking like "a bag of worms." They can be different sizes and may grow over time, though most apparently arise from a defect present at birth.

As their name implies, arteriovenous malformations are abnormal growths in which arteries feed directly into veins. Blood in the arteries is under high pressure, and the veins are not built to handle the pressure. Over time, the stress can cause them to leak -- or burst.

Johnson's first reported symptom was a sudden loss of coherent speech while he was on a telephone call with reporters. That suggests he may have had a small bleed near the brain's speech center, which in 90 percent of people is on the left.

Outside its normal channels, blood is highly irritating and can cause small arteries to clamp shut and temporarily starve local areas of oxygen and nutrients. A less likely explanation is that irritation by the AVM itself caused a localized seizure. In either case, a small part of the brain could be stunned and its functions temporarily lost.

Johnson did not immediately undergo surgery, which suggests that his symptoms diminished after he went to the hospital. Details of his treatment were not released, but he almost certainly had brain scans that revealed both the bleeding and the presence of the malformation.

Later, however, he was taken to the operating room. That suggests something happened -- probably a new hemorrhage and new symptoms.

"With an AVM, you are not rushed to emergency surgery unless you either rebleed or the consequences of the hemorrhage force you to operate because the pressure inside the brain is too high," said Robert Spetzler, head of the Barrow Neurological Institute at St. Joseph's Hospital in Phoenix and a leading authority on treating the condition.

The purpose of the operation would have been to reduce the pressure by taking out the clotted blood and to stop the bleeding. Some or all of the AVM might also have been removed, though that is often hard to do.

The surgery is difficult and dangerous. If the bleeding is coming from a weakened vein "downstream" of the defect, the surgeon cannot simply tie off that area. High-pressure blood will continue to flow in and will have an even smaller route out -- raising the pressure in the malformation even higher.

"If he ligates the vein first, it just basically explodes in his face," said William O. Bank, chief of neuro-interventional radiology at Washington Hospital Center.

Instead, the surgeon must cut off the flow in the arteries feeding the malformation. There may be many; if the bleeding is extensive, they may be hard to find; and getting to them may require touching the already highly unstable defect.

"It becomes very technically difficult," Bank said.

If the bleeding can be stopped, most surgeons will leave definitive treatment of the AVM for another day, once the patient has recovered. A neuroradiologist will thread a catheter from an artery in the thigh into the brain and release a dye that will fill the AVM and outline its structure.

The radiologist can then inject a gluelike substance that shuts down blood flow in the arteries to the AVM. Alternatively, a surgeon can cut the malformation out. AVMs can also be cauterized from outside the skull by crossing beams of gamma radiation and causing pinpoint burns in the blood vessels, which then form scar tissue and close off.

An AVM has about a 10 percent chance of bleeding a second time in the six months after a first hemorrhage. After that, the risk falls to what it is before the first bleed -- about 3 to 4 percent a year.

Senator's Chances Are Mixed For Recovery From Rare Disorder (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106727

WASHINGTON -- The blood-vessel abnormality that put South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson in the hospital is relatively rare. Patients who suffer from it may have a good shot at recovery, depending on how much bleeding they have suffered.

Arteriovenous malformations, or AVMs, are tangles of blood vessels that disrupt the flow of blood and are believed in most cases to be present from birth. An estimated 300,000 Americans have AVMs of the brain or spinal cord, but only about 36,000 show symptoms, according to the National Library of Medicine, a part of the National Institutes of Health. In the case of brain AVMs, patients might experience symptoms such as headaches, seizures and visual disturbances.

One of the biggest dangers of AVMs is bleeding in the brain, as Mr. Johnson had. An estimated 5% to 10% of people with AVM ruptures die, said M. Sean Grady, chairman of the neurosurgery department at the University of Pennsylvania Health System in Philadelphia. That is much better than the 50% survival rate associated with aneurysms, he added. And when ruptures are caught early, as appears to have been the case with Mr. Johnson, quick action to repair the bleeding can improve chances for survival and recovery.

Mr. Johnson underwent a five-hour surgery to remove the blood and stabilize the AVM. A statement from Capitol physician John Eisold released late yesterday afternoon said the lawmaker had been "appropriately responsive to both word and touch."

In the coming days, doctors will begin to ascertain whether Mr. Johnson may have sustained permanent damage, how much if so, and how long he might take to recover. If he regains function quickly after surgery, recovery might take only a month or so. If he doesn't bounce back quickly, prospects for recovery are more variable and uncertain, but can take six months to a year.

"You can be hopeful about having a very good outcome," said Daniel Hanley, a professor of neurology and head of brain-injury outcomes at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. "We do know surgery can be successful; we also know it's not always successful."

Little is known about the details of Mr. Johnson's situation. And in terms of how he might have been affected long term, much depends on the extent of the bleeding he suffered and the size and location of the AVM.

Judging by the speech difficulty Mr. Johnson experienced before he was stricken, the malformation probably was on the left side of his brain, which controls speech, Dr. Grady said. Patients with damage in this area may have difficulty generating speech or may have paralysis on the right side of their bodies, he added.

Physicians can find AVMs using imaging technologies. Removal of the AVM, through surgery or other means, may be considered, but this is a matter of some debate in the medical community. Decisions have to be made on a case-by-case basis, because the surgery carries risks. The National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke, part of the NIH, is working with Columbia University to learn more about AVMs with a long-term study.

Malformation Caused Johnson's Bleeding (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson was "responsive to both word and touch" Thursday evening following emergency brain surgery but the uncertainty of his long-term prognosis casts doubt on the nation's political landscape.

Adm. John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement the two-term senator has not required further surgery since doctors at George Washington University overnight stopped bleeding. The condition, caused by a malformation of blood vessels, is congenital. It was undiagnosed in Johnson, who turns 60 on Dec. 28.

Johnson was stricken Wednesday afternoon, as he had trouble talking to reporters in a conference call. His illness comes as Democrats prepare to take control of the Senate on Jan. 4 with 51 votes, including those of two independents.

If Johnson is unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, it would be up to South Dakota's Republican Gov. Mike Rounds to appoint a replacement, presumably from his party.

That would shift the balance of power in the Senate to the GOP because Vice President Cheney, a Republican, would cast the vote to break a 50-50 tie.

Republicans at the Capitol showed no signs that they will press for Johnson to resign. Johnson, first elected in 1996, is up for re-election in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0106728

"My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back," Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who will serve as his party's deputy leader next year, said on Fox News. "I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want it to be that way."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he is continuing to organize for a Senate run by his party. "There isn't a thing that has changed," said Reid, after visiting Johnson at the hospital. "To me, he looked very good."

Wishes for Johnson's recovery came from lawmakers in both parties and President Bush.

"Our prayers are with Sen. Johnson," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "He's a great guy."

Eisold on Thursday morning called it "premature" to forecast the senator's long-term prognosis, or whether he will need more surgery. Patients with Johnson's condition frequently require a second operation to remove the problem blood vessels, according Sean Grady, chief of neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania.

Grady said such operations "can pose a very high risk" depending on where the damaged blood vessels are in the brain.

In a statement issued by Johnson's office, the senator's wife, Barbara, said her family is "encouraged and optimistic."

Birth Defect Led To Stroke In Senator, Doctors Say (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

Senator Tim Johnson suffered an unusual form of stroke, one due to bleeding into his brain from an abnormality present from birth, according to a statement from Adm. John F. Eisold, the attending physician of the Capitol, and interviews with neurological experts.

Mr. Johnson, 59, is in an intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital after undergoing emergency surgery for the stroke late Wednesday. He is being heavily sedated to rest his brain, a standard treatment after such surgery.

Mr. Johnson, a Democrat from South Dakota, is expected to be in intensive care for several days — also standard — while doctors determine if any brain damage occurred that would affect movement or intellectual ability. Admiral Eisold and experts not involved in Mr. Johnson's case said it was too early to tell how well he might recover.

Admiral Eisold and Mr. Johnson's family have not said where in the brain the bleeding occurred or how large the hemorrhage was, and they have not disclosed other factors that could be important in determining the seriousness of his illness. For example, it is not known whether doctors had previously detected the malformation in Mr. Johnson's brain.

One expert, Dr. David J. Langer of Manhattan, said that the type of stroke and the speed with which the doctors operated offered a guarded prognosis.

"The fact that he had emergency surgery after an event during the day suggests that he had bleeding that was life-threatening," said Dr. Langer, who directs cerebro-vascular neurosurgery at St. Luke's-Roosevelt, Beth Israel and Long Island College Hospital. "You don't just take the blood out to take it out, you only take it out when a life is threatened," he said, "and that means he was deteriorating in his level of consciousness. There would be no other reason for an emergency operation."

Dr. Langer said that if Mr. Johnson's condition was deteriorating rapidly, doctors most likely did not have time to obtain critical details from a magnetic resonance imaging scan and probably operated after performing a CT X-ray scan. In general, malformations of the sort that caused Mr. Johnson's stroke are best detected on M.R.I.'s.

In such circumstances, Dr. Langer said, neurosurgeons often cannot determine the cause of the bleeding until they operate.

Dr. David S. Liebeskind, associate director of the University of California, Los Angeles, Stroke Center said that surgery for arteriovenous malformations can be as complex as any involving the brain.

In Mr. Johnson's favor, said Dr. Liebeskind, is that "it sounds like they caught this problem fairly early" and "could intervene before further damage occurred."

But he and other experts said that Mr. Johnson's prognosis would depend in part on what doctors observe as they monitor and test him over the next few days.

Standard care would involve seeking evidence of swelling of his brain and signs of further bleeding as well as preventing seizures. The doctors will monitor Mr. Johnson's heart function in part because such strokes can put great stress on the body.

The doctors are expected to lighten the sedation after a few days to look for damage.

DOJ_NMG_0106729

Dr. Lee H. Schwamm, director of acute stroke care at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston, said that initial findings may not reflect a patient's long-term outcome.

Patients with mild neurological disabilities usually recover well. But patients with serious disabilities do not necessarily have a bad outcome and can recover significantly.

Studies have shown that fewer than 0.5 percent of people have arteriovenous malformations and that some forms of them are hereditary.

The malformations are characterized by a direct connection between arteries and veins. Normally, blood vessels known as capillaries serve as the connections.

Although the malformations are present from birth, it often takes years for the pressure to build to the point of rupturing.

Doctors have been detecting arteriovenous malformations more frequently since the introduction of CT and M.R.I. scans beginning in the mid-1970's. Before then, doctors had no way to detect such malformations until they bled.

The malformations are sometimes found on scans among patients who receive them after complaining of headaches and nonspecific symptoms. But many such incidentally detected malformations are small, leaving doctors uncertain whether and how to treat them. This is among the reasons that Dr. Jay P. Mohr at Columbia University is leading a federally sponsored study to determine among other things whether it is better to operate early or to watch and wait.

What Is Arteriovenous Malformation, Or AVM? (LAT)

By Thomas H. Maugh Ii

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

An arteriovenous malformation, or AVM, such as that suffered by Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is like the four-level interchange writ large — a complicated, tangled mass of blood vessels that connect arteries to veins but serve no useful purpose.

Present at birth, the tangles lie hidden and symptom-less in the brain for decades. But eventually, the constant pressure produced when the muscular arteries pump blood directly into the weaker, more fragile veins causes the veins to spring small leaks.

Often the bleeding stops spontaneously and the victim is not aware of anything other than perhaps a headache. Occasionally, the bleeding is more severe and the patient, like Johnson, suffers a full-fledged stroke.

The chances for survival and recovery depend on how soon the stroke is detected and treated and where in the brain the AVM is located.

Johnson's stroke was detected quickly when he suffered aphasia — a difficulty understanding or expressing language and completing sentences — during a telephone conference call and surgery was performed within hours.

His surgeons have not revealed where the AVM was located, so forecasting his recovery is difficult.

"We need to know where it was located, how big the blood clot was and what it was pressing on," said Dr. John Frazee, a neurosurgeon at UCLA's Geffen School of Medicine. "If it destroyed important tissue because it was deep in the brain, it could have a serious effect. If it was located peripherally, it might not do much damage at all."

The fact that Johnson is healthy, is not overweight and apparently does not suffer from hypertension increases his odds of recovery, Frazee said.

AVMs affect an estimated 300,000 Americans, according to the National Institutes of Health. Each year, about 12% of them suffer symptoms severe enough to be noticeable, and 1% die from bleeding into the brain.

Typically, the stroke produced by an AVM is less severe than that produced by an aneurysm, according to Dr. Keith Siller, medical director of the Comprehensive Stroke Care Center at NYU Medical Center in New York.

An aneurysm occurs in an artery, where the blood is under higher pressure, and a rupture can be devastating. "An AVM is more of a lower level lesion because a vein is bleeding and it is under lower pressure. Usually the prognosis is better and the disability is less than it is with an aneurysm."

There are several ways to attack an AVM, depending on where it is and the urgency of the situation. Often, interventional radiologists will begin by threading a thin catheter through an artery to the site of the AVM, where they will use beads, glue or coils to block the artery, preventing blood from reaching the weakened or bleeding area.

DOJ_NMG_0106730

Often that is sufficient to cure the problem. Sometimes, it is necessary to surgically remove the mass of tangled vessels to prevent more problems.

When the tangle is actively bleeding, the first recourse is to seal it surgically, remove clotted blood and ease pressure at the same time. But that is tricky, Siller said, because of the risk of damaging healthy brain tissue during the procedure.

Because there are no specific events that trigger bleeding in an AVM, Frazee tells surviving patients that there is no reason to change their lifestyle. He does recommend against the use of aspirin, ibuprofen and similar drugs because, if bleeding does recur, they could make it worse.

Senator's Improvement Connected To Control Of Chamber (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — With control of the Senate potentially hanging in the balance, Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson showed signs of recovering Thursday from emergency surgery to relieve bleeding in his brain.

Johnson, 59, remained in critical condition. But Adm. John Eisold, the Capitol physician, said the South Dakotan was making an "uncomplicated" recovery and did not appear to require more surgery a day after being rushed from his office to George Washington University Hospital.

As Johnson lay in the critical care unit less than three miles from Capitol Hill, senior lawmakers sought to downplay talk of a possible shift in power in the Senate. Still, Johnson's health underscored the Democrats' tenuous hold on the chamber in the two-year congressional session that begins in early January.

If Johnson dies or resigns, South Dakota's Republican governor has the power to appoint a replacement that could wipe out the 51-49 majority the Democrats won in November's election.

Because a 50-50 tie would be broken by Vice President Dick Cheney, control of the Senate would revert to Republican hands.

Speculation about such a shift coursed through the Capitol after Johnson was taken to the hospital Wednesday afternoon after he became disoriented during a conference call with reporters.

Subsequent testing found internal bleeding in his head linked to a condition known as arteriovenous malformation, a congenital defect that produces a tangle of arteries and veins. In rare cases, the condition can prove fatal.

Emergency surgery Wednesday night relieved the bleeding, according to Eisold.

In a statement released by Johnson's office, Eisold said that in the wake of the surgery, the senator "has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required."

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said in a statement that the family was "encouraged and optimistic" about her husband's recovery prospects.

Because the senator made it through the operation without incident, his odds of survival are high, experts said. However, it is unclear whether or to what extent he might be afflicted with permanent impairment.

Those with arteriovenous malformation in the brain can suffer physical weakness, speech problems or paralysis, depending on where in the brain the malformation is located.

Even if Johnson is permanently incapacitated, history suggests there is little chance he would have to relinquish his seat. The Senate never has forced a member out of office for health reasons, even when senators spent years unable to make it to the floor to cast a vote.

The political consequences if Johnson's seat were to become vacant fueled a scramble for constant updates on his health and a rush to analyze any arcane Senate rule or South Dakota law that could come into play in replacing him.

If a Republican took over the seat, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., presumably would become majority leader and the GOP would continue to determine the issues considered by the chamber. Democrats still would control the House, which the party won in November's vote, but Democratic hopes of a Congress united in challenging President Bush's policies -- especially concerning the war in Iraq -- would be dashed.

DOJ_NMG_0106731

Sen. Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat slated to become majority leader when the next Congress convenes, traveled to the hospital Wednesday night shortly after word surfaced of Johnson's health problem. Thursday morning, Reid declined to give a prognosis. "Whatever I say about his medical condition would not be enough for you," he said. He added, "He looked very good."

Elsewhere on Capitol Hill, Senate librarians were sent digging into the congressional record for information on how the chamber operated when it was split 50-50 after the 2000 elections

At that time, Republicans assumed control of the chamber and its committees because Cheney was the incoming vice president. But as the Senate convened in January 2001, leaders from both parties struck an agreement in which representation on committees and staffing for those panels were split evenly.

That accord ended five months later, when Republican Sen. James M. Jeffords of Vermont decided to become an independent who caucused with Democrats. That gave Democrats control of the chamber.

Republicans won back the majority in the 2002 election and held it in the 2004 vote.

The election code in South Dakota gives the governor the power to fill a vacant Senate seat, said Chris Nelson, the secretary of state. An election for the seat would occur in November 2008.

Johnson's term is due to expire then anyway, and GOP Gov. Mike Rounds has been mentioned as a strong potential candidate against him.

Johnson held South Dakota's lone House seat before winning election to the Senate in 1996. He barely won re-election in 2002, defeating Republican John Thune by less than 550 votes. Thune then beat Democrat Tom Daschle, the Senate minority leader, in a highly contentious battle in 2004.

Johnson's close call has made him a top target for GOP strategists eyeing the 2008 campaign.

A centrist who has largely has avoided the spotlight, Johnson gained some attention in 2002 when he voted for the invasion of Iraq at the same time his son was in theArmy. Johnson's son went on to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Sen. Johnson Seldom In The Spotlight (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, December 15, 2006

Tim Johnson is a rare senator who almost never has sought the spotlight. Asked by a local columnist if he ever tires of being described as boring, Johnson replied: Not at all.

"He's not one of the flashy stars that's always looking for the camera in D.C.," said Bill Richardson, head of the political science department at Johnson's alma mater, the University of South Dakota.

But long before the two-term senator's medical crisis this week, Johnson won national attention by keeping Democrats guessing about whether they could count on his vote.

He bucked his party by being only one of three Democrats to vote to confirm Justice Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court. He voted to ban late-term abortions. He said yes to a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning, anathema to most in his party.

And then there was perhaps the defining vote of Johnson's career: whether to authorize the use of military force in Iraq. Johnson voted yes, though he had a very personal reason to vote no: his oldest son, Brooks.

Then 32 and a staff sergeant with the Army's 101st Airborne Division, Brooks would be among the first sent to the region, Johnson knew.

"I talked to Brooks prior to this vote and his response was, 'Dad, you do what is right for the country and I'll do what is right as a soldier,'" Johnson recalled. "I said on the (Senate) floor that it's very likely I would be sending my own son into combat."

Brooks has since returned safely and had a son, one of Johnson's three young grandchildren, according to the senator's Web site.

Johnson acknowledged that some view him "as this sort of dour Scandinavian."

"But I think that we Scandinavians have a sense of humor, too," he said in a 2002 interview with The Associated Press. His wit is described by many as self-deprecating.

DOJ_NMG_0106732

Political drama was nowhere to be found in Johnson's childhood. So low-key was his family that Johnson didn't know his parents' political affiliation until he went to college (they were Democrats).

The political bug bit Tim Johnson at 17, when he attended the 1964 Republican National Convention in San Francisco. After law school, he went on to serve in the state House and Senate.

In 1986, Johnson was narrowly elected to the U.S. House seat vacated by Tom Daschle, who had been elected to the Senate.

A decade later, Johnson defeated Sen. Larry Pressler, then the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee. Johnson was barely re-elected to a second term, beating Republican John Thune by only 524 votes.

He has suffered serious illness before, battling prostate cancer in 2004. His wife, Barbara, has twice faced breast cancer. They have three children.

Columnist David Kranz of the Sioux Falls, S.D., Argus Leader — the one who asked Johnson about being considered dull — wrote that all the fuss over his medical condition "would be appalling" to the steady, unassuming senator.

An Unfamiliar Spotlight For An Unassuming Senator (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D., Dec. 14 — Thanks to an intersection of misfortune and simple arithmetic, the illness of Senator Tim Johnson, a no-frills, no-fanfare Democrat and a fourth-generation South Dakotan, swiftly turned into a topic for speculation across the country.

But the last place Mr. Johnson, 59, would ever want to find himself, people in his state say, is smack in the center of the national spotlight, and especially over the partisan split in the Senate. And the same holds true for many ordinary South Dakotans.

Here in a state of about 770,000, people said they were reeling on Thursday from the prospect of being thrust into a national political scramble, repulsed by all the talk in Washington of possible succession, and, most of all, waiting anxiously for news about the health of the senator many residents simply call Tim.

"He works quietly — silently," said Jan Nicolay, a former Republican legislator who served in the statehouse in Pierre when Mr. Johnson was a lawmaker there. "He doesn't do grandstanding and he never looks for publicity. He's a quiet, behind-the-scenes worker who doesn't play party politics and who wouldn't like all this attention one bit."

In Pierre, Sioux Falls and Vermillion, Mr. Johnson's hometown, political leaders from both parties refused to speculate about what could happen if he were not to return to the Senate.

John Thune, the state's other senator and a Republican, issued a brief statement encouraging South Dakotans to keep Mr. Johnson in their prayers. Russ Levsen, a spokesman for Representative Stephanie Herseth, a Democrat and the state's only member of the House, said she had issued a similar plea, as did Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican.

But beyond the prayers, most political leaders said little, or nothing — at least not publicly.

"South Dakotans find all this talk of succession to be completely unnecessary and distasteful at this point," Mr. Levsen said.

In the case of a vacancy in the Senate, state law calls for Mr. Rounds to appoint a replacement for the remainder of the term.

Some historians here pointed to another health crisis, in which the provision was never used: In 1969, Senator Karl Mundt, Republican of South Dakota, suffered a debilitating stroke, but remained in office for four more years.

In South Dakota, Republicans control both the House and the Senate, and the state has generally voted Republican for president, most recently giving President Bush nearly 60 percent of the vote in 2004.

But it is also a state where Democrats, like former Senator Tom Daschle, Ms. Herseth and Mr. Johnson have thrived — mostly, people here say, on their individual appeal.

"The truth is, if you asked most people here what party Tim Johnson belongs to, they would tell you they don't know," said David Kranz, the longtime political columnist for The Argus Leader of Sioux Falls. "When people say 'Why has he done so well?' the answer is that he really has never done anything that made people mad. And he isn't real loud and noisy about it, but he doesn't always vote with his party."

DOJ_NMG_0106733

Mr. Johnson, who earlier served in the State Legislature and the United States House, has cast votes, Mr. Kranz said, that may not have played well within his party nationally but that South Dakotans largely supported. He voted to confirm Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court and for President Bush's tax cuts.

Here, Mr. Johnson is the guy who will sit for hours to talk, not run off when the cameras turn off; the great-grandson of a South Dakotan who homesteaded near Centerville; the man whose family has "already taken its share" (cancer both for him and his wife, Barbara, and deployments for their military son, Brooks, to places including Iraq).

Never flashy, never loud, maybe even a tad dull.

"He's a fine young man," said Donna Schafer, a Republican state legislator who, like so many other people here, has a personal link to Mr. Johnson's family. (She taught one of his sons in school years ago.) "I was out with a group last night — Republicans and Democrats — and everyone of them was just struck at how tragic this is."

House Considers Independent Ethics Panel (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, December 15, 2006

House leaders are creating a bipartisan task force on whether to establish an independent ethics panel to police the House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said Thursday.

Pelosi, D-Calif., said Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio has agreed to the idea. The task force has not been set up yet, but it will be expected to report back in March, she said.

Pelosi offered no details on what the outside ethics group might look like, saying that would be up to the task force.

"There is no question that the ethics process in the last couple of years has lost the confidence of the American people," Pelosi told a news conference. "I'm hopeful that it's possible that we can have an outside entity that will restore that confidence."

Congress has been hit by a series of ethical black eyes, including the page scandal, the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, and the bribery scandal that sent former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

The House ethics committee has been largely inactive throughout. It concluded last week that Republican lawmakers and aides failed for a decade to protect male pages from sexual come-ons by former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., but that no rules were broken and no one should be punished.

Establishment of a permanent outside enforcement entity has been a priority of ethics reformers, but such proposals have failed to become law in the past. In March, the Senate voted 67-30 to reject creation of an Office of Public Integrity to oversee ethics violations by lawmakers.

Among the no votes were incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who will head the Senate Rules Committee, which has jurisdiction over ethics and lobbying.

Feinstein is concerned that an outside panel could be abused by people aiming to publicize grudges, spokesman Howard Gantman said. She will not include the proposal in ethics legislation she is introducing next month but is considering holding a hearing on such ideas.

Members of the Senate ethics committee have objected to an outside panel, saying they could investigate wrongdoing themselves. Some lawmakers also believe the Constitution gives members of Congress the responsibility to police themselves, not give the job to outsiders.

Some senators plan to revive the public integrity office idea next year, including Republican Susan Collins of Maine and Democrats Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Democrats have complained about a "Republican culture of corruption," a theme of November's elections in which they wrested control of Congress from the GOP. They promised to vigorously pursue an ethics overhaul; Pelosi pledged to enact lobbying changes as part of her agenda for Congress' first 100 legislative hours.

Proposals include banning lobbyist-paid meals and gifts and privately funded travel, forcing lobbyists to disclose more of their activities and requiring lawmakers and senior staff to wait two years instead of one to lobby their former colleagues after leaving Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0106734

Democrats also want to make lawmakers disclose authorship of "earmarks," the home state spending projects often slipped into bills with little disclosure. Lawmakers would have to disclose any post-employment job negotiations.

Bills that would put in place some of these changes passed the House and Senate this year, but negotiators could not reach agreement on final legislation. The efforts were criticized as too weak by watchdog groups.

Fred Wertheimer, president of the ethics watchdog group Democracy 21, welcomed Pelosi's proposal. "Unless we replace the current failed enforcement process with a new one, we face the same problem of ethics rules being ignored that we've seen in the past," he said.

For at least one of Pelosi's House Democrats, her plan did not go far enough.

"I would conclude that the study process is unnecessary," said Rep. Mike Castle, D-Del., contending an outside enforcement entity should be offered as part of Pelosi's first 100 hours. "My goal is to make this ethics process as strong as possible, and that doesn't include studies — it only includes action."

First Steps Toward Ethics Reform In Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON

Even as Democrats vowed this week to tackle ethics reform head on when they take up the gavels on Capitol Hill in January, they are already wary of land mines that could shatter their bid to rebuild Congress's image.

Citing the mandate from voters in the midterm elections to clean up a culture of corruption, incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi promised a sweeping reform agenda Thursday, including a first-ever "outside enforcement mechanism" for congressional ethics.

"The ethics process over the last few years has lost the confidence of the American people," she said in a briefing with reporters, where she predicted the "most honest and open Congress in history."

Other elements unveiled this week include a ban on "earmarks" or member projects for fiscal year 2007, a five-day congressional workweek to better process "the people's business," and a new oversight panel on intelligence along the lines proposed by the 9/11 Commission back in 2004.

But even as House Democrats try to burnish their image on ethics, they are being forced to work around the legal woes of their own members, including two in key positions.

The reelection of Rep. William Jefferson (D) of Louisiana in a runoff, despite the $90,000 in possible payoffs that federal investigators found stashed in his home freezer, stunned many of his colleagues, who had expected the eight-term lawmaker to lose the contest. To defuse criticism, Ms. Pelosi and the Democratic Steering Committee denied Mr. Jefferson his request to keep a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, pending the outcome of a federal investigation.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D) of West Virginia is facing a federal investigation over earmarks he sponsored and profitable real estate deals. He is in line to chair the subcommittee that oversees the budget of the agency that is investigating him - a decision now pending in the House Appropriations Committee. Some members of the Congressional Black Caucus say that Democrats are holding Mr. Jefferson, who is black, to a higher standard than they are Mr. Mollohan. Republicans say both cases signal that Democrats face their own culture-of-corruption issues.

Other potential pitfalls for ethics reform are the unfinished spending bills, including the thousands of earmarks attached to them.

Democrats could have just slogged through the bills, as Republicans did with leftover spending legislation when the GOP took back control of the Senate in 2003. Instead, Democrats last week opted to pass a joint resolution that is expected to keep spending for FY 2007 at the level of FY 2006 - with some adjustments - and put a hold on earmarks until FY 2008.

"It is not a perfect solution, but it is the best available given the fiscal mess the 109th Congress has left behind," said Pelosi and incoming Senate majority leader Harry Reid in a joint statement.

DOJ_NMG_0106735

Fiscal watchdog groups praised the decision to eliminate earmarks for this fiscal year, but say Democrats will need to be more explicit about reforms than they have been to date if they are to clean up the corruption and appearance of wrongdoing associated with the earmark process.

"There is a serious intent to make some dramatic changes in how Congress operates, but whether here is the political will to enact proposals that will actually do that remains to be seen," says Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a new coalition to promote transparency and accountability in government.

Others are waiting to see the details. "Democrats need to do more than disclose the sponsor and recipient of an earmark. They must also limit the number and amount that can be spent on earmarks, prohibit earmarks not subject to a committee hearing...," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. Only two Democrats voted last week to require the Pentagon to evaluate the effectiveness of earmarks, he adds.

In the Senate, meanwhile, Democrats are still working on a comprehensive ethics package. "Ethics, lobby, and earmark reform will be the first bill we'll do," says Democratic leadership spokesman Jim Manley.

But this week, they are also concerned about whether they will lose control of the chamber. Sen. Tim Johnson (D) of South Dakota was rushed to the hospital for emergency surgery Wednesday. If he is unable to serve, the Republican governor of South Dakota, Mike Rounds, would appoint his replacement. Should he choose a member of his own party, the new Senate, which is divided 51-49, would become 50-50. Because Vice President Dick Cheney would cast any tying vote, the Senate would revert to Republican control. In the past, however, senators have served despite being incapacitated.

"No one has ever been removed from the Senate on the grounds of physical or mental incapacity. It's only been on the grounds of treason," says Senate historian Richard Baker. The Senate expelled 14 senators for treason during the Civil War - the last time a senator has been removed. Over the years, senators have been absent for months at a time when coping with disability. "The Constitution is specific on qualifications to be a senator, and one of them is not robust good health," Mr. Baker adds.

Page Board Chair Wants Monthly Meetings (AP)

By Ken Thomas

AP, December 15, 2006

The incoming chairman of the congressional Page Board said Thursday he hopes the panel will meet monthly and expand its membership to help prevent another scandal.

Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., who will become the panel's chairman when Democrats take control of the House next year, said the board should meet regularly with directors of the program's school and dormitory and those who supervise the students during their work in Congress.

"I think it's a very, very good program and the problem with the program was not the pages — it was a member and those who should have been more vigilant when this thing broke," Kildee said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Kildee said he supports incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's call reform of the program. Pelosi said Monday she intends to introduce legislation early in the new Congress to increase oversight of the page program, require regular board meetings and add a parent of a current and a former page to the board.

An ethics committee report last week on former Rep. Mark Foley's improper sexual advances toward male pages found no evidence that lawmakers or aides violated any rules. But it noted a pattern of conduct among many people involved "to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences" of Foley's conduct.

Foley, R-Fla., abruptly resigned his seat Sept. 29 after sexually explicit computer messages sent to teenage pages were disclosed in media reports.

Kildee, a former high school Latin teacher and board member since 1985, said the panel had "gone six or seven months without meeting" before the public learned of Foley's salacious messages and "a lot of members weren't even aware that there even was a page board."

"Hopefully, though, the whole Congress will learn from this and recognize what our responsibility is," Kildee said. He said Congress has "an obligation" to approve reforms to the program shortly after it convenes in January.

DOJ_NMG_0106736

After Foley's resignation, Kildee criticized the Page Board chairman, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., for not informing other board members about over-friendly e-mails from Foley to a page.

According to the report, Shimkus and the House clerk met with Foley in the fall of 2005 about e-mails sent to one page, but Foley assured them he was only acting as a mentor to the boy. After Foley resigned, Shimkus told the other Republican member of the Page Board — Rep. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia — why he never informed Kildee.

Shimkus said, "Dale's a nice guy, but he's a Democrat, and I was afraid it would be blown out of proportion," the report said.

Kildee said he would "have called for a page board meeting. When you have a 52-year-old person writing even what they thought at the time were overfriendly text messages to 16-, 17-year-olds, that should raise some alarm bells."

The Page Board consists of three lawmakers, the House clerk and the sergeant at arms. The board does not run the program day-to-day but watches over it. Teenagers from around the country, sponsored by lawmakers, attend a congressional school and perform messenger jobs.

Pelosi: GOP To Get 1 Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills (WSJ/DJ)

By John Godfrey

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--House Republicans will be given only one chance to amend or debate a plan to curb oil and gas subsidies and other Democratic priorities, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Thursday.

Pelosi is to become Speaker of the House when Democrats take majority control of the House in January. Legislation cutting subsidies to oil and gas producers is one of Democrats' top six priorities for their first 100 hours in power.

Pelosi said Thursday that the oil and gas legislation along with bills cutting student loan interest rates and requiring the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for Medicare would not go through the normal legislative process.

Normally, legislation is subjected to hearings and then considered by the committees of jurisdiction before being brought to the House floor. Pelosi said Thursday that because the measures are well known and have been voted upon in the past, the bills would be brought directly to the House floor for a vote.

And Republicans would be given only one chance to amend the bill through a procedural maneuver known as a motion to recommit, Pelosi said.

"They would have the motion to recommit," Pelosi said.

"These are not new to the Congress," Pelosi said at a press conference Thursday morning.

"All of these have been vetted through the committee process, some of them have even passed on the floor," Pelosi said.

For example, legislation requiring oil companies to pay royalties on federal leases when the price of oil surpasses $40 per barrel has "passed the House not once, but twice."

Likewise, the House has voted in various forms to dapprove an increase in the federal minimum wage and to increase funding for stem cell research, Pelosi said.

But because the details of their plans have not been made public, it is unclear whether portions of those plans won't have been vetted.

For example, Democrats have promised to offset the cost of cutting student loan interest rates.

The most likely target will be student loan subsidies paid by the federal government to lenders. While Congress pared back those subsidies in a budget bill this year, Congress has not debated in the past the estimated $12 billion in further cuts that would be required.

GOP Misses Chance To Reshape Environmental Laws (LAT)

By Bettina Boxall

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

If ever there was a Congress in which Republicans were positioned to remake the nation's environmental laws, it was the 109th. But by the time the session ended last week, the GOP's environmental agenda had been largely thwarted.

Whether it was rewriting the Endangered Species Act, opening up most of the nation's coastline to oil and gas drilling, or selling off public lands in the West, Republicans failed to enact a range of ambitious proposals.

DOJ_NMG_0106737

"It was the best chance for Republican-shaped initiatives for as long we can remember," said Daniel Kemmis, senior fellow at the Center for the Rocky Mountain West at the University of Montana.

Republicans began the session with majorities in both chambers, a sympathetic president, and a tough-talking property rights champion in charge of a key environmental committee.

That they went home empty-handed, Kemmis and others say, is testament to a changing, greening West; the pitfalls of overreaching; and an emerging alliance between environmentalists and a traditional GOP base, hunters and anglers.

"The so-called hook-and-bullet constituency has become more concerned about protecting public lands, protecting open space in general. I don't think that's going to change," he said.

Though Republicans came close to opening up Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, the goal eluded them.

Ben Lieberman of the conservative Heritage Foundation called it "quite striking" that the legislation died despite $3-a-gallon gasoline, an oilman in the White House and growing public support. The GOP expanded oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico but did not muster enough votes to lift a long-standing federal ban on new oil and gas drilling off much of the nation's coastline.

"I just don't think the Republicans made the case that these changes could be made in an environmentally friendly way and in a way that would make a real difference at the pump or in terms of electricity prices," Lieberman said.

A proposal by House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy) to slash royalty payments on oil shale production on federal land died. So too did a House-passed bill that would have restricted environmental reviews of salvage logging to remove dead or dying trees in national forests.

Legislation tying the designation of new federal wilderness areas in Utah and Idaho to the sale of public lands for development never reached Bush's desk. The administration proposal to raise money for a rural schools program by selling off national forest parcels was scrapped in the face of congressional opposition.

And Pombo's legislation to overhaul the Endangered Species Act, requiring the government to pay property owners if the law restricted their land use, was blocked in the Senate by moderate Republican Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

Neither Pombo nor Chafee will return to the Capitol to continue their duel, as both were defeated in the midterm election.

As House resources chairman, Pombo, a passionate foe of the Endangered Species Act and a defender of property rights, was in a key position to advance his agenda. But his reputation for anti-environmental rhetoric made the seven-term incumbent a polarizing figure.

"I think anything Pombo did would have been perceived as overreaching because people expected his committee to gut the ESA. But I really don't see his bill as overreaching," said Terry Anderson, a senior fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "I think it was in large part a dose of what conservative conservation would be about."

Pombo also talked of revamping another pillar of environmental law, the National Environmental Policy Act. That effort never made it out of committee.

"It's really hard to get controversial bills passed; it takes a long time," mused Myron Ebell, an energy expert with the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a pro-market group.

Wilderness Society Executive Vice President Don Barry, an Interior Department official under the Clinton administration, said the GOP had its own boldness to blame for the string of defeats.

He cited the Bush administration's proposal to auction national forest parcels. The idea inflamed sportsmen groups concerned about losing access to public land and was eventually disowned by even conservative Republican senators in the West.

"I think it was a huge miscalculation," Barry said. "They found the hunting and fishing community just totally in revolt. It blew up in their faces, and the next thing you know, you have people like [Montana GOP Sen.] Conrad Burns denouncing it."

The GOP won passage of forest thinning legislation in 2003, and made a variety of other gains, though most of them resulted from the Bush administration's use of executive power.

The administration revoked a ban on snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park; expedited oil and gas drilling on western federal lands, including areas nominated for wilderness protection; and rewrote air pollution regulations at the oil industry's request. It also dropped a Clinton-era road-building ban in national forest backcountry, although that move was recently overturned by a federal judge.

DOJ_NMG_0106738

The interior West has traditionally been a stronghold of anti-government sentiment favoring development of public lands. But the political landscape is shifting as newcomers migrate from the coasts, more Democrats get elected, and local economies diversify beyond ranching, mining and logging.

"There's been a maturing of political perspective in this part of the world," Kemmis said. "Some of it comes from new people moving in. But a lot of it just has to do with an awareness that the economy has changed. And if you're going to protect the economic viability of your community, you've got to be looking at protecting open spaces and protecting ecosystems. I think that is the deeper transformation."

Such thinking helped win last-minute passage of measures stopping new energy leasing on more than 400,000 acres on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains in Montana, as well as barring oil drilling and mining in northern New Mexico's Valle Vidal, an area popular among hunters and anglers.

If the Republicans hurt their interests by pushing for too much in the last session, therein lies a lesson for the Democrats, said Richard M. Frank, executive director of the California Center for Environmental Law & Policy at UC Berkeley.

"It is the middle on which either end of the political spectrum has to focus in actually getting any legislation of this type done," Frank said. "Only the future will tell if they'll be any more successful in developing that kind of consensus."

Fitzgerald Mum On Cheney In Leak Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 15, 2006

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said Thursday that he does not expect any government officials to refuse to testify in the CIA leak trial, but he did not specifically say whether Vice President Dick Cheney or other top White House officials were on his witness list.

Attorneys for Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, meanwhile, told a judge that two unidentified reporters may resist testifying on Libby's behalf in the case. The attorneys predicted the issue would be resolved before trial, however.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding former CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was leaked to reporters around the time that her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Cheney has said he may be called as a witness. If so, prosecutors could ask how the White House responded to those criticisms. Cheney was upset by Wilson's comments, Fitzgerald has said, and told Libby that Plame worked for the CIA.

That conversation is a key to Fitzgerald's perjury case. Libby testified that he learned about Plame's job from a reporter.

Cheney could also help prosecutors undermine Libby's defense that he was so preoccupied with national security matters, he forgot details about the less-important Plame issue. Prosecutors argue that Plame was a key concern of the vice president, and thus would have been important to Libby.

Sitting presidents, including Clinton and Ford, have testified in criminal cases but presidential historians and separation-of-powers experts said they knew of no vice president who has done so. The first President Bush was subpoenaed to testify in the Iran-Contra trial of Oliver North. At the time, Bush was Reagan's vice president, but Bush was president by the time a judge ruled he did not need to testify.

Government officials and journalists will be the key witnesses in the trial, which is scheduled to begin next month. Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert are expected to be prosecution witnesses and Libby's lawyers said in court papers Thursday that several reporters will testify on Libby's behalf.

Attorneys also said they'd subpoenaed for the tape of Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward's interview with former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Armitage has admitted he discussed Plame's job with Woodward in 2003 but said it was a passing, inadvertent comment.

Woodward's tape has been turned over to prosecutors and Libby's attorneys said they expect no objection to their subpoena.

DOJ_NMG_0106739

Cheney would be the most anticipated witness of the trial. He and Libby got to know each other when Cheney was defense secretary under the first President Bush. Libby has been extremely loyal to Cheney and, in return, had the vice president's unwavering trust.

By 2000, Libby was working as a top adviser to Cheney in the presidential campaign and then followed him to the White House. In the White House, he was known as "Cheney's Cheney" for being as trusted a problem solver for the vice president as Cheney was for Bush.

Even after Libby's indictment, Cheney called him "one of the finest men I've ever known."

Last-Minute Inserts Offer Benefits In Medicare Bill (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — By slipping four sentences into a big bill passed last week, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert secured a major change in Medicare policy avidly sought by a few health insurers, in particular a multinational company with headquarters in his home state, Illinois.

In the final hours of the 109th Congress, the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, also got special treatment for a hospice in his state. The bill did not name the hospice, but specified the Medicare provider number for the intended beneficiary, the Nathan Adelson Hospice in rural Pahrump, Nev.

Representative Bill Thomas, Republican of California, inserted a provision earmarking $40 million for a valley fever vaccine sought by his constituents, while the Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, obtained tens of millions of dollars for hospitals in his state.

These examples illustrate how power is exercised in the final, chaotic hours before Congress adjourns. Obscure provisions of interest to just a few lawmakers were quietly stuffed into a grab bag of legislation, with no indication of their parentage or purpose.

The White House has indicated that President Bush will sign the bill, which deals not only with health care but also with a variety of tax and trade issues. The bill, for example, creates a special tax depreciation allowance for property used to produce ethanol from corn stalks, regulates the use of wine names like Champagne and Chablis, and suspends the tariff on imported rayon fibers used in making certain tampons.

Mr. Hastert's provision showed up mysteriously after House and Senate negotiators had finished writing the bill. The provision was added by the House Rules Committee, just a few hours before the bill went to the House floor last week.

Congressional aides, Medicare officials and insurance lobbyists said the main proponent of the measure was the Aon Corporation and its subsidiary, Sterling Life Insurance Company. Aon, a Fortune 500 company, is based in Chicago and does business in more than 120 countries.

Under current law, Medicare beneficiaries can sign up for a prescription drug plan or a private Medicare Advantage plan from Nov. 15 to Dec. 31 each year. They have a limited ability to make changes through March 31 and are generally locked in for the remainder of the year.

Mr. Hastert's amendment permits certain Medicare Advantage plans, like Aon's, to enroll people throughout the year. Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert, said the purpose was "to get more people enrolled in Medicare Advantage plans." Al Orendorff, a spokesman for Aon, said, "We are not going to comment."

The provision could benefit several other insurers, but Larry Oday, a lawyer and lobbyist for Aon, said the company was "actively involved in consideration of this piece of legislation" and had led opposition to the lock-in requirement.

The addition of the provision infuriated Senate negotiators from both parties.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the provision did not go through the regular legislative process.

"It disturbs me that this major policy change — one that treats some plans unfairly — was included at the last minute by the House Rules Committee," Mr. Grassley said.

DOJ_NMG_0106740

The senior Democrat on the Finance Committee, Senator Max Baucus of Montana, said: "I soundly rejected this proposal during negotiations with our House colleagues. They were clearly informed of my position. Our final agreement did not include this provision."

Mr. Reid's amendment provided $3.8 million in relief to the Nathan Adelson Hospice. Medicare officials said they had overpaid the hospice and were trying to recover that amount.

Mr. Reid said the legislation would overturn "a flawed administrative ruling" by the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. The legislation retroactively designates the Adelson hospice in Pahrump as a branch of one in Las Vegas, making more money available.

Hospice trustees used their influence with the state's Congressional delegation, and the hospice retained a Washington law firm, Hogan & Hartson. But Carole A. Fisher, president of the hospice, said Mr. Reid and Nevada's Republican senator, John Ensign, "were the real champions of our cause, who ensured that we got relief from our Medicare debt."

In Tennessee, hospitals estimate that they will get at least $131 million because of the provision added by Mr. Frist, who is retiring from the Senate next month. The money will go to about 90 hospitals serving disproportionate numbers of low-income Medicaid patients and people without insurance.

Craig A. Becker, president of the Tennessee Hospital Association, said his organization had received help from an influential Washington lobbyist: Thomas A. Scully, former administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, who is now a lawyer at Alston & Bird.

The same section of the bill provides $10 million for hospitals in Hawaii. That state's senators, Daniel K. Akaka and Daniel K. Inouye, both Democrats, have been trying to get such an allotment for years.

Hawaii, like Tennessee, is exempted from many requirements of the federal Medicaid law because of a waiver granted by federal officials. The waivers give the states a great deal of freedom in setting eligibility and benefits, but do not provide the extra money available to other states for hospitals serving large numbers of poor people.

In seeking money for a vaccine against valley fever, Mr. Thomas said he was addressing a serious health problem caused by inhalation of a soil-borne fungus in southwestern states.

"The disease is especially prevalent in Kern County, Calif., which I represent," Mr. Thomas said. "Unfortunately, there is no vaccine for valley fever, and there is no private industry interest in making the investment, estimated at $40 million, needed for development of the vaccine."

Among those seeking the legislation was Sandra P. Larson, executive director of the Valley Fever Americas Foundation in Bakersfield, Calif. "Thomas is the guy who got this done for us," Ms. Larson said. "We are so appreciative."

Minority Hiring On Hill Pushed (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

The Congressional Black Caucus has asked Democratic leaders to hire more minorities to work for House committees and on lawmakers' staffs, saying the dearth of diversity on Capitol Hill is a problem.

In a letter to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and the leaders of the Democratic Steering Committee, the CBC said the party must increase the number of minorities working for committees and subcommittees, which will be controlled by Democrats.

The hiring of black, Hispanic, Asian and other minority staffers has "been a major problem" for years, said outgoing CBC Chairman Melvin Watt, North Carolina Democrat.

"All you have to do is look at the composition of committees, subcommittees and leadership staffs," Mr. Watt said, adding that the lack of diversity extends to legislators' staffs.

Although Mr. Watt did not provide numbers, committee staffers who spoke with The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity said that fewer than 50 minorities are among the hundreds of committee staffers.

That number does not include staff members of the black, Hispanic or Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses.

DOJ_NMG_0106741

Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, has promised to make minority hiring a priority for incoming committee chairman and has met with incoming CBC chairman, Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, Michigan Democrat.

"This is the right time to address this, and we will be working with the speaker to increase those numbers," Mrs. Kilpatrick said.

Despite the Democratic Party's historical ties to minorities, Capitol Hill Republicans are said to have a better reputation for hiring minorities.

According to a running joke one House staffer shared with The Times, "the only people who hire blacks and Hispanics around here are blacks, Hispanics and Republicans."

Rep. Gregory W. Meeks, New York Democrat and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, did not dispute the charge.

"I've heard it, and I've looked around and found myself scratching my head," he said. "That has been said and it is a challenge for us to make sure our numbers are better."

The mission starts with interviewing and accepting the recommendations of minority members and current staffers to build a larger pool of talent, Mr. Meeks said.

Congressional jobs, he said, are often won on the strength of who you know as opposed to what you know.

Mr. Watt said he does not think that Republicans have a more diverse staff than Democrats do, but cautioned that, "there should be no question about it" if his party is going to stand on a platform built on diversity.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, Connecticut Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Steering Committee, said there's nothing to fix.

"I don't believe there is a problem," she said, adding that minority hiring always has been and will continue to be a priority among Democrats.

"Our speaker-designate has always said that our membership on committees and our committee staffs should reflect the diversity of the country, so that has been, I think, an ongoing process and it will continue to be," she said.

A study by DiversityInc. magazine in June showed that 7.6 percent of a 1,000 Senate staff positions were held by blacks, Hispanics or Asians. No other studies have been conducted in recent years, but the diversity ratios in the House are not much better in either party, say staffers.

Chertoff Says FEMA Still Has Work To Do (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

AP, December 15, 2006

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff delivered a backhanded slap Thursday at one of his agencies, saying it should not allow red tape to interfere with helping disaster victims.

Chertoff, who listed the Hurricane Katrina response as one of the "transformative experiences" for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said there is "a lot more work to do" even though FEMA has been "retooled."

The secretary noted there still are "tens of thousands of people who suffer the lingering effects" of last year's hurricane.

"We have to make sure that FEMA does not become so enmeshed in its own bureaucratic processes sometimes that they lose sight of the need to have simple commonsense and humanity in dealing with the public," he said.

On Wednesday, a federal judge in Washington said the Bush administration's handling of a post-Katrina housing program was "a legal disaster." Two weeks ago, U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon ruled that FEMA mishandled the program and violated the constitutional rights of as many as 5,500 storm victims.

A statement from FEMA following Chertoff's comments said that in providing housing for Katrina victims, FEMA had done "something it has never done before. ... Our efforts were not perfect. ... We used the authorities, programs and policies that we had to work with and we did the right thing."

Chertoff, in remarks at George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute, said he wanted to sum up lessons learned and to look forward to the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0106742

Chertoff listed his broad goals and priorities for the coming year as protecting the country against threats; making sure critical infrastructure is "sufficiently hardened" to reduce vulnerability; building 21st-century response capabilities; and unifying his department "into a seamless whole."

Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi has promised that Democrats will take even stronger steps on homeland security.

Pelosi pledged that the Democrats would enact all the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. In addition, she said, "We'll go them (the commission) one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores."

Dow Sets Another Record Close On Strong Corporate Profits (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 14 -- Wall Street resumed its fourth-quarter rally Thursday, pushing the Dow Jones industrial average to its first close above 12,400 after a series of strong company earnings reports and a drop in unemployment claims revived investors' confidence in the economy.

The Dow rose 99.26, or 0.81 percent, to a new closing record of 12,416.76, after hitting a new trading high of 12,431.26 during the session. The Dow, which last hit a record close of 12,342.56 on Nov. 17, is up 16 percent this year. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 12.28, or 0.87 percent, to a six-year record of 1425.49, after reaching a six-year trading high of 1427.23. The Nasdaq Stock Market rose 21.44, or 0.88 percent, to 2453.85.

Wall Street, which stalled this week on interest rate and economic concerns, was reinvigorated by robust quarterly profits from Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers and Costco, as well as healthy outlooks from Citigroup and Honeywell International.

Investors were also encouraged by the Labor Department's report that the number of Americans filing for unemployment benefits fell for a second straight week. The data suggested that the economy isn't cooling as quickly as some investors feared.

Airline stocks fell because of oil prices, which rose after the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries said it was keeping its production target for now but making cuts in February. Higher energy prices were a boon to oil companies' stocks.

U.S. stocks aren't the only equities that have rallied. China's Shanghai Composite Index hit a record closing high on Thursday, and Australian and New Zealand markets also hit new marks.Movers Bear Stearns climbed $4.07, to $159.96.

Lehman Brothers slipped 29 cents, to $76.08, as investors were disappointed it didn't produce record fourth-quarter profit.

Costco rose 97 cents, to $54.11.

Citigroup gained 79 cents, to $53.11.

Honeywell rose 83 cents, to $42.69.

Continental Airlines gave up 42 cents, to $44.34.

ConocoPhillips rose $2.07, to $73.07.

Markets Go On Record-breaking Binge (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, December 15, 2006

Name just about any major stock market index and odds are it hit a record high this week.

Everything from the Dow Jones industrials, Dow utilities, small-stock Russell 2000 and NYSE composite closed at or briefly topped high-water marks Thursday as investors celebrated signs the economy is gently slowing down but not falling off a cliff.

The Dow industrials, the commonly followed market benchmark, jumped 99.26 points to 12,416.76, beating its previous high of 12,342.55 on Nov. 17 and notching its first close above 12,400.

"Holy cow, Dow," says Michael Farr, president of investment company Farr Miller & Washington. "When people go home and check their portfolios, they're going to see more money."

At the same time, though, some investors may feel they're missing out on the new-high party. It's probably not surprising the Nasdaq composite index is still more than 50% from its high, given the overheated mania for dot-coms and tech that drove it earlier in the decade. But arguably the most popular index of them all for actual investments, the Standard & Poor's 500, is still 6.7% below the high it notched in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0106743

The reasons a new high is elusive to the S&P 500, however, are the same reasons explaining why many of the other indexes are doing so well, including:

•Small-stock explosion. The fact the S&P 500 holds shares of large-company stocks is a big reason it has catching up to do. The Russell 2000 benchmark of small-company stocks is up 38% since the S&P 500 peaked. The small-stock influence is dramatic if you consider the entire market, measured by the DJ Wilshire 5000 index, is just 2.7% away from its high. Small stocks account for roughly 15% of its value, says Bob Waid of Wilshire Associates.

•Mathematical illusions. The Dow doesn't contain small-company stocks, either. But it is getting a lift from the way it is calculated: Stocks with the highest share prices get the greatest influence on the average's value. If the Dow were calculated by giving companies with the greatest market value the greatest weight, as is the norm for most indexes, including the S&P 500, it would be 13% below its high in 2000, S&P says.

•A resurging IPO market. Initial public offerings have turned in giant returns this year, gaining 9.4% on their first days and 19.0% this year, Dealogic says.

Newly public companies can't be included in the S&P 500 until they've reported quarterly results for at least a year. And most IPOs are too small to qualify anyway, so this contribution is missing. The Russell 2000 includes IPOs, and it is adding 29 more today.

S&P 500 investors will get their turn, says Jack Ablin of Harris Private Bank. "The small-cap advantage is beginning to roll over," he says. "Quality is on sale."

Dow Hits Record Over 12400 Mark Despite Oil Rise (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to another record finish, its first in nearly a month, as robust economic and profit reports sent investors scurrying to pump more money into stocks.

The Dow jumped 99.26 points, or 0.81%, to 12416.76, easily surpassing the record 12342.56 set Nov. 17. The Dow is up 15.9% so far this year, at its 19th record finish since October began. Some investors who had been betting that the Nov. 17 record would prove to be the year's high were forced to jump back in, to avoid being left behind.

The gains came despite a $1.14 jump in oil futures to $62.51 a barrel, as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries announced plans to cut oil output in February. The price jump ordinarily would have provoked worries about the impact of rebounding energy prices on consumer spending.

It was a day of stock records around the world; highs were also hit yesterday in China, Canada, Brazil and elsewhere. (See article on page C12.)

Investors now will be biting their nails as they await this morning's release of November consumer-price data, which have the potential to stifle the euphoria. Given recent economic signals that prices are under control and that economic growth is moderating, investors are betting that consumer prices will show more signs of restraint. Any suggestion to the contrary could damage the stock rally.

There was little apparent concern about that yesterday, as the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also accelerated, recording another six-year closing high. It rose 0.87%, or 12.28 points, to 1425.49, its highest finish since autumn 2000. It is up 14.2% this year, but still isn't near its record of 1527.46, set in March 2000.

"The market clearly has a very positive momentum that is going to take quite a bit to shake off," said John Caldwell, chief investment strategist at McDonald Investments, a brokerage and money-management arm of KeyCorp in Cleveland. He said that money managers are continuing to put aside doubts and jump in, fearing the market will get ahead of them.

Stocks also may have been helped by "quadruple witching," the quarterly expiration of futures and options contracts on stocks and stock indexes, which occurs at the end of this week. To balance their options exposure, traders sometimes must buy or sell stocks and stock indexes, which can exaggerate market moves and inflate trading volume.

The biggest gains came shortly after trading began, on the back of strong profit reports from brokerage firms Bear Stearns and Lehman Brothers. Honeywell International, one of the 30 stocks in the Dow industrials, forecast strong yearly profit.

DOJ_NMG_0106744

Networking-equipment developer Ciena posted its first quarterly profit in five years, exceeding analysts' expectations. Costco Wholesale also beat analysts' quarterly profit expectations, helping calm concerns about consumer spending.

Contributing to the momentum, a monthly report on regional manufacturing activity from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York leaked out a day early and then was officially released. It showed manufacturing growth slipping a bit, but holding up better than economists had expected.

A weekly report showed new jobless claims at a surprisingly low level last week, reinforcing Wednesday's strong report on November retail sales and suggesting the housing slowdown isn't hurting consumers as much as feared.

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.88%, or 21.44 points, to 2453.85, approaching a new multiyear high. It is far from its own record close of 5048.62, which also dates from March 2000. It is up 11.3% for 2006. The Russell 2000 small-stock index rose 0.69% to 794.22, just 3.20 points short of its record close on Dec. 5.

Bond prices fell and yields rose again, as the strong economic and profit news further stifled hopes that the Federal Reserve will decide to cut its target interest rate early next year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.72 billion shares, as 2,128 stocks rose and 1,206 fell.

Bonds fell2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing up the yield to 4.601%. The 30-year bond fell 17/32 to yield 4.719%.

The dollar strengthened3, to 117.83 yen, from 117.51, as the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3149 from $1.3213.

Import Prices Climb 0.2% After Two-Month Decline (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

U.S. import prices rose for the first time in three months in November despite a drop in petroleum costs.

Prices for imported goods rose 0.2%, after falling 2.3% in October and 2.2% in September, the Labor Department said Thursday. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had expected November import prices would slip by 0.1%.

In annual terms, import prices increased 1.2% from November 2005, compared with the 6.4% a year earlier.

Petroleum import prices tumbled by 1.6% last month compared to October, and rose 1.5% on the year. Excluding petroleum, import prices were up 0.7% in November versus October and 1.3% on the year.

The Federal Reserve decided this week to hold the federal-funds rate at 5.25% a fourth straight time, judging the economy will expand modestly going forward and inflation pressures will likely moderate over time.

The Labor Department's report showed that prices for imported capital goods were unchanged last month, as were consumer goods import prices.

Prices for nonpetroleum industrial supplies and materials imports rose 2.9%. Natural-gas prices surged 30.3%, the largest increase since 39.5% in November 2004. Foods, feeds, and beverages prices increased 0.4%.

Import prices were unchanged on the month for goods from the European Union. Prices increased 1.7% for goods from Canada and were down 0.2% for products from Mexico. Prices from China were unchanged. Import prices from Japan decreased 0.1%.

Overall U.S. export prices rose 0.4% last month. Export prices grew 3.9% in the 12 months since November 2005. Prices of agricultural exports increased 4.4%, and prices of non-agricultural exports rose 0.1%.

Jobless Claims Drop by 20,000

A separate report from the Labor Department showed that the number of idled workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits fell last week to its lowest level in two months.

New claims for unemployment insurance decreased by 20,000 to a seasonally adjusted 304,000 in the week ended Dec. 9 from an unrevised 324,000, the Labor Department said Thursday. The level was the lowest since new claims dropped to 300,000 the week ending Oct. 14. The four-week moving average for jobless claims fell by 1,500 to 327,250.

Opec Flexes Its Muscles By Agreeing To Cut Production (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0106745

By Ed Crooks And Dino Mahtani And Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries yesterday moved to reassert its power over oil prices by agreeing to cut production early next year in spite of rising concerns over tightening world crude markets.

Opec ministers meeting in Abuja agreed to cut output by 500,000 barrels a day from February 1. The move came after a 1.2m b/d cut announced in October, and sent prices higher.

Crude prices rose, with January West Texas Intermediary crude rising $1.15 to end at $62.52 in New York trading. The WTI benchmark price has risen 10 per cent in the past month.

Opec also broadened its reach by adding Angola as a member - boosting its share of world production from 40 to 43 per cent - while also calling a rare heads of state summit next year inSaudi Arabia.

Opec last met in the kingdom in 1980. In its 46-year history, Opec has held only two summits of heads of state, with the most recent one in 2000 in Caracas.

Analysts saw the move as highlighting Saudi Arabia's increasing assertiveness within the cartel, which comes as Riyadh is also stepping up its political activity in the Middle East, even at the risk of angering the US, its major western ally.

Adam Sieminski, chief energy economist at Deutsche Bank, said: "In addition to flexing its muscles externally, Saudi Arabia, with the heads of state meeting, wants to make sure that the group keeps working together for the long term."

Saudi Arabia has played a pivotal role in Opec, in which it is the biggest producer.

But, in the past, the kingdom has sought to keep a low profile within the cartel to avoid straining its relationship with the US and Europe.

In a statement, Opec said the cut was justified on the basis that there was "more than ample crude supply, high stocks levels and increasing spare capacity" in the market.

The cartel estimates that non-Opec oil production will rise by 1.8m b/d next year, its fastest rate since 1984, and that global economic growth will slow.

However, the cut was criticised by the International Energy Agency, the industrialised countries' energy watchdog, which had warned that world oil markets were tightening.

Lawrence Eagles, of the IEA, said: "The announcement of further cuts is unwelcome, particularly in the light of existing high prices, elevated supply risks and the onset of the peak winter heating season."

The IEA estimated that Opec production actually fell by only half the 1.2m b/d target last month. Opec itself believes compliance has been better, although still short of the target.

OPEC Sets Reduction In Output (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

New York Times, December 15, 2006

The OPEC oil cartel said yesterday that it planned to reduce its output by nearly 2 percent in February, the group's second production cut in two months and its strongest indication yet that it would seek to keep oil prices above $60 a barrel next year.

Representatives from OPEC nations agreed to pare their production to 25.8 million barrels a day, from 26.3 million barrels, starting on Feb. 1. The group had already agreed to a 4 percent production cut in October to prop up prices.

"I hope the market appreciates we are working so diligently to bring supply and demand in balance, to have inventories at a reasonable level so that we do not have gyrations," Ali al-Naimi, the Saudi oil minister, told reporters at the meeting in Abuja, Nigeria.

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which accounts for 40 percent of the world's oil exports, also said Angola would join the group next year, becoming its first new member since 1975.

Angola, Africa's fastest-growing oil exporter, is a powerful addition to OPEC, which has 11 members. Foreign oil companies have invested heavily in Angola in recent years and expect its production to grow sharply in the coming decade. Angola pumps 1.4 million barrels a day, ranking it above Qatar and Indonesia within OPEC.

DOJ_NMG_0106746

Some OPEC producers have expressed concern that shrinking demand next year might cause prices to fall if production were left unchecked. But with oil prices still hovering around $60 a barrel and commercial inventories down substantially over the last months, analysts were surprised by OPEC's decision.

"This makes an incredibly tight market even tighter," said Edward Morse, the chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers in New York. "It's a very aggressive, assertive move. Clearly, some OPEC members want to keep a $60 floor."

Oil futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange rose after the announcement by OPEC. Crude oil for January delivery rose $1.14, to $62.51 a barrel yesterday. Prices had lost more than $20 a barrel since hitting a record close of $77.03 this summer. That fall prompted OPEC to abandon its two-year- old policy of keeping its taps open to keep markets well supplied.

After touching a low for the year of $55 in November, prices have since rebounded, mostly as OPEC has curbed supplies.

"They are jawboning the market and trying to show they are being aggressive," said Roger Diwan, a managing director at PFC Energy, a consultant in Washington. "The question is, Are they being too aggressive?"

In a statement released at the end of the one-day meeting, OPEC said that "market fundamentals clearly indicate that there is more than ample crude supply, high stock levels and increasing spare capacity."

Saudi Arabia, the main power broker within OPEC and the world's biggest oil exporter, has taken the lead in reducing its own output and is behind the cartel's recent shift to curb supplies. Though some critics have been skeptical about past compliance, the Saudi minister estimated that OPEC members have adhered to about 80 percent of the cuts agreed upon at the last emergency meeting, held in Doha, Qatar, on Oct. 19.

But since OPEC does not publish production figures, there is very little reliable data for oil markets. Mr. Morse of Lehman estimates that OPEC countries have actually pared production by only 700,000 barrels a day, instead of 1.2 million barrels, since the October meeting. He expects OPEC will cut only another 300,000 barrels, starting in February, instead of 500,000 barrels as agreed to yesterday.

According to the latest report from the International Energy Agency, OPEC production fell by 550,000 barrels a day in November, to 28.9 million. That figure includes the production of Iraq, which does not have an OPEC quota.

Analysts at the energy agency, which represents consumers, have warned OPEC not to cut its production further as higher energy prices could erode economic growth. The agency trimmed its forecast for Chinese demand growth to 5.6 percent in 2006, from a previous estimate of 6.2 percent.

OPEC said yesterday in a statement that it expected global oil demand to grow by 1.3 million barrels a day in 2007. But it expects new supplies from non-OPEC producers to grow by 1.8 million barrels a day. This would be the largest one-year rise in non-OPEC supplies since 1984, according to OPEC.

In the lead-up to the meeting, Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's oil minister and OPEC president for this year, said there was a general support for a production cut. The representatives of Algeria, Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia all agreed about a need to trim production. In recent weeks oil inventories held by consuming nations fell sharply. In the United States, the world's biggest market, oil product stocks have fallen by 54 million barrels since October, a drop of nearly a million barrels a day.

Lawrence J. Goldstein, the president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation in New York, said OPEC ministers should be careful how they manage the market in coming months.

He suggested that high energy costs could reduce consumption.

"That's a trend OPEC and the Saudis should not be ignoring," he said, "because at the end of the day they want to sell, and if you want to sell, you need a vibrant economy, particularly in the United States."

OPEC's Cut Aims To Prop Up Prices (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

ABUJA, Nigeria -- OPEC, in announcing it plans to slice its output by an additional 1.9% starting Feb. 1, is sending a strong signal that it will try to prevent oil prices from sliding further.

The real impact of the cartel's latest output move on oil markets remains unclear. The big unknown is whether members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will actually implement the decision, which calls for a collective cut of

DOJ_NMG_0106747

500,000 barrels a day. Some OPEC officials say that will depend on demand in the next two months, the level of prices and the amount of oil held in inventories in major consumer countries. (See related article on page C2.)

OPEC's decision to cut oil production2 reflects its view that prices of $60 a barrel aren't hurting the global economy, says Oppenheimer energy analyst Fadel Gheit. He speaks with WSJ commodities reporter Peter McKay.

But the announcement signals OPEC's intention to keep oil supply tight to shore up prices and trim global oil inventories, whose buildup this year was threatening the cartel's power. OPEC's move comes even as prices have stabilized in the wake of a much larger 4% cut in October. A week ago, OPEC had been leaning against a second cut. But in recent days, a chorus of fears arose about a possible softening of oil demand early next year.

Crude prices swooned to $56 a barrel in November after peaking at a nominal high of $77.03 July 14. Oil prices rose yesterday, with light, sweet crude for January delivery up $1.14, or 1.9%, to $62.51 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. January Brent on London's ICE futures exchange rose 79 cents to $62.12 a barrel.

One factor making it difficult to parse the impact of yesterday's decision is that, so far, OPEC members haven't fully complied with the prior round of reductions. That move called for an output cut of 1.2 million barrels a day, or about 4%, to 26.3 million barrels a day, effective Nov. 1. Independent estimates of OPEC's compliance generally put the actual reductions at about 600,000 barrels a day. Saudi oil minister Ali Naimi, the effective leader of OPEC, said yesterday that compliance was nearly 80%, meaning that supply had been cut by almost one million barrels a day.

Even modest compliance with the new cut could spell pain for oil consumers, however. In February 2004, OPEC announced production cuts just as world oil demand began soaring. OPEC reversed course and began pumping flat-out to sate demand instead, but prices jumped anyway.

In a brief interview after yesterday's meeting, Mr. Naimi said OPEC won't deny the market extra barrels of oil if they are really needed. "What did we do before?" he asked rhetorically, alluding to the move to ramp up output in 2004 after the aborted cut. "People don't know the trouble we go to, to balance the market," Mr. Naimi said. "Without us, the oil market would be chaotic."

A senior OPEC official said the cut was a pre-emptive measure meant to ensure the cartel has a mechanism in place to reduce supply immediately if needed. But if buyers demand more oil than the cartel is forecasting, he said, OPEC will deliver it. "We need an agreement to cut [supply]," this official said. "We don't need an agreement to supply more oil if customers really want it."

Indeed, some analysts view yesterday's decision as an insurance policy to be used should prices weaken next year, when some estimates show that the rise in output from non-OPEC producers will exceed anticipated growth in world demand for petroleum.

"This is an option on a second cut," said Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy in Washington "They want to signal an aggressive oil-market-management strategy, but the decision also allows them to retract it if the market overtightens," Mr. Diwan said.

The entry of Angola on Jan. 1 should strengthen the cartel by bringing into OPEC's fold a country whose oil output is soaring. OPEC accepted Angola as its 12th member -- the first entrant since 1973. Angola estimates that its production will rise to about two million barrels a day by the second half of 2007 from about 1.4 million barrels a day currently.

Angola won't participate in the February cuts. But Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad Al Attiyah, said Angola would be party to OPEC's output decisions from March onward.

OPEC Plans Another Cutback In Oil Production (BLOOM)

By Andy Critchlow And Fred Pals

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

OPEC, whose member nations produce 40 percent of the world's oil, said yesterday it would cut output by 1.9 percent in February. OPEC also accepted Angola as a member to gain greater control over global crude supplies.

Production will be pared by 500,000 barrels a day as of Feb. 1, OPEC President Edmund Daukoru told journalists in Abuja, the Nigerian capital. The cut is in addition to the 1.2 million barrel-a-day reduction agreed upon by the OPEC at its previous meeting on Oct. 20 in Doha, Qatar.

DOJ_NMG_0106748

The 11-member group, known formally as the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, is attempting to revive prices that have slid about 21 percent from a July record of $78.40 a barrel in New York. The cuts take effect about seven weeks before the end of the Northern Hemisphere winter, when demand for heating fuels typically starts to decline.

"OPEC is sending a message that it is trying to control supply and keep a floor under the price," said Mike Wittner, the London-based head of energy market research at Calyon, a unit of Credit Agricole SA. "It's a compromise between the countries that wanted a cut and those that wanted a rollover."

Oil rose yesterday on speculation that OPEC's meeting would result in lower supplies, jumping $1.14, or 1.9 percent, to $62.51 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"The decision is short-term bullish but it won't push prices up by several dollars," Wittner said.

Angola's membership will be effective Jan. 1, said Daukoru, who is also Nigeria's oil minister. Angola won't be bound by the new agreement until March 1, he said.

Angola will be the first country to join OPEC since Gabon, which became a member in 1975 only to exit in 1994. Nigeria, the group's fifth-largest producer and a member since 1971, was the last existing member to join, according to the group's Web site.

Americans Open To New Kinds Of Candidates (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

AMERICANS ASSERT their readiness for new kinds of presidential wannabes.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, eight in 10 Americans would be "comfortable" or "enthusiastic" about an African-American or woman running for president. That apparent openness -- reflected across race, region and age groups -- is encouraging news for leading 2008 Democrats Clinton and Obama.

Though just 19% would have "some reservations" or be "very uncomfortable" about a Jewish candidate, 53% would about a Mormon seeking the White House. Misgivings are higher among conservatives and evangelicals, underscoring need for Massachusetts Gov. Romney to address the issue the way JFK defused concerns about Catholicism in 1960.

More Americans express doubts about a candidate who served in Bush's cabinet (59%) than one who is gay or lesbian (53%).

DEMOCRATS BENEFIT from post-election good feeling.

Some 46% of Americans give Democrats a positive rating, up from 36% in January. Just 29% rate the party negatively, down from 35% in January. A 46%-33% plurality rates Republicans negatively.

Americans remain "grouchy" toward Republicans, says Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who conducts the poll with Democratic counterpart Peter Hart. The strongest sign: though Americans identified themselves with the two parties in equal proportions on Election Day 2004, Democrats now boast a robust 44%-31% edge. Next six months will be critical, McInturff says, in determining whether that edge persists into 2008.

AUTO MAKERS FACE heat from public and lawmakers for higher fuel efficiency.

Fully 87% of Democrats, 76% of independents and 74% of Republicans back requirements for more fuel efficiency even if that raises auto prices. That complicates auto makers' ability to mount filibuster against bipartisan Senate bill, sponsored by Democrat Obama and Republican Lugar, to raise CAFE standards.

Industry may have better luck in the House, where Democratic powers Dingell and Hoyer call CAFE outmoded; they back tax incentives for auto makers and buyers as an alternative. Though Americans overall split on expanding nuclear power in new energy strategy, liberals remain opposed by 59%-35%.

Rollback of oil company tax breaks, blocked by lame-duck Republican Congress, is favored by 48% plurality of Bush 2004 voters.

DOJ_NMG_0106749

HEAR ME? Only one in four Americans says Bush got their message from midterm elections and is making needed adjustments. But 41% say the president heard but isn't adjusting; 18% assert he hasn't gotten the message. Seven in 10 expect little change.

LOW EXPECTATIONS: Only a third of Americans expect a new Congress more ethical than the old one; just one-fourth envision one that is less partisan. Incoming Speaker Pelosi's image moves into the black, barely: 25% positive, 23% negative.

HISPANICS STRONGLY support Bush's temporary-worker program for illegal immigrants. But 52% of whites and 59% of blacks express opposition.

IN WHOSE NAME? By 53%-39%, public says the U.S. doesn't owe it to killed or wounded American soldiers to stay in Iraq "until the mission is completed." But Americans split on whether the U.S. owes it to Iraqis to stay until their country is stabilized; 46% say yes, 47% no.

DEFICIT RATES scant public attention, but agencies fear budget cuts.

Just 5% of Americans identify red ink as top priority for Washington. But Bush, seeking high ground on an issue mavericks in both parties have targeted, plans in Saturday radio address to challenge congressional Democrats to move aggressively against special-project "earmarks."

Democrats' decision to shelve leftover spending bills in favor of continued stop-gap funding heightens bureaucratic anxiety. Administrative office of U.S. courts warns safety could be endangered by staff shortfall in probation offices, since "felons released from prison ... would not receive" adequate supervision.

Concern is highest at agencies such as SEC and State that had been slated for 2007 increases.

MINOR MEMOS: An independent Bloomberg presidential bid, scoring among upscale independents, gives Clinton a 40%-39% edge over McCain in three-way 2008 race. ... Kerry draws positive ratings from just 48% of those who voted for him two years ago.

Whichever Way The Wind Blows (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

New York Times, December 15, 2006

Midland, Tex.

Time for another news quiz: Which American state produces more wind-generated electricity than any other? Answer: Texas. Next question — this one you'll never get: Which politician launched the Texas wind industry? Answer: Former Gov., now President, George W. Bush.

Yes, there are many things that baffle me about President Bush, but none more than how the same man who initiated one of the most effective renewable energy programs in America, has presided over an administration that for six years has dragged its feet on alternative energy, used its regulatory powers to weaken efficiency standards for major appliances and stuck its head in the sand on global warming.

I'll wait for historians to sort that out. But here is some immediate advice I can give the president: If you want to salvage any positive legacy, it will not come from Iraq. There are only tears left there. No, the only way for you, Mr. President, to salvage any legacy is to get back in touch with your green Texas roots and devote the rest of your term to REALLY ending America's oil addiction, liberating us from dependence on petro-authoritarian regimes and making America the leader in renewable energies that combat climate change.

If this isn't the core of Mr. Bush's next State of the Union, he might as well go back to Crawford now. At least there he might be able to contemplate what went wrong with his presidency under lights powered by clean, wind-generated electricity that he promoted.

I came down to West Texas, the Saudi Arabia of wind, to find out how it all happened. Pat Wood, a friend of the president, was chairman of Texas's Public Utility Commission when the push for wind energy started.

"At the end of a meeting on transmission policy in mid-1996," he recalled, "I was on my way out the door of the governor's office, when Governor Bush said to me, 'Pat, we like wind.' He was at his desk. I said, 'We what?' He said: 'You heard me. Go get smart on wind.' "

DOJ_NMG_0106750

Mr. Wood, his fellow commissioners and the Texas utilities did just that. They conducted polls and were stunned by the results: Texas electricity customers were ready to pay a little extra to get more clean renewable energy. So Mr. Bush instructed Mr. Wood to work on wind with the utilities and the environmentalists. Together, they created the Texas Renewable Portfolio Mandate, which Mr. Bush got passed by the Texas Legislature in 1999, as part of a power competition bill. The mandate stipulated that Texas power companies had to produce 2,000 new megawatts of electricity from renewables, mostly wind, by 2009.

What happened? A dozen new companies jumped into the Texas market and built wind turbines to meet the mandate — so many that the 2,000-megawatt goal was reached in 2005. So now the Texas Legislature has upped the mandate to 5,000 megawatts by 2015. Everyone knows they'll beat that, too, because all this investment has driven down the costs and made wind power in Texas competitive with clean coal, nuclear and natural gas, even without the temporary tax break. Mr. Wood says he thinks Texas could be producing 15 percent of all its energy from renewables by 2015.

An energy wiz, Mr. Wood now advises Airtricity, an Irish wind-power company that also entered the Texas market. He and I toured its new wind farm near Midland, which will provide enough wind electricity — 125 megawatts — to power 40,000 homes in Dallas, replacing gas, nuclear and coal. The farm consists of giant turbines that sprout like Star Wars machine-monsters from the hardscrabble plains around Midland — amid the mesquite, rattlesnakes and oil-pumping jacks.

When Mr. Bush ran for governor, his motto was: "What Texans can dream, Texans can do." Just substitute "Americans" for "Texans," and he's already got the last line of his next State of the Union. What would the substance be? First, let's set a Texas-like renewable energy mandate for every state. Second, let's forge a national electricity transmission grid from the Dakotas to Texas to take wind electricity from where it is best produced to the big cities where it is most needed. Finally, let's create a long-term tax subsidy for building and buying plug-in hybrid cars. Wind energy is produced abundantly at night, when demand is lowest. Electric hybrids would be charged at night. That would mean hybrid electric cars, which emit virtually no carbon, could be powered by wind, which produces no carbon. If that scaled, it could be better than Kyoto.

You got something better to do, Mr. President?

Trade Ruling On Steel May Boost Auto Industry (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt, Paul Glader And Mike Spector

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Decisions that signal the end of many U.S. steel tariffs promise struggling auto makers a boost, and reflect a shift in the political and economic fortunes of these two pillars of the U.S. economy.

Heavy-equipment makers will also benefit from a separate ruling yesterday by the U.S. International Trade Commission that clears the way for tariffs to lapse on cut-to-length plate steel from 11 countries.

The end to tariffs on corrosion-resistant steel essential to car making from Australia, Canada, France and Japan will benefit auto makers. Tariffs remain in place for the same type of steel from Germany and South Korea.

Domestic steelmakers, which have long received favored treatment in Washington, were surprised by the ruling. In addition, they face several more ITC reviews in coming months on products such as hot-rolled steel product, pipe and tubular goods as well as concrete-reinforcing bar, which is used in construction. Some oil companies also are said to be lining up to lobby for an elimination of tariffs on pipe and tubular goods.

"It's very disappointing," said Dan DiMicco, chairman and CEO of Charlotte, N.C.-based Nucor Corp., one of the U.S.'s three largest steel producers that had lobbied to keep the trade restrictions. Mr. DiMicco said he was glad the restrictions for galvanized products were kept in place on products from South Korea and Germany, which make up 40% of total tonnage involved in the case, but he was disappointed the other 60% from Australia, Canada, Japan and France could now be imported into the U.S. with fewer restrictions.

Mr. DiMicco said the steelmakers are planning an appeal. Yesterday, shares in Nucor fell $1.44, or 2.41%, to $58.33 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The decision by the ITC, an independent agency with broad authority over U.S. trade policy, represents an important victory for the auto industry that had waged a strong campaign against the duties this year.

DOJ_NMG_0106751

The duties on steel imports "have been virtually impossible to take off," said Stephen Biegun, Ford Motor Co.'s vice president for international governmental affairs. "This is a tectonic shift that has occurred here."

All of the duties were implemented more than a decade ago. At the time, the steel industry was reeling from the dumping of low-priced, subsidized imports into the market. Today, the steel industry is strong and profitable, and the auto companies argued that the duties are no longer needed and that the elimination of the duties would inject more competition into the steel industry.

The case brought together rival U.S. and Japanese auto makers -- General Motors Corp., Ford, and DaimlerChrysler AG joined forces with Toyota Motor Corp., Honda Motor Co., and Nissan Motor Co. -- in a first-ever alliance in a trade dispute. Yesterday, auto shares rose in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange: General Motors rose 32 cents, or 1.09%, to $29.77; Ford 23 cents, up 3.34%, to $7,11; and DaimlerChrysler up 40 cents, or 0.66%, to $60.64. Toyota's American depositary shares rose $1.45, or 1.17%, to $125.70; Honda's ADS were up 27 cents, or 0.76%, to $36.03.

As a practical matter, the ITC action won't immediately result in the elimination of the duties. The commission must notify the Commerce Department of its decision, expected by Jan. 17. The department would then issue orders eliminating the duties.

The impact of the ITC vote is likely to ripple through the auto industry. Auto-parts suppliers, for example, have felt the brunt of higher commodities costs, including steel. Many parts suppliers had signed contracts in the past few years that required annual price decreases on certain components. And auto makers, in turn, were loath to provide relief to suppliers when materials costs skyrocketed.

In moving to eliminate duties on imported "cut-to-length plate" steel important to heavy-equipment makers, the ITC determined domestic steel producers wouldn't be harmed by the elimination of duties on imports from 11 countries.

Companies such as Caterpillar Inc. and Deere & Co. are expected to benefit. For Caterpillar, in particular, it's a big win. The Peoria, Ill., company is one of the largest U.S. users of plate steel.The end of the tariffs could help it make its products more efficiently, said Bill Lane, Caterpillar's Washington director of governmental affairs. Yesterday, in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading Caterpillar's shares were up 63 cents, or 1.02%, to $62.12; Deere was up $1.41, or 1.49%, to $96.11.

Obama: Not 'the Un-Hillary' (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

On the cusp of a historic decision over whether to run for the White House, Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday that he believed he would be a "viable candidate" for president who could move the nation beyond the generational politics that have defined the last 40 years.

"I wouldn't run if I didn't think I could win," Obama (D-Ill.) said in a wide-ranging, hourlong interview with the Tribune editorial board in which the senator articulated a rationale for his potential candidacy, confidence in his ability to win and an assessment of potential opponents—both Democrat and Republican.

Obama said that he would reveal his decision in January, following a two-week family vacation that returns him to his roots in Hawaii, setting an extraordinary arc for a politician who a little more than two years ago was a state senator toiling in Springfield.

"Obviously, I find myself at an interesting moment in time," said Obama, who has ignited a stunning level of excitement nationwide with the prospects of his candidacy. At the same time, Obama said he viewed hype over his potential candidacy as "transitory" and not something that would dictate his decision.

He said he had no real concerns about his ability to put together a staff and raise the tens of millions of dollars he would need to wage a campaign against his potential opponents, including Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

But he said he would have to weigh heavily the burdens that a campaign would place on his family, with his wife and two young daughters, making sure they would not "unduly suffer" from the hothouse atmosphere a White House run would create.

"Do I have something that is sufficiently unique to offer to the country that it is worth putting my family through a presidential campaign?" he said. "Politically, I think I would be a viable candidate. So that's a threshold question and I wouldn't run if I didn't think I could win."

DOJ_NMG_0106752

His best-selling book, demands for him to campaign for other Democrats during the recent midterm elections, and the remarkable attention he has commanded in appearances in states with early nominating contests have combined to quickly thrust Obama into the upper tier of Democratic presidential contenders.

He also conceded that he has never been through anything approaching the level of scrutiny that a presidential campaign would bring on him, his family, and almost anyone who has been associated with him.

He said that his two books, the first an autobiography written when he was in his late 30s, and the second, a more policy-oriented book, offer much detail about who he is and his views on issues.

Asked how he would address the issue of his relative lack of experience, Obama said that he thought that the campaign itself —how he managed it, his position on issues and his framing of a vision for the country—would answer the question. "That experience question would be answered at the end of the campaign," he said.

"The test of leadership in my mind is not going to be what's on a paper resume," Obama said. Vice President Dick Cheney, a former defense secretary, and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "had the best resume on paper of any foreign policy team and the result has been what I consider to be one of the biggest foreign policy mistakes in our history," he said.

Should Obama seek the Democratic nomination, he would face a large field, many with much longer resumes than Illinois junior senator. But in three national polls released this week, Obama has leapfrogged many of those contenders and put himself in a position to be an alternative to Clinton, who, like Obama, has not declared her candidacy.

Obama said he was not concerned about being able to compete either in fundraising or in staffing should he enter the race.

"I don't want it to sound like raising $50 million to $60 million is easy," he said. "It's hard, but I think it's something that we could do."

Though he was born in 1961, Obama cast himself as the face of a post-Baby Boomer generation not fundamentally shaped by Vietnam and the culture conflicts of the 1960s. He said he could "help turn the page in ways that other candidates can't do."

Sounding very much like a candidate, Obama called Clinton, 59, a "tough, disciplined, smart, intelligent public servant." But, compared to Clinton, he maintained he was able to look at "some issues differently as a consequence of being of a slightly different generation."

When asked his assessment of Clinton, Obama said, "I think she'd be a capable president.

"She has gone through some battles that, in some cases unfairly, have created a perception about her that is different from how I am perceived," he said.

Obama said, however, that he had no interest in being what he called "the un-Hillary"—a reference to serving as a standard bearer for Democrats looking for an alternative to Clinton.

As for Republicans, Obama said that he placed Sen. John McCain of Arizona in the same position as Clinton holds among Democrats, with great name recognition and resources and the ability to sew up much of the party establishment. But he also said he considered Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney an "attractive candidate," though he said Romney was "making a mistake in trying to look more conservative than he may be" to gain core conservative support.

Speaking of a potential match up with McCain, Obama said he was under no illusions how a GOP presidential campaign would be run against him.

"War hero against snot-nosed rookie," Obama said.

The first-term Illinois senator said he consulted earlier this week with Mayor Richard Daley on a potential presidential bid, but declined to discuss specifics.

But Obama acknowledged "it was stupid" of him to get involved in the purchase almost one year ago of a strip of property adjoining his $1.65 million home from Antoin "Tony" Rezko, who owned a vacant lot next door. Rezko, a political insider and fundraiser, was indicted in October on charges of trying to extort campaign donations and kickbacks from firms seeking state business. Rezko has pleaded not guilty.

"I am the first one to acknowledge that it was a boneheaded move for me to purchase this 10-foot strip from Rezko, given that he was already under a cloud of concern," Obama said. "I will also acknowledge that from his perspective, he no doubt believed that by buying the piece of property next to me that he would, if not be doing me a favor, it would help strengthen our relationship."

DOJ_NMG_0106753

On the same day that Obama and his wife closed on their home, Rezko's wife, Rita, closed on the $625,000 vacant lot next door. Both lots had once been part of the same estate, but the owner listed them as separate parcels.

Obama said he has known Rezko for 20 years and "he had never asked me for anything. I've never done any favors for him."

"There was no sense of betrayal of the public trust here," Obama said.

Taking 'Obama-mania' In Stride (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

This is less about me, and more about you. That was Barack Obama's explanation for his rock-star welcome in New Hampshire last weekend. The possible presidential candidate said he's become a "symbol" of voters' desire for "something new."

Such self-deprecation could be sincere sentiment - or it could be skilled political rhetoric. It doesn't matter which, though, because the words of the junior senator from Illinois are true.

People don't know much about this Democratic fresh face; he's too inexperienced to have a long political track record. But they're obviously responding positively to what he symbolizes: a call to reach across the partisan and ideological divide in America.

What voters are looking for in 2008 is "someone who is seen as independent and detached from the traditional centers of power of each party," says Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center, a nonpartisan polling and research group.

Those qualities aren't the sole purview of any single candidate, though. Indeed, the field that's shaping up (and these look to be about two dozen so far), contains several examples of folks who have reached across the aisle.

John McCain, the senator from Arizona and an expected Republican presidential candidate, has earned a reputation for independence. In his 2000 presidential bid he criss-crossed the country in his "Straight Talk Express" bus. He can pull any number of bipartisan credentials from his pocket, including campaign-finance reform.

And what would you call, for instance, former GOP mayor of New York Rudy Giuliani, who brought his city together after 9/11? A unifier perhaps? And yes, the rap on New York Sen. Hillary Clinton - the accepted Democratic presidential front-runner - may be that she's polarizing, but didn't she and her husband storm the country in 1992 as "new Democrats," i.e., centrists? She's made a concerted effort to work with Senate Republicans, including a 2005 bill she co-sponsored with GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham related to incentives for domestic manufacturing.

Senator Obama is tapping into a public desire for a unified approach to today's challenges. "There's a moment that we are living through in our history right now where we've got a series of very important decisions to make, and we have the opportunity to make them, not as Democrats, not as Republicans, but as Americans," he said last weekend. As the son of a white Kansan mother and black Kenyan father, he literally embodies cross-cultural and cross-racial unity.

But it's not as if Obama is stripped of ideology. He's pro-choice, pro- affirmative action, and supports "universal" health care - traditional Democratic causes. The National Journal, a nonpartisan publication, gave him an 82.5 liberalism rating, higher than Sen. Clinton (79.8).

McCain, meanwhile, has been insisting that he's more conservative than people think he is. Last May for instance, he spoke at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University - after blasting him for intolerance in 2000. So, is his conservative claim a feint to partisan primary voters or true confessions?

Voters indeed may yearn for a candidate above the political fray. But will they be able to recognize one?

Commission Seeks School System Overhaul (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, December 15, 2006

Education and business leaders urged an overhaul of the U.S. school system, including ending high school at the 10th grade for many students. Current teaching is failing to prepare young Americans for the global economy, members of a bipartisan panel said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0106754

Beginning teachers should earn more, according to the group, and money for this idea could come from the scrapping of conventional teacher pension plans in favor of other benefits such as 401(k)s.

"People have got to understand what we've got is not working. It's not working for kids, but it's not working for teachers either," said William Brock, a former congressman who was labor secretary and trade representative in the Reagan administration.

The Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce was organized by people who launched a group by the same name about 16 years ago. That commission made a series of recommendations, several of which were enacted.

Under the new group's proposal, students would finish 10th grade and then take exams. Depending on how well the students perform, they could go on to community college or stay in school and study for more advanced tests that could earn them a place at a four-year college. Somewhat similar systems are in place in other countries.

The report says that by not spending today's resources on 11th- and 12th-graders and through other changes, the government could eventually save an estimated $60 billion.

The money could pay, for example, for new pre-kindergarten programs and higher teacher salaries, which the report said would help recruit top graduates into the profession.

The commission recommends paying beginning teachers about $45,000 per year, currently the median amount paid to teachers — meaning half earn more than that and half earn less.

To help cover the cost, the commission recommends moving away from traditional, defined benefit pensions to less generous retirement plans commonly found in the private sector.

Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, said teachers should not have to lose benefits in order to make more.

One other major shift would put independent contractors in charge of operating schools, though the schools would remain public. States would oversee the funding.

Cortese also was critical of that idea. "Blowing up the governance system is very drastic, and we don't know what will happen in its place," she said.

Chuck Saylors, a school board member and parent in Taylors, S.C., said shifting control to the states from the local districts would be controversial. "Mainly because we have done it the same way for so long," Saylors said, adding that he was glad the group had put forward thought-provoking ideas.

The report notes the U.S. had 30 percent of the world's population of college students three decades ago, but that has fallen to 14 percent. The commission also cites poor performance by U.S. students in exams when compared with students in other advanced industrial nations.

"We may want to wait to think about these changes, but quite simply the world will not wait for us to catch up," said Thomas Payzant, a commission member who recently stepped down as Boston's school superintendent.

The commission's work was financed by several foundations, including the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation.

Among the initiatives from the first commission that the government enacted were a push for states to develop achievement standards and stepped-up training for high school graduates going directly into the work force.

The current commission includes are former education secretaries Rod Paige and Richard Riley; former Labor Secretary Ray Marshall; former Michigan Gov. John Engler; and Joel Klein, chancellor of the New York City schools.

Expert Panel Proposes Far-Reaching Redesign Of The American Education System (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

Warning that Americans face a grave risk of losing their prosperity and high quality of life to better educated workers overseas, a panel of education, labor and other public policy experts yesterday proposed a far-reaching redesign of the United States education system that would include having schools operated by independent contractors and giving states, rather than local districts, control over school financing.

DOJ_NMG_0106755

The panel, the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, included two former federal education secretaries, Rod Paige, a Republican, and Richard W. Riley, a Democrat; two former labor secretaries, William E. Brock, a Republican, and Ray Marshall, a Democrat; and an array of other luminaries, including former Gov. John Engler of Michigan, and the New York City schools chancellor, Joel I. Klein.

The commission's report, released at a news conference in Washington, rethinks American schooling from top to bottom, going beyond the achievement goals of the federal education law known as No Child Left Behind, and farther than many initiatives being pursued by the Bush administration or by experimental state and local school authorities. Among other things, the report proposes starting school for most children at age 3, and requiring all students to pass board exams to graduate from high school, which for many would end after 10th grade. Students could then go to a community or technical college, or spend two years preparing for selective colleges and universities.

"We have run out the string on a whole series of initiatives that were viewed as hopeful," said Lewis H. Spence, commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Social Services and a member of the panel. "This puts a whole new set of ideas on the table."

Mr. Spence, a former deputy schools chancellor in New York City, and other commission members acknowledged that enacting the proposals would be difficult, requiring legislation in all states and the cooperation of the federal government. Some, like one for merit pay for teachers, would require renegotiating teacher contracts nationwide and persuading local school boards to relinquish authority and take a new role enforcing performance contracts with schools.

"You can't implement something like this overnight," said Mr. Klein, who had been scheduled to appear at yesterday's news conference with Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York, but whose flights were grounded by thick fog in Washington. Mr. Klein strongly applauded the commission's proposals, and pointed to many efforts in New York — including sharp increases in teacher pay, a new master-teacher career step; increased roles for private groups in running public schools and performance agreements signed by 331 principals in exchange for greater freedom from superintendents — as examples of how some of the commission's goals could begin to be accomplished. "We need to think big," he said.

The commission's work was quickly hailed by some as a potentially groundbreaking document. "This report has the potential to change the debate on education at the national level," said Jack Jennings, the president of the Center on Education Policy, who is a Democrat and prominent expert on the federal education law.

The national teachers' unions were apprehensive. Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, said the proposals included "some seriously flawed ideas with faddish allure that won't produce better academic results." Reg Weaver, the president of the National Education Association, urged "caution in calling for drastic changes."

The commission was organized by the National Center on Education and the Economy, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group based in Washington, and partly financed by the Bill and Melinda Gates foundation. The center organized a similar commission that issued a similar report 16 years ago. Marc S. Tucker, the group's president, said globalization had created new urgency. "There is this growing mismatch between the demands of the economy and what our schools are supplying," Mr. Tucker said.

In its report, the commission warned of dire consequences should the country not adopt a strikingly bold approach. "If we continue on our current course, and the number of nations outpacing us in the education race continues to grow at its current rate," it said, "the American standard of living will steadily fall relative to those nations, rich and poor, that are doing a better job."

"If the gap gets to a certain but unknowable point," the report said, "the world's investors will conclude that they can get a greater return on their funds elsewhere, and it will be almost impossible to reverse course."

Paul Romer, an economist at Stanford University, said that some of the fears about competition with India and China might be overblown but that the education system still needed improvement. He said the current effort was driven by improvements in technology, much as advances in the early 20th century led to universal high school.

"High productivity investments in education are one of the most universally supported and effective policies that governments have ever undertaken," he said. "The left and the right are both on board for high payoffs in education."

Schools Report Urges Drastic Change, Higher Salaries (WP)

By V. Dion Haynes

DOJ_NMG_0106756

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

An independent commission yesterday proposed dramatic changes that would shake up American public education in an effort to make the nation more competitive globally. The recommendations include authorizing school districts to pay companies to run all their schools; enrolling many students in college after the 10th grade; and paying teachers about $100,000 annually.

The New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce -- a bipartisan panel that includes former Cabinet secretaries and governors in addition to federal and state education officials and business and civic leaders -- issued the recommendations in a report on the future workforce. The commissioners warned that unless improvements are made in the nation's public schools and colleges by 2021, a large number of jobs would be lost to countries including India and China, where workers are better educated and paid much less than their U.S. counterparts.

"We're calling for a complete shake-up from top to bottom," Charles Knapp, chairman of the commission, said at a news conference.

"The United States has one of the highest costs of education but produces mediocre results," added Knapp, former president of the University of Georgia. "The recommendations are absolutely necessary if we want America to maintain its standard of living."

The 170-page report, "Tough Choices or Tough Times," is the result of a year-long study by the panel, which includes New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg; Joel I. Klein, chancellor of the New York City public schools; former Michigan governor John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; Roderick R. Paige, former secretary of the U.S. Department of Education; Marc H. Morial, president and chief executive of the National Urban League and former mayor of New Orleans; and D.C. School Superintendent Clifford B. Janey. It was funded by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation and the Lumina Foundation for Education.

Implementing all the recommendations, commission members said, would cost about $60 billion.

Education experts expect the study to spur public debates in legislatures and school board chambers across the country, much like the groundbreaking 1983 report "A Nation at Risk."

The report will prompt "constitutional changes, cultural shifts and changes in political will," said Andrew Romanoff, speaker of the Colorado House, who plans to introduce a measure incorporating a recommendation to increase offerings of early childhood education programs. "The report will provide the basis for our conversation."

The most controversial recommendations include empowering school districts to sign contracts with companies and teachers to run the schools -- which would replace schools' administrative structures with something similar to that in charter schools -- and forcing teachers to give up pensions in exchange for large pay increases.

Districts, they said, should relinquish control to the most highly qualified contractors, who would be rewarded for successfully running schools -- or fired if student performance languishes.

The schools "would be like charter schools in one crucial respect: They would be highly entrepreneurial," said Marc Tucker, vice chairman of the commission and staff director and president of the National Center on Education and the Economy.

But Anne L. Bryant, executive director of the National School Boards Association, said hiring contractors to run the schools would create "a huge new set of enterprises that we have no evidence will work." Moreover, it would negate the administrative economies of scale provided by a central office and "add a great deal of costs to a school," she said. "We've seen that to an extent with charter schools."

Boosting teacher pay would draw better candidates to the profession, commission members said. They recommend that schools increase teacher pay by at least $20,000 -- to $45,000 for beginners and $95,000 for experienced ones working a regular school calendar. Teachers who work year-round, they said, would be paid $110,000.

Teachers would get the raises in exchange for giving up pensions and switching to 401(k) retirement plans.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, agreed that teacher pay should be increased. However, "it is shortsighted to call for salary programs that increase teacher pay but deplete retirement benefits," he said in a statement.

The proposal also calls for:

Â· Setting up "personal competitiveness accounts" for all citizens to cover the cost of retraining if their jobs are phased out.

DOJ_NMG_0106757

Â· Allowing students in vocational courses to graduate from high school after the 10th grade and enroll in trade schools or community colleges if they pass exams demonstrating academic competency. High-performing college-prep students would spend the 11th and 12th grades taking advanced courses and then, after graduation, enroll in college as sophomores and juniors.

Tucker said the recommendations would take 15 years to implement, but he predicted that they would result "in what will plausibly be the best national public school system in the world."

Panel: Revamp U.S. High Schools (CHIT)

By Lori Olszewski And Diane Rado

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

Most high school students could leave after their sophomore year and go to community college or vocational training under a proposal endorsed by a prestigious panel on Thursday.

The report from the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce touches on all aspects of education, but some of its most unusual proposals would end America's four-year high school and replace it with a more European-style model.

The plan is one of the most expansive educational proposals to surface at a time when federal officials are encouraging experimentation in the nation's school districts to help boost high school graduation rates and help Americans better compete with foreign workers. Unlike many education reports, this one is supported by several respected education leaders, including former U.S. Secretaries of Education Richard W. Riley and Roderick Paige. Riley served a Democrat; Paige served a Republican.

Rather than requiring students to remain in high school for four years, the report proposes a rigorous 10th-grade test that would allow those who pass to leave school two years early, which proponents say could help reduce the dropout rate, among other positive effects. They could then go on to technical or vocational training or academic work in preparation for a four-year institution.

The juniors and seniors left in high school would either be teens in remedial classes working to pass the exam or youngsters who chose to stay and pursue challenging academic work so they could attend elite institutions.

Other countries do it

"It may seem radical to some Americans, but many countries do it," said commissioner and former Secretary of Labor William Brock of the goal of making sure most 16-year-olds are ready to leave high school for higher education. "Who would say our young people are less capable?"

Unlike in Europe, though, doors would not permanently close to students who fail the American 10th-grade exams. Teens would be encouraged to retake the exam to be developed by each state until they pass it.

Still, reservations about the controversial proposals surfaced on a variety of fronts.

"There are some seriously flawed ideas," said Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers.

She said, "We don't need a distracting, massive restructuring to help high schoolers reach high standards."

The commission says that much of the plan could be funded by an estimated $67 billion in savings from high school and college programs that would no longer be necessary under the proposal. But those savings would not be fully realized for another 15 years, making it uncertain where the start-up money would come from for the program. The commission also hopes to raise money to launch demonstration projects in interested states.

A number of Chicago high school students on Thursday were open to the idea of going to college early, but they thought it might not be for everyone. They said their friends change interests and careers from day to day.

"A positive is that it would help you see where you are (academically) in time to do something about it," said Derell Bonner, 16, a junior at Prosser High School. "But I think 16 is too young to really know what you want to do."

Commissioners said, however, young people already are making choices at 16 that will limit the rest of their lives, such as dropping out.

DOJ_NMG_0106758

"This country is cooked if we don't make a vast improvement in the outcomes for our kids," said Marc Tucker, a major architect of the proposals as vice chairman and staff director of the private, non-partisan commission.

Tucker, a national expert on education and the economy, was on a previous commission that issued a report that helped spur the national education standards movement and resulted in legislation.

Dropout rate too high

The nation's staggering dropout rates drain the economy and continue to erode the middle class, especially in urban areas like Chicago where about half the students don't finish school, the report said. Even students who get a high school diploma and go on to college often must take remedial courses because they don't have the skills to succeed academically.

The report comes after a surge in interest in high school reform during the last several years fueled by philanthropist Bill Gates and a National Governors Association summit in February 2005 that drew attention to the need for higher standards to better prepare students for college or work.

Since then, several states, including Illinois, have increased high school graduation requirements. But only 11 states—Illinois not among them—have in place the rigorous requirements experts believe will truly prepare students for the world beyond high school, said Matt Gandal, executive vice president of Achieve Inc., a sponsor of the governors' summit.

Florida made a splash this week with its efforts to keep students in high school, by requiring all incoming freshmen next year to choose "majors." But a number of people expressed worry that both the Florida proposal and a move for a 10th-grade test could result in a form of tracking. They feared that some students could be steered away from challenging universities.

"The only tracking here is tracking everyone toward college," said Tucker, who emphasized that the students who failed the 10th-grade test would be given additional chances to pass it after they received academic help. The key, many critics said, is whether the nation is really ready to devote the resources to get students up to speed, especially low-income youngsters.

Need to alter entire system

Indeed, the commission report cautions against fiddling with one part of the education system without also addressing broader issues. They include proposals to make preschool available to all, to raise teacher salaries funded partly by reducing retirement benefits and to send more state money to the most disadvantaged students.

One of the most controversial ideas would strip local school boards and administrations of their traditional powers and to contract with private corporations to manage public schools.

The nation's teacher unions both issued statements opposing the move to raise teacher salaries while reducing retirement benefits.

Chester E. Finn Jr., president of the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, praised the report for a blunt approach that could shake up the education establishment. He compared it to the groundbreaking "Nation at Risk" report of 1983, which paved the way for many educational reforms.

"There is something to offend everybody, and that approximates my own definition of consensus—a uniform level of pain felt by everybody," Finn said.

To Fix US Schools, Panel Says, Start Over (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

What if the solution to American students' stagnant performance levels and the wide achievement gap between white and minority students wasn't more money, smaller schools, or any of the reforms proposed in recent years, but rather a new education system altogether?

That's the conclusion of a bipartisan group of scholars and business leaders, school chancellors and education commissioners, and former cabinet secretaries and governors. They declare that America's public education system, designed to meet the needs of 100 years ago when the workplace revolved around an assembly line, is unsuited to today's global marketplace. Already, they warn, many Americans are in danger of falling behind and seeing their standard of living plummet.

In its place, the group proposes a series of controversial reforms:

DOJ_NMG_0106759

• Offer universal pre-kindergarten programs and opportunities for continuing education for adults without high school diplomas.

• Create state board exams that students could pass at age 16 to move either on to community college or to a university-level high school curriculum.

• Improve school salaries in exchange for reducing secure pension benefits, and pay teachers more to work with at-risk kids, for longer hours, or for high performance.

• Create curriculums that emphasize creativity and abstract concepts over rote learning or mastery of facts.

"We've squeezed everything we can out of a system that was designed a century ago," says Marc Tucker, president of the National Center on Education and the Economy, and vice chairman of the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, which produced the report. "We've not only put in lots more money and not gotten significantly better results, we've also tried every program we can think of and not gotten significantly better results at scale. This is the sign of a system that has reached its limits."

The report is getting attention in part because of those involved - people like William Brock, the former senator and Reagan-era Labor secretary; John Engler, National Association of Manufacturers president and former Michigan governor; and Joel Klein, chancellor of New York's public schools.

It's also unusual in its scope and ambition, looking at public education in the context of changes in the global economy and workforce needs, and examining education for everyone from preschoolers to adults.

Many of the ideas are likely to encounter opposition. Even the group's proponents insist the report isn't an exact blueprint, but a framework - one they hope will be used to jumpstart a national conversation and entice a few states to experiment with overhauls inspired by these ideas, much the way states led the way with welfare reform in the early 1990s.

The report "is calling for a certain revolution, but it hasn't been put together by revolutionaries," says Mr. Tucker, optimistic that even the controversial ideas are politically feasible. "If you don't like the proposals we put on the ground, come up with some that will work better."

The commission insists, though, that these ideas won't work if only the least controversial and least costly are "cherry-picked" by states, emphasizing that they complement and bolster each other.

One of the biggest proposed changes - the state board examinations that would allow qualified 10th graders to move on to college - would eventually add up to $67 billion in savings that could be reallocated elsewhere, the report estimates. In the transition period, commission members acknowledge, significant but feasible costs would be necessary.

Adults, too, would get access to the education needed to pass the new state board exams, and the commission suggests creating "personal competitiveness accounts" - created at birth and added to over time - that would help pay for continuing education throughout an individual's work life.

Another proposal: Scrap local school funding for a state-funded system that offers more to the needy districts but doesn't diminish the resources of wealthy districts. The report then calls for giving schools far more autonomy - making them, in essence, contract schools run by teachers or others who are monitored by districts but not owned by them.

Many of the suggestions have already run into opposition. Anne Bryant, executive director of the National School Boards Association, says she applauds the goals and some recommendations, but worries that the financial aspects don't add up. Decentralized school districts would weaken the system, Dr. Bryant says.

"It's a groundbreaking report, but how much ground can you afford to break before you start rattling what's really working in order to fix what is not?" she asks. "There's a leap of faith here in about 10 different areas."

But proponents insist that in a world that increasingly rewards only highly skilled, creative workers - in which America spends the second highest amount on education of any industrialized nation but performs in the bottom part of the pack - reforms this drastic are necessary.

"I think we've tried to do what we can to improve American schools within the current context," says Jack Jennings, president of the Center on Education Policy, who says the commission has sparked an important debate. "Now we need to think much more daringly."

DOJ_NMG_0106760

Report Calls For Overhaul Of U.S. Education System (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

To preserve its living standard, the U.S. must undertake a radical overhaul of its education system, according to a new report that is spurring debate among policy makers, legislators and teacher unions.

The report, by a group known as the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, which includes former governors and cabinet secretaries from both political parties, proposes eliminating local control and funding of public schools and turning their management over to private contractors. It would end high school after 10th grade for some students who opt for two-year colleges.

The report endorses mandatory entrance exams for public colleges and universities, and calls for attracting talented young teachers by increasing salaries, while cutting pensions for retirees.

Though these proposals aren't likely to be adopted wholesale in the short run, U.S. Rep. George Miller, chairman-designate of the House Education and Workforce Committee, said some of them should get serious attention in the next Congress.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg endorsed the thrust of the commission's findings. Joel Klein, chancellor of New York City schools and a commission member, said the report is "clearly right and solid" but cautioned against implementing it too quickly.

The report also sparked immediate opposition. Some educators said the proposed college-entrance exams would unnecessarily limit access, and major teacher unions objected to pay changes and a loss of local control.

Members were appointed by the National Center on Education and the Economy, a centrist think tank influential in shaping the 1990s debate over educational standards.

The report comes at a time of changing political agendas, as leadership of Congress shifts and presidential aspirants lash together 2008 platforms. In addition, the No Child Left Behind law, mandating that all students should be proficient in reading and math by 2014, is up for reauthorization in 2007.

"I think people are going to pay close attention" to the report, said Dane Linn, education-division director for the National Governors Association.

Two former labor leaders on the commission dissented from part of the report. Morton Bahr, ex-president of the Communications Workers of America, and Dal Lawrence, past president of the Toledo Federation of Teachers, called letting private contractors run all public schools "an open door for profiteers."

Finding that the U.S. share of the global college-educated work force has fallen to about 14% from about 30% in the 1970s, the report said emerging countries like India are producing more highly educated workers even as only half of U.S. students who go to college earn a degree.

To prepare more U.S. students for postsecondary education, the commission calls for universal preschool, extra resources for at-risk students and, to equalize funding, state control of school finances. It proposes paying for such initiatives with an estimated $67 billion in savings it says would result, in part from an overhaul of public high schools.

Under its plan, after 10th grade, all students would take so-called board exams in core subjects. Although students could take the tests repeatedly during their junior and senior years, no one could gain entry to any public college or university without passing.

Those who passed on their first try could skip the rest of high school and immediately move on to community colleges and technical schools. In preparation for four-year colleges, students passing with higher scores would continue studying in high school for a more rigorous second round of exams, along the lines of current Advanced Placement tests.

Write to Robert Tomsho at rob.tomsho@wsj.com1

U.S. Schools Overhaul Sought, Using Private Control (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106761

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. public schools should be run by private contractors who would graduate most students by 10th grade, concluded an expert commission sponsored by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation.

The plan also calls for state funding to replace local property taxes, free pre-kindergarten and higher teacher pay on a merit-based system. The Gates Foundation and other sponsoring groups may pay states to help implement it, organizers said.

The commission includes executives from Viacom Inc. and Lucent Technologies Inc. and school officials from New York, Massachusetts and California. It wants to end an "insane" U.S. school system that's producing students who can't handle either college or the workplace, said one of its members, former U.S. Labor Secretary William Brock.

"Our children must be given the ability to compete in a global economy," rather than a school system that leads the world in drop-out rates, Brock said. "If you're not worried about that, you have to become worried."

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings hasn't yet studied the report, though she already is pursuing steps such as toughening school standards, offering privately managed alternatives and increasing merit-based teacher pay, spokeswoman Katherine McLane said.

"The department shares many of the concerns and goals raised in this thought-provoking report," McLane said.

Opposition

The plan faces opposition from teacher unions, which expressed concern about the proposal to hand operations over to private contractors, and to shift the structure of teacher retirement pay.

The Gates Foundation, one of the commission's sponsors, has been experimenting with some of the ideas the panel proposed today and is ready to help states implement more of them, said Tom Vander Ark, the foundation's education director.

"We would certainly like to see the states where we're working adopt these sorts of recommendations and would certainly be open to helping them plan and implement these ideas in a thoughtful way," Vander Ark said in an interview.

Congressional leaders from both parties, including the incoming Democratic chairman of the House and Senate education committees, Representative George Miller of California and Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, also praised the ambitiousness of the recommendations and promised to consider them.

Skills Commission

The panel, called the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, estimates that its plan would cost little more than the $500 billion the U.S. currently spends each year on kindergarten through 12th grade education. The federal government provides about 9 percent of the current total, with the rest split between state revenue and local property taxes.

The commission plan proposes that states take control of the amount now provided by local governments to reduce inequities in spending between richer and poorer communities, said Marc Tucker, a co-author of the report and president of the Washington-based National Center on Education and the Economy. He said the states should then increase that spending by about $30 billion a year.

The plan also suggests adding about $19 billion a year more to teacher salaries to create a merit-based compensation system that would increase pay to a peak of $110,000 a year.

Costs Offset

The added costs of about $60 billion a year would be offset by graduating about 60 percent of students after the 10th grade, when tests would show they are ready for jobs or college. The commission predicted its improvements eventually would leave about 95 percent of all high school graduates ready for college.

The nation's largest teachers union, the 3.2 million-member National Education Association, said that recommendations such as state funding and private control of schools "could potentially disenfranchise poorer communities and eliminate community voices." The NEA, in a written statement, did say the report "shed light on some very real issues," including the need for more access to pre-kindergarten and better high schools.

The 1.3 million-member American Federation of Teachers warned of "enormous upheaval" from allowing private control of schools and from graduating students early.

Gates-funded projects in such places as Boston and Oakland show the change doesn't have to be that unsettling, since the same people who now run their schools might continue to run them, just as private contractors who are held more accountable for results, Vander Ark said. "It wouldn't have to be a mass revolution," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106762

The proposed tax shift "might be popular," since local property tax is seen by Americans as the least-fair method of state and local taxation, said Bill Ahern, spokesman for the Tax Foundation, a Washington-based advocacy group.

Funding Policies

The Education Trust, a Washington-based research and advocacy group, released a state-by-state analysis yesterday concluding that U.S. school funding policies leave poor and minority students with the worst schools, including less- qualified teachers and less-demanding curriculum.

Schools in districts with low-income students receive $907 less per student than those in wealthier districts, based on 2003 figures, the Education Trust said. The gap is as high as $2,280 in New York and $2,065 in Illinois, the organization said.

Members of the skills commission include Michael Dolan, chief financial officer of Viacom; Henry Schacht, former chairman and chief executive officer of Lucent; John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; and former U.S. Education Secretaries Roderick Paige and Richard Riley.

Others on the panel are Marc Morial, president of the National Urban League; Morton Bahr, former president of the Communications Workers of America; Charles Reed, chancellor of the California State University System; and school system chiefs Joel Klein of New York City, Thomas Payzant of Boston and Clifford Janey of Washington, D.C.

A Pentagon Agency Is Looking At Brains -- And Raising Eyebrows (WSJ)

By Sharon Begley

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

In a request issued in October, a government agency asked researchers for "innovative" ways to monitor the brain as it learns and acquires skills, such as by tracking when brain waves flip from those characteristic of novices to those of experts, and noninvasive ways to speed up the process.

In February, the agency said it was interested in ways to use EEGs to detect when a brain had found what it was looking for in a photograph, such as a familiar face in a crowd.

As part of the same program, the agency awarded Lockheed Martin $650,000 in August to develop technology to monitor a brain's cognitive activity in real time and, if the device senses overload, make changes such as slowing the flow of data the brain is receiving.

In a progress report to the agency's "Augmented Cognition" program, a company said in September that it had completed development of a portable, wearable system of sensors that assess cognitive function, producing a readout showing how a brain's pattern of thought-related activity deviates "from that of the normal population."

The requests came from, and the report went to, the Pentagon's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency. Established in 1958, Darpa is best known for inventing the forerunner of the Internet. For decades it lavished most of its support on physics. But lately, as part of its mission to maintain U.S. military superiority "by sponsoring revolutionary, high-payoff research," the agency has expanded into neuroscience.

Can the folks who brought you the Internet also bring you ways to look into brains -- and do you want them to?

Darpa has good reason to fund neuroscience. Discoveries and new technologies such as noninvasive imaging to detect what the mind is doing might help analysts, pilots and grunts process and react better to barrages of data, and allow real-time assessment of head injuries on the battlefield. Brain-computer interfaces in which thoughts are electronically translated into signals that operate a computer or prosthetic limb might improve rehab for soldiers suffering grievous injuries.

As with other "dual use" technologies, however, the findings and gizmos born of Darpa's brain research may well find their way into civilian life, and in ways that trouble some ethicists. Darpa's interest in neuroscience is "extensive and growing," says Jonathan Moreno of the University of Virginia, a former adviser on biodefense to the Department of Homeland Security. "There are reasons to be concerned about what uses these discoveries might be put to."

The Augmented Cognition program, for instance, seeks technologies that will "measure and track a subject's cognitive state in real time." The agency is partway there. One prototype helmet monitors brain states, which may include those associated with anger, aggression, anxiety, fatigue, deception -- in principle, any mental state -- and transmit the data wirelessly to a command center.

DOJ_NMG_0106763

In battle, that would let commanders redeploy soldiers who are in no state to fight or carry out certain missions; you might not want a soldier who is boiling over with rage to search civilians. How an office supervisor, airport screener or job interviewer might make use of the technology is left to the reader's imagination.

A Darpa project using fMRI imaging of brain activity applies the discovery that recognizing a face or place you've seen before triggers a characteristic pattern of cortical activity. Do you recognize this terrorist training camp? This terrorist? The benefits could be huge. As with polygraphs and fingerprint analysis, however, technologies can be widely deployed without a solid scientific foundation about their rate of false positives, with the result that they send the innocent to prison.

In a new book, "Mind Wars," Prof. Moreno describes a Darpa project on a drug called CX717, which enables sleep-deprived people to maintain memory and cognitive function. In a world where students take Ritalin to give them a boost on the SAT and Provigil to pull all-nighters, there is no reason to think CX717, if it passes more tests, will be confined to military pilots on long-haul flights. If the drug doesn't succeed in keeping a sleep-deprived brain sharp, maybe Darpa-funded research on neurostimulation -- little zaps of electricity to improve cognitive performance -- will.

Presumably, workers and students will have the legal right to reject such "enhancements," Prof. Moreno says. Soldiers might not. Should they? Will employers or others pressure people to accept better thinking through technology? Will the use of such "augmented cognition" by business competitors have the same effect as steroids in baseball, where the perception that everyone is using them exerts pressure to do the same, to keep the playing field level? There has been virtually no debate on the ethical questions raised by the brave new brain technologies.

Ever since the atomic bomb, physicists have known that their work has potential military uses, and have spoken up about it. But on the morality of sending orders directly to the brain (of a soldier, employee, child, prisoner ...), or of devices that read thoughts and intentions from afar, neuroscientists have been strangely silent. The time to speak up is before the genie is out of the bottle.

OTHER NEWS:

Local Elections Test For Iran President (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, December 15, 2006

Iranians go to the polls Friday for local council elections that are expected to be a first test of support for hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad since he took office more than a year ago.

Ahmadinejad could face dissatisfaction among conservatives, some of whom feel he has been too caught up in confrontations with the West and has failed to deal with Iran's struggling economy.

Reformists — whose movement was largely crushed by hard-liners after dominating the councils, parliament and the presidency in the late 1990s and early 2000s — are hoping the vote will show popular support on which to rebuild.

All 233,000 candidates, including some 5,000 women, for town and city councils across the country were vetted by parliamentary committees, which are dominated by hard-liners. The committees disqualified about 10,000 nominees, reports said.

In the capital of Tehran, candidates plastered streets and squares of the city with posters and placards and flooded cell phones with election-related text messages.

Voters also will elect the Assembly of Experts, a body of 86 senior clerics that is charged with monitoring Iran's supreme leader and choosing his successor.

However, participation in that vote was expected to be low since there is very little difference among the candidates, who are carefully selected by Guardian Council, an election watchdog controlled by hard-liners.

The external controls on elections have been key in ensuring the ultimate authority of Iran's Islamic cleric leadership. It will be only the third time that Iranians vote for local councils, a reform introduced by former reformist President Mohammad Khatami in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0106764

About 46 million Iranians are eligible to vote in the elections for 113,000 seats in about 45,000 city and village councils. The councils approve community budgets and planning projects. In smaller cities and towns, the councils elect mayor — although in Tehran and other large cities, they only propose nominees, among whom the Interior Ministry chooses.

About 64 percent of eligible voters were expected to take part in the elections, Iran's official news agency IRNA said, based on a survey it conducted in five major cities. Results were expected Sunday or Monday.

Most importantly, the vote could be a measure of conservatives' support — or lack thereof — for Ahmadinejad, who won 2005 presidential elections riding overwhelming backing from hard-liners.

"Division among conservatives is the most significant point of (Friday's) election. Its result can also affect further elections in the coming years," said Saeed Laylaz, a political analyst in the Kargozaran daily newspaper. Parliament and presidential elections are expected to be held in 2009.

Even some hard-liners have complained that Ahmadinejad, who ran on a platform of justice and creating jobs, has boosted Iran's rhetoric against the West but has failed to fix Iran's internal problems, including high unemployment, estimated at 11 percent.

Ahmadinejad has refused to back down on Iran's nuclear ambitions despite Western threats of sanctions. The U.S. accuses Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, a claim Tehran denies. The president has also touted himself as a strong anti-Israeli leader, saying Israel will be "wiped out" and sponsoring a conference of Holocaust deniers earlier this week, causing international outrage.

Many of the Tehran races pit Ahmadinejad supporters against backers of fellow conservative Mayor Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, an Iraq-Iran war veteran and commercial airline pilot.

One of the pro-Ahmadinejad candidates is the president's sister, Parvin Ahmadinejad, who has used slogans including "Justice with No Exception" as part of her campaign.

Despite the vetting done by the committees, some reformist candidates were also in the race, including two former vice presidents and one former Cabinet member from Khatami's administration.

Reformers lost control of the councils in 2003, then lost parliament in 2004 before Khatami had to leave office in 2005 because of term limits.

Rogues And Fools (NYT)

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

This week's conference in Iran of Holocaust deniers and racists was, predictably, a circus of Holocaust denial and racism argued by discredited scholars and even the former Ku Klux Klan leader, David Duke. But one should never underestimate the political power of these vicious ideas, even among supposedly respectable people across the Middle East and beyond.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran apparently believes his claims that the murder of six million Jews by the Nazis is a myth ginned up to justify the creation of the state of Israel. That is frightening enough. Couple that with his calls to wipe Israel off the map and his government's — so far unrestrained — drive to develop the technology needed to build a nuclear weapon, and you have even more reasons to keep yourself up at night.

What is also frightening is that Mr. Ahmadinejad believes there is political benefit in these hate-filled lies and may well be right.

He is clearly hoping they will divert Iranians' attention away from his failure to rein in corruption and improve the economy. (The conference opened just days before nationwide elections for City Councils.) These lies have already pumped up his standing even in the streets of Sunni-led Arab countries like Egypt, trumping suspicions of Shiite-led Iran's growing regional power.

This week's conference is another reminder as to why the power of rogues and fools should never be underestimated. And why history's truths must never be taken for granted or forgotten.

Israel Bars Hamas Official Carrying Millions (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106765

JERUSALEM, Dec. 14 — In a bizarre standoff that lasted more than seven hours on Thursday, Israel barred the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, from returning home to the Gaza Strip, saying he was carrying tens of millions of dollars in cash that could be used for terrorist attacks.

Mr. Haniya was finally allowed to cross from Egypt into the southern Gaza Strip late Thursday night, but only after leaving the money with Hamas officials who stayed behind in Egypt.

During his lengthy wait, dozens of angry gunmen from his Hamas movement shot up the Rafah border terminal, clashing first with Palestinian security forces on one side of the border and later with Egyptian security officials on the other side. At least 15 Palestinians were hurt, and most were believed to be from Hamas.

After Mr. Haniya reached the Gaza side, another round of shooting broke out and one of his sons was wounded and one of his bodyguards killed.

It was not clear how much money Mr. Haniya was carrying, though the Israeli news media put it at $35 million and said it had been packed in suitcases.

Several Hamas officials have ferried huge sums of cash into Gaza since the group came to power early this year, saying the money was desperately needed to pay government salaries after the cutoff of Western assistance.

The chaotic scenes along the border encapsulated the multiple crises facing the Palestinians: the continuing conflict with Israel, the Palestinians' internecine battles and their worsening financial plight.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas government who was traveling with Mr. Haniya, said in a telephone interview that he and other Hamas officials had the money in El Arish, Egypt, about 30 miles from the border. He declined to give the amount.

Other Palestinian officials said the money would be handed over to the Arab League in Cairo until a way could be found to get it to the Palestinian areas.

The Palestinians did not say where Mr. Haniya had obtained the money, though speculation focused on Iran. Mr. Haniya spent more than two weeks traveling in the Middle East, including a stop in Iran, which pledged $250 million to the Palestinian government.

The Palestinians have not placed any restrictions on the amount of cash that can be brought through Rafah as long as the money is declared at the border.

However, a senior Israeli security official said Israel acted because "we have reason to believe the money will be used to strengthen Hamas and will be used for terror." The official did not provide additional details or say how Israel knew that Mr. Haniya was trying to bring money into Gaza.

With internal Palestinian tensions escalating in the Gaza Strip, Mr. Haniya cut short his extended tour of the Middle East. He flew from Sudan to Egypt, and began heading overland Thursday afternoon toward the Gaza border. But before he arrived, Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, ordered the crossing closed.

Israel has no troops in Gaza, but it does have forces in southern Israel, just a few miles away from the Rafah crossing, and they could move into Gaza quickly if its order was defied.

Egypt closed its side of the border, and the Palestinian side shut down when the clashes erupted between the Hamas gunmen and the Palestinian security forces, who are loyal to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, from the rival Fatah movement.

Israel and Western countries cut the flow of money to the Palestinian government after Hamas came to power in March. The Hamas government has been able to pay salaries only partly and sporadically.

The Palestinian Authority needs more than $150 million a month for salaries and other basic expenses, and Hamas officials have sought to bring in at least a portion of that amount on their trips abroad.

When the Palestinians took control of the Rafah border crossing in November 2005, it allowed Palestinians in Gaza to travel to Egypt and on to the wider world without having to go through Israeli security.

Thursday's episode demonstrated Israel's ability to shut down the border even when its security forces are not present.

DOJ_NMG_0106766

Elsewhere in Gaza, Palestinian internal tensions were still running high. The Palestinian security forces arrested a suspect in the killing of three young sons of a Palestinian security official who were gunned down on Monday as they were being driven to school.

The suspect, Hisham Mkhaimar, belongs to the Popular Resistance Committees, and his arrest ignited a gun battle between the security forces and members of his faction. Shortly afterward, the Popular Resistance Committees kidnapped a member of the security forces and said he would not be released until Mr. Mkhaimar was freed.

In the West Bank, Israeli troops shot dead two Palestinian militants in one confrontation, and killed another Palestinian man in clashes with stone throwers, the military and Palestinian witnesses said.

In Israel, the High Court of Justice addressed one of the most contentious issues in the past six years of violence between Israel and the Palestinians. It ruled that Israel's targeted killings of Palestinian militants were legitimate in some circumstances.

But the court said Israel's military must exhaust other options first, like trying to arrest suspects, and must take into account the possibility of harming innocent civilians.

Palestinian Premier Barred At Border (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 14 -- Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh was stranded for much of Thursday in the Egyptian Sinai after Israel barred him from entering the Gaza Strip with millions of dollars in cash, a standoff that prompted armed demonstrations by his Hamas movement and gunfire as his convoy crossed the border hours later without the money.

Haniyeh attempted to enter Gaza through the Rafah crossing just after noon following a 16-day trip to Iran, Syria and other states that do not have relations with Israel. Some of those governments have pledged money to Hamas, whose administration has been effectively bankrupted by the international aid boycott that followed its victory in January legislative elections.

The United States also has threatened sanctions against any country or group that uses bank transfers to send money to Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize the Jewish state's right to exist. In recent months, Hamas officials have resorted to carrying cash into Gaza in suitcases, a financing method that has embarrassed Israeli officials who hope the boycott weakens the movement and brings a change in the Palestinian government.

The rules governing the operation of the border terminal at Rafah allow travelers to bring an unlimited amount of money through the crossing as long as it is declared to the European Union monitoring mission stationed there.

Israeli security officials said that Haniyeh was carrying "a few tens of millions of dollars" and that it was "very likely to be used for terrorist activities." They did not offer evidence to support the assertion. After cutting short what was planned to be a month-long trip, Haniyeh was returning to Gaza to address rising partisan violence in the territory.

But as Haniyeh arrived at the Egyptian side of the crossing, Israeli Defense Ministry officials contacted the E.U. delegation and ordered it closed. The order came from Defense Minister Amir Peretz.

A few hours later, several dozen gunmen from Hamas's military wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, opened fire at the crossing in an attempt to force it open. They also clashed with members of the presidential guard loyal to the rival Fatah movement.

Israeli security officials informed Haniyeh that he could enter Gaza without the money, something the prime minister agreed to do as night fell. The Egyptian intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, then arranged for Haniyeh to leave the money in the port city of El Arish with two Hamas officials, who will escort it to Arab League headquarters in Cairo.

By the time the deal was made, the E.U. monitors had abandoned the crossing because of gunfire. But Haniyeh's convoy was allowed to pass into Gaza just before 11 p.m. amid gunshots in the area of the crossing terminal that killed his bodyguard and lightly wounded his son and a political adviser.

After decades of managing the passage and patrolling the border, Israel effectively turned over the Rafah crossing to Palestinian and Egyptian responsibility following the withdrawal of Israeli settlers and troops from Gaza last year.

The crossing is Gaza's main gateway to the outside world, although Israeli officials fear it also serves as the entry point for foreign intelligence agents arriving to train Hamas's armed wing.

DOJ_NMG_0106767

Earlier in the day, Israeli forces killed a 26-year-old member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades near the West Bank city of Nablus. In a separate incident, Israeli soldiers fatally shot a 27-year-old Palestinian throwing rocks at forces near the Israeli settlement of Ariel.

The Israeli military said at least one Palestinian rocket fired from Gaza landed in southern Israel on Thursday evening, causing no injuries.

Palestinian PM Found With $35m In Cash (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

Israel on Thursday prevented Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister, from returning to Gaza in order to stop him bringing in cash possibly donated by Iran.

Reports said Mr Haniyeh, from the Hamas movement, was carrying $35m (€26.5m, £17.8m) in cash, believed to be part of the $350m he raised during a regional tour that took in Iran, Syria and Qatar. He was later allowed entry, but without the cash.

However, anger spilt over into violence following the order to close the Rafah terminal on the Gaza-Egypt border, given by Amir Peretz, Israeli defence minister.

The closure prompted about 2,000 Hamas supporters to storm the terminal where they had a gun battle with guards. Others used explosives to blow a gap in the concrete wall dividing Gaza and Egypt.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator, said the closure "could lead the region to an explosion and the Zionist enemy and its allies will bear the responsibility for the consequences".

The European Union monitoring team at Rafah said its 16 staff were evacuated and safe.

Hamas members have carried about $80m in cash into Gaza since March, when the west imposed an aid boycott aimed at bringing down the Islamic movement but which has increased poverty across the occupied territories.

The clashes at Rafah came as Hamas supporters threatened to defy any call for new elections that Fatah's Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, may make in a speech tomorrow.

Months of negotiations between Fatah and Hamas for a national unity government have foundered, along with hopes for an easing of the western boycott. But Hamas and independent analysts say Mr Abbas has no legal authority to call early elections.

Mr Haniyeh cut short his trip abroad to deal with the internal turmoil. Hamas to-day plans to celebrate the 19th anniversary of its foundation with marches and demonstrations in Gaza.

There were clashes in Gaza and the West Bank this week after Fatah blamed Hamas for the shooting dead on Monday of three young boys who were the sons of an intelligence official loyal to Mr Abbas.

Hamas In Control Of Gaza Border Crossing (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, December 15, 2006

Hamas gunmen seized control of the Gaza Strip's border crossing with Egypt on Thursday in a ferocious gunbattle with Fatah-allied border guards after Israel blocked the Hamas prime minister from crossing with tens of millions of dollars in aid.

More than two dozen people were wounded in the fighting, deepening factional violence that has pushed the rivals closer to civil war. One of the injured was an adult son of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

Haniyeh cut short a trip abroad and was trying to return to Gaza in a bid to quell the infighting between Hamas and Fatah. He finally was allowed to cross into Gaza late Thursday, but it was unclear whether he brought money for the cash-strapped Palestinian government.

After he crossed, there was a new burst of gunfire and Haniyeh's convoy was forced to speed away. Officials said Haniyeh was unharmed but his son was shot and slightly injured in the clashes.

Earlier Thursday, pro-Fatah Palestinian officers arrested a Hamas-linked militant in the killing of the three young sons of a Fatah security chief. The militant's allies retaliated by kidnapping a security officer.

Thursday's gunbattle at the border erupted after Hamas militants, angry that Israel was preventing Haniyeh from returning, stormed the Rafah terminal.

DOJ_NMG_0106768

The pro-Fatah Presidential Guard, responsible for securing the area, opened fire, setting off a gunfight. Terrified travelers ran for cover, some carrying their luggage. Crying women and children hid behind walls and taxis, while the European monitors who police the crossing fled. Two Hamas militants were among those wounded.

The Hamas militants, chanting "God is Great, let's liberate this place" took over the arrival hall, and border guards escorted the European monitors to safety. Two loud explosions rocked the area, and security officials said militants had blown a hole in the border fence about a half mile from the terminal.

The rampage destroyed furniture and computer equipment inside the terminal and plunged the area into darkness. Hospital officials said at least 27 people were wounded, two seriously.

With the terminal closed, Haniyeh was stranded on the Egyptian side of the border for several hours. Late Thursday, the Presidential Guard regained control of the terminal and the European monitors moved back in.

Thursday's unrest was likely to strain the U.S.-brokered deal that turned over control of the crossing to the Palestinians last year after four decades of Israeli control. The border can only operate in the presence of European monitors.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz, working with the EU monitors, had ordered the border closed to prevent Haniyeh from bringing in tens of millions of dollars he raised during a tour of Muslim countries, security officials said.

A senior Israeli security official said they were not trying to block Haniyeh's entry, only to keep out the money. The official said Israel had information the money would be used to strengthen Hamas or fund terror attacks, but he declined to provide further details. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the press.

A Palestinian official said Haniyeh was carrying $35 million he raised during his trip, which included stops in Syria and Iran.

Haniyeh left Gaza on Nov. 28 for what was supposed to be a monthlong trip to the Muslim world, with the goal of raising money for his government.

The Palestinian Authority has been crippled by international economic sanctions that have left it unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 workers. Israel and Western donor nations cut off hundreds of millions of dollars for the government after Hamas won legislative elections early this year, demanding the militant group renounce violence and recognize Israel.

Hamas officials have brought in more than $50 million to Gaza this year — far short of the government's needs.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, has been trying to persuade Hamas to join his more moderate party in a coalition government in hopes of lifting the sanctions. But talks between the sides broke down late last month.

Tensions heightened after Abbas threatened to call new elections, drawing charges from Hamas that he is plotting a coup. Abbas is scheduled to deliver a speech outlining his plan on Saturday.

The latest violence broke out Monday when gunmen riddled the car of a Fatah security officer, killing his three sons. Fatah accused Hamas of carrying out the shooting — a charge Hamas denied. The officer, apparently the target of the attack, was not in the car.

On Wednesday, gunmen in the southern Gaza Strip ambushed a Hamas commander and killed him in an execution-style slaying outside a courthouse. Hamas accused Fatah of being behind the killing.

Israel's High Court OKs Targeted Attacks (CHIT)

By Joel Greenberg

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Sanctioning one of the most controversial tactics used by Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians, the Israeli Supreme Court on Thursday upheld the army's policy of targeted killing of militants but said the legality of each attack had to be determined case-by-case.

The court declined to issue a blanket ban on the practice, frequently used by the Israelis during six years of fighting with the Palestinians. Some human-rights groups have called the tactic execution without trial and a violation of international law.

Targeted killings are often carried out from the air, with unmanned drones or helicopters firing missiles at cars in Palestinian cities, often wounding or killing bystanders along with the intended targets. According to figures compiled by Israeli human-rights group B'tselem, 339 Palestinians were killed in targeted attacks over the past six years, 129 of them bystanders.

DOJ_NMG_0106769

"It cannot be determined in advance that every targeted killing is prohibited according to customary international law, just as it cannot be determined in advance that every targeted killing is permissible under customary international law," the court said in a unanimous ruling by a three-judge panel. "There is thus no escaping examination of each and every case."

Two human-rights groups, The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel and the Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, petitioned the court in 2002 to ban the targeted killing policy, but a decision was repeatedly delayed.

The Israeli army has defended the tactic as an effective means of preventing militant attacks in cases in which the arrest of those involved is not possible, as is often the case in the Gaza Strip, from which the Israeli army withdrew last year.

The army says that the tactic is permissible in the context of an armed conflict and that civilian casualties are caused because militants operate in civilian areas.

In the most widely criticized Israeli strike, in July 2002, the air force dropped a 1-ton bomb on a house, killing Salah Shehadeh, the commander of the armed wing of Hamas, along with his bodyguard and 12 civilians, eight of them children.

The attack brought calls by some rights groups for criminal charges against the officers involved, including the current army chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, who was the air force chief at the time.

In 2004 Israel killed the wheelchair-bound founder and leader of Hamas, Sheik Ahmad Yassin, in an air strike that also killed five bystanders. A later attack killed Yassin's successor, Abdel Aziz Rantisi.

The court ruling, written by retired Chief Justice Aharon Barak, who was completing a backlog of decisions left from his tenure, listed several limits on the use of targeted killing.

"Well-based, strong and convincing information ... which has been most thoroughly verified is needed" regarding the identity and activities of the targeted person and he should not be attacked if less harmful means, such as arrest, can be used.

"Every effort must be made to minimize harm to innocent civilians," and such harm "must be proportional" to the military advantage gained by the attack. For example, shooting at a sniper firing from a house is permitted even if an innocent passerby might be harmed, but not bombing the house from the air and hitting scores of residents and bystanders, the ruling said.

Targeted killings should be investigated after they are carried out to determine the circumstances of the attack and whether the target was accurately identified, and compensation should be paid if innocent civilians were harmed, the ruling said.

"The fight against terror is subject to the rule of law," the court said. "We must balance security needs and human rights ... The ends do not justify the means."

Michael Sfard, an attorney for the petitioners, criticized the ruling, saying it "sanctions at least parts of the liquidation policy."

"It's pretty clear to me that the army interprets the ruling as a license to kill, this time a license to kill from the court," Sfard added.

Israeli Arab lawmakers said the ruling authorizes war crimes. "You can't give an officer or the army the title of both judge and executioner and give him the tools for execution in the field," said Ahmad Tibi, one of the legislators.

A Hamas spokesman in Gaza, Ismail Radwan, said the ruling "gives judicial cover for terrorist practices by the government."

But Shai Nitzan, the Israeli deputy state attorney, said the ruling sanctions a legal form of combat.

"We are talking about a state of war, and in war you can attack the terrorists with any legal method, and targeted killing, as we argued, is a legal method," Nitzan said.

Israeli High Court Backs Military On Its Policy Of 'Targeted Killings' (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 14 -- Israel's high court upheld Thursday the military's right to assassinate members of groups the state defines as terrorist organizations, but cautioned that such operations should always be weighed first against the potential harm to civilian bystanders and the human rights of the target.

The unanimous decision departs little from guidelines the military says it already follows in carrying out "targeted killings," the terminology used by the government and by the court in its ruling. But it does say commanders should allow an independent investigation to follow each assassination and recommends that the military compensate "innocent civilians" harmed in the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0106770

Under current practice, Israel's military works with Shin Bet, the domestic security service, to compile lists of Palestinians who are influential or active figures in armed groups. Using eavesdropping equipment, aerial surveillance and informants, air force pilots or drone operators receive detailed information about a target's movements, most commonly in the Gaza Strip, where the army no longer operates regularly on the ground.

Military officers say the decision to strike is made -- sometimes in a matter of minutes -- by balancing the threat posed by the target against the potential for injuring bystanders. Many of the strikes have killed civilians in addition to targeted individuals.

Israeli military officials said they would review the court's findings in coming days. But one senior officer who specializes in matters of international law said the ruling, although vague in places, appeared to be a "validation" of existing policies regarding assassinations, and he expected few new restrictions to be implemented.

The decision states that military commanders must have "strong and convincing" information before ordering an assassination, and should not do so "if a less harmful means can be employed," namely, arrest. The ruling also says that "every effort must be made to minimize harm to innocent civilians."

"The need to balance casts a heavy load on those whose job it is to provide security," the three-judge panel wrote. "Not every efficient means is also legal. The ends do not justify the means."

The ruling has been awaited outside Israel for what it might add to the debate underway in many countries, including the United States, over how to ensure basic human rights in what the Bush administration calls the "war on terrorism." Following Israel's lead, the U.S. military and intelligence agencies have also used drones to carry out assassinations, including a November 2002 strike on a car in Yemen that killed six suspected members of al-Qaeda.

The decision, one of the last to be issued by retiring Chief Justice Aharon Barak, represented a disappointing defeat for Israeli and Palestinian human rights organizations that have called the tactic, pioneered during the most recent Palestinian uprising, a war crime.

Hawkish lawmakers and officials from Israel's security establishment expressed pleasant surprise at the ruling, given that Barak, an activist judge throughout his decades-long career, has often come down against the military in cases where human rights and security measures appear to conflict. The court said the state "must balance security needs and human rights."

The ruling stemmed from a petition filed by two human rights organizations -- one Israeli, one Palestinian -- challenging the state's right to assassinate members of Hamas, the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades and other armed groups fighting the Jewish state. In its decision, the court said the "starting point of the legal analysis is that between Israel and the terrorist organizations active in the Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip" -- referring to the territory Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war -- "there exists a continuous situation of armed conflict."

The ruling states that international law applies to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying "it is not an internal state conflict that is subject to the rules of law enforcement."

The practice of targeted assassination began officially in November 2000, when an Israeli helicopter fired missiles at a car carrying Hussein Abayat, a senior member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, near the city of Bethlehem. The strike killed Abayat and two bystanders.

Israeli security officials have argued that targeted killings are among their most effective tools against the armed groups, which have carried out scores of suicide attacks against Israeli civilians, fight from civilian areas and employ other guerrilla tactics that pose challenges to Israel's conventional army.

But many of the assassinations have been conducted by Israeli attack helicopters, drones or fighter aircraft, and civilian casualties are common. B'Tselem, an Israeli human rights group, reports that in operations over the past six years Israeli security forces have assassinated 210 intended targets but also killed 129 bystanders.

"Anyone who thinks that in this kind of warfare things cannot go wrong and mistakes cannot happen does not know in what world he is living," Maj. Gen. Giora Eiland, the former head of Israel's National Security Council, told Israel's Army Radio. "Compare the terrorist attacks that were taking place only four years ago with those taking place today. In the last analysis, we are now living in an incomparably better situation now than what we lived in then. How do you think that came about? It is partly due to targeted killings."

DOJ_NMG_0106771

Barak, who once ruled that Israeli officials could not use torture during interrogations even to stop imminent suicide bombings, rejected in Thursday's decision the concept of "unlawful combatants" employed by the Bush administration to justify detaining suspects without charges.

Instead, the court decided that "members of the terrorist organizations are not combatants," but civilians who relinquish certain legal protections when they participate directly in "hostilities" intended to "harm the army or civilians."

By way of offering guidelines to military commanders responsible for ordering assassinations, the decision says that "shooting at a terrorist sniper shooting at soldiers or civilians from his porch is permitted, even if an innocent passerby is harmed. Such harm conforms to the principle of proportionality.

"However, that is not the case if the building is bombed from the air and scores of its residents and passersby are harmed," it continues. "Between these two extremes are the hard cases. Thus a meticulous examination of every case is required."

In reviewing specific cases, the ruling said, "the Court will ask itself if a reasonable military commander could have made the decision which was made." Human rights lawyers criticized that advice, along with several other aspects of the decision, as overly vague.

"Here the court has done something that will create a cloud of illegality over many missions, because the officer will not know what is allowed and what is prohibited," said Michael Sfard, the attorney for the petitioners in the case. "When you go to court, at least you expect to get a clear ruling."

Sfard also represents petitioners in the case of Salah Shehada, a Hamas military commander killed in July 2002 when an Israeli F-16 dropped a one-ton bomb on his house in Gaza, killing him and 14 others, including nine children. Sfard said he will seek a new hearing "on the basis of this ruling, which obliges the court to order a criminal investigation."

In Lebanon, Hizbullah's Rise Provokes Shiite Dissent (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

BEIRUT, LEBANON

Hizbullah's ability to draw hundreds of thousands of Shiites to central Beirut to rally against the Lebanese government is the most visible evidence that the militants are now the undisputed representative of the country's Shiite community.

Yet some of the party's coreligionists have started to publicly question Hizbullah's political monopoly. They worry that its ambitious gambit to topple the Western-backed government is intended to benefit backers in Iran and Syria and will be detrimental to the long-term interests of Shiites.

"Hizbullah's actions definitely are not in the interests of Shiites nor of Lebanon," says Sheikh Ali al-Amine, the Shiite mufti of the Jabal Amel district of south Lebanon.

Shiite voices of dissent are few, but are gaining more attention at a time when Lebanon is serving as a battleground in the emerging struggle between Iran and its regional allies - dubbed by some as a "Shiite crescent" - and the Sunni-dominated Arab world led by Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

Hizbullah is caught in the vortex of this regional contest, torn between satisfying the demands of its foreign patrons while serving the needs of its domestic Shiite constituency.

Demonstrations calling for the resignation of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora have been ongoing since Dec. 1. Since then, the numbers of Hizbullah and opposition supporters filling downtown Beirut seem to ebb and flow at the call of Hizbullah chief Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah.

Thursday, in a bid to ease the political crisis, the Lebanese government and opposition groups agreed on a national unity cabinet in which major decisions could be taken only by consensus, said Arab League chief Amr Moussa. He told reporters, however, that more talks were required to conclude the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0106772

Mr. Moussa called on all the parties to defuse the tension and expressed hope that the remaining issues could be resolved in the next two weeks. "Progress is clear and consensus is rising. Please be patient a bit longer," he said. "We hope to finish in the next two weeks or at the end of the month." The anti-Hizbullah voices

Sheikh Amine has become Hizbullah's most visible critic after sparking controversy four months ago by publicly refuting Hizbullah's claim of a "divine victory" in its summer war against Israel. Still, he appears an unlikely critic of Hizbullah.

Wearing a black turban that marks him as a descendent of the prophet Muhammad, he was once close to Hizbullah and in 1981 taught the youthful Hassan Nasrallah at a Shiite seminary in the Iranian city of Qom. The sheikh remembers the future Hizbullah leader as "clever and a quick learner."

"I never wanted to turn myself into a figure of opposition to Hizbullah. But during the war I saw mistakes," he says. "The aim of Hizbullah is to capture all the Shiite sect and push it into the unknown."

During the war, Mona Fayyad, a professor at the Lebanese University in Beirut, penned an acerbic opinion piece titled "To be a Shiite now," railing against the sect's subservience to Hizbullah.

"To be a Shiite is to keep silent and not to ask what is the purpose of liberating a country. Is it to destroy it all over again and to make it possible for it to be occupied once more?" she wrote.

A year ago, Mohammed Mattar, a Shiite lawyer, filed a lawsuit against a prominent Hizbullah cleric who had issued a fatwa, or religious edict, forbidding any Shiite from accepting a ministerial post after the pro-Hizbullah ministers walked out of the government.

"The edict crossed the red line between democracy and a parliamentary system run by the clergy," Mr. Mattar says, describing the fatwa as the "politics of intimidation."

The lawsuit, which was signed by five Shiites and three Christians, was, he says, "bold, but ultimately you have to defend the principles of the republic. If you want to live in a society ruled by clerics, go to Iran."

Those that have spoken out against Hizbullah say they have been subjected to subtle intimidation. Amine had to cancel his e-mail address after receiving anonymous hate mail, while others have been told they are not welcome at social events.

Lokman Slim, a vocal Hizbullah critic who heads Hayya Bina, a political reform group, says his name was included on two "lists of dishonor" circulated on the Web during the war.

"The Hayya Bina website was shut down during the war due to kindly advice, slash, threats," he says with a wry smile.

Hizbullah's dominance of Shiite politics in Lebanon has its roots in the Lebanese state's historical neglect of the Shiite community. Traditionally marginalized by Lebanon's Christian and Sunni elite and ruled by a handful of feudal clans, the Shiites were mainly confined to the impoverished rural south and east.

Hizbullah was established with Iranian support in the wake of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon and soon began to challenge the already existing Amal Movement for dominance of Shiite politics.

Both groups secured loyalty through offering services to their constituents. Nabih Berri, the leader of Amal and Lebanon's parliamentary speaker, adopted a typically Lebanese system of patronage, using his influence within the state to provide his supporters with employment in government institutions. From shadow militia to Shiite institution

Hizbullah, which initially operated outside the state, used Iranian funds to build a shadow social welfare network for poor Shiites that included schools and hospitals. The battlefield successes of Hizbullah's military wing against Israeli occupation forces further sustained its popularity and earned it a regional standing.

Today, Hizbullah is a formidable multifaceted organization, arguably the second-largest employer after the Lebanese state, with some 35,000 Shiite families directly or indirectly dependent on the party.

Last year, it formed a strategic alliance with rival Amal, effectively absorbing the movement into its own apparatus. That leaves Hizbullah as the only real representative of Shiites, making it all but impossible for an alternative Shiite political entity to emerge.

"According to opinion polls, Hizbullah commands the support of over 90 percent of the community and it's very difficult for any new group to compete against that," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb of the Carnegie Endowment's Middle East Center in Beirut.

Hizbullah's Shiite opponents argue that the party's popularity is lower than the polls suggest. But they agree that the state's historical disregard for Shiites is to blame as it created a social and political vacuum that was subsequently filled by Hizbullah.

DOJ_NMG_0106773

Although they say there is a need for a political alternative, swaying Shiite public opinion away from Hizbullah is a near hopeless task.

"We are unable to compete against Hizbullah as secular republican Shiites," says Mr. Slim. "They have God on their side, and it's impossible to compete."

Lebanese Government Still Standing (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

With the pro-Hezbollah movement and its Syrian backers at an impasse, the U.S. should leave well enough alone.

TWO WEEKS AGO, nobody was giving odds that Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government would survive the year. Popular street demonstrations had brought together the major Shiite parties with a weird pro-Syrian coalition led by the Maronite Christian former general Michel Aoun (once a mortal enemy of Syria, confusingly enough). Siniora dismissed the protests as a coup d'etat engineered by Hezbollah and its Syrian backers, but without Shiite representation, his own government looked illegitimate and Hezbollah strongman Hassan Nasrallah's demand for a "national unity" government seemed almost reasonable.

Today, Siniora doesn't look much stronger, but his government is still in business, and the protesters have little to show for their efforts. Sunni Arab governments have supported the prime minister, and the pro-Hezbollah movement is, for the time being, in a stalemate. It is Hezbollah's pro-Syrian faction that remains locked out of the government (which the two major Shiite parties quit in November) and facing a crisis of momentum.

What lessons can we draw from this impasse? First, the current demonstrations are different from the protests last year, which were driven by public rage over the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, a crime in which Syria and its Lebanese clients were probably involved.

It's also clear that for all of Hezbollah's attempts to claim the banner of Lebanon's forgotten Shiites, there is more at stake here than an attempt to give voice to the disenfranchised. It was Hezbollah, along with the more moderate Shiite party Amal, that decided to quit the government last month after a cabinet-stacking power play failed. Nabih Berri, the Amal leader who has been a player in Lebanese politics almost since the time of King Solomon, has participated in governments far dicier than this one, and there is nothing stopping Lebanon's large Shiite minority from being represented in even greater strength than it was before Hezbollah's walkout.

While Siniora's opponents attempt to dismiss him as a U.S. puppet, he leads a broad coalition of Sunnis, Christians, Druze and other groups. Nevertheless, there is an issue here for the United States. In 1990, Lebanon was a chip awarded to Syria in return for its participation in the Persian Gulf War coalition. Now that a bipartisan consensus is beginning to form around the idea that negotiations with Syria are necessary, it's imperative that the U.S. not again make the mistake of sacrificing a shaky but functional democracy for token gestures at assistance in Iraq.

U.S. Standing Sinks In Mideast (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Attitudes about the United States have deteriorated sharply in the Middle East in the past two years, a survey of five countries in the region shows.

U.S. policy, such as support for Israel, has long been criticized in the Middle East, but a majority of those polled now hold negative views of the American people as well.

"What these numbers say to me is that people are dramatically affected by our policies," said James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, for whom the survey was conducted. "Our people and our products are at risk in the region."

The survey was conducted in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco, Jordan and Lebanon. Without exception, a strong majority expressed unfavorable opinions of the United States. The lowest level was in Jordan, where only 5 percent said they had a favorable view of the United States in general. In 2002, Jordanian favorability of the U.S. was the second highest in the region, at 34 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0106774

Survey respondents tend to distinguish between U.S. policy and the American people, but that distinction appears to have eroded in the past four years. Mr. Zogby said he first noticed a distinct shift in 2004. In the 2006 survey, only a plurality of Lebanese polled expressed a favorable view of the American people, with 44 percent approving and 18 percent expressing unfavorable views.

The American people are viewed least favorably in Saudi Arabia, where 18 percent said they had a favorable opinion and 34 percent expressed an unfavorable opinion. At the same time, 50 percent of Saudis say they like American products, compared with 24 percent who do not.

"Our policy [In Iraq] drags everything," Mr. Zogby said. "The negatives have become very pronounced."

Middle Eastern poll respondents cited the Iraq war and perceived U.S. support for Israel over the Palestinians as their biggest concerns. "One is the immediate wound while the other is the defining wound," Mr. Zogby said.

The Iraq Study Group, which recently submitted a list of 79 policy recommendations to President Bush, says the Israeli-Arab conflict is tied directly to the escalating violence in Iraq. The group has recommended that the White House emphasize a broader Middle East peace process as part of its effort to improve the situation in Iraq.

"You can accomplish good things in Iraq but you need regional support," Mr. Zogby said. "They would be wise to look at what the commission has proposed."

The one aspect of U.S. society to receive a net positive rating from all five Middle Eastern countries was the American education system.

North Korea Emphasizes Nuclear Pride (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- North Korean propaganda is putting a renewed focus on pride in the country's new nuclear capability, a sign that suggests disarmament talks next week will make little progress, Pyongyang watchers say.

Immediately after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear-bomb test, the country's state-controlled news media claimed its weapons were a great benefit for the country, says Brian Myers, a specialist in North Korean propaganda based in Seoul. And last month, signs appeared on the streets of Pyongyang with slogans such as "Revel in the pride of being a country in the Nuclear Club."

State propaganda is one of the few windows into North Korea's nominally communist dictatorship, which controls the flow of information and people into and out of the country. The first job held by dictator Kim Jong Il was in the propaganda department.

Mr. Myers says the current campaign is a sign that nuclear capability has become a tool for the government to galvanize support at a time when the country is suffering food shortages and economic decay.

Little Headway Is Expected

Only a handful of researchers study the propaganda. One reason is the difficulty of the Korean language. Another is that few people are willing to bet that the country, which has appeared to be on the brink of collapse for more than a decade, will sustain a career's work. Mr. Myers is one of only two non-Koreans who regularly visit Seoul's North Korean cultural center.

The other non-Korean regular at the cultural center, Andrei Lankov, a Russian scholar of Korean history, agrees that next week's talks will make little headway. "I can't see North Korea willing to give up nuclear weapons," he says. "And I don't think the United States or the others will offer what it will take for them to consider it."

A month after the nuclear test, North Korea agreed to return to the six-nation disarmament talks it has boycotted since November 2005. Since the early 1990s, the U.S. and others have offered money, food and other assistance to the impoverished country in an effort to persuade it not to build atomic weapons, fearing Pyongyang would either use the weapons or sell them to terrorists.

Mr. Myers, the 43-year-old son of a U.S. Army chaplain, lived around the world while growing up. He became interested in propaganda when he spent a year as a high-school student in apartheid-era South Africa. He then lived in Germany in the years before its reunification. He later made North Korean propaganda the topic of his doctoral thesis and now teaches Korean literature and North Korean culture at Dongseo University in Busan, South Korea's second-largest city.

DOJ_NMG_0106775

North Korean news media for 60 years have dished out a steady diet of criticism of Americans, Japanese and South Koreans. Newspapers still run stories playing up American-inflicted damage during the 1950-53 Korean War, when the communist-backed North and the U.S.-backed South fought for control of the Korean Peninsula. They describe South Korea as a hostage to the U.S., which stations about 25,000 military personnel here. Novels portray American and Japanese armies as too scared to invade because of Mr. Kim's cunning strategies. Posters call for the destruction of U.S. nuclear weapons, and magazines depict Americans as clowns or animals.

Several months ago, Mr. Myers says, posters appeared in the streets of Pyongyang depicting a nuclear bomb and urging people to "Prepare to Die" or "Dare to Die." That meant the government had added a nuclear element to the message of constant war -- there has still been no formal end to the Korean War halted by a 1953 truce between North and South -- that the regime uses to help maintain totalitarian control. "They're trying to let people know they have nothing to fear, that the United States will regularly confront North Korea and try to bully it, but that because of Kim Jong Il, America will never succeed," Mr. Myers says.

'Completely New Angle'

Following the October nuclear test, North Korean newspapers claimed South Koreans were just as happy about the test as North Koreans and that the nuclear program was enabling South Korean business to flourish. The logic appeared to be that the U.S. military was intimidated by the North's nuclear program and that without this, the U.S. might have started a damaging confrontation.

Mr. Myers believes the Kim regime is trying to cope with North Koreans' finding out, chiefly through smuggled videos, that South Korea is much wealthier. So his government is responding by saying the South is wealthy because the North has put economic priority on the military. "This is a completely new angle," he says. "In the North Korea of old, they would have not seen any reason to present South Korean capitalists as being happy with the nuclear program. It shows that Marxist-Leninism is being leached out of the ideology and that all you have left is nationalism."

Mr. Myers is sometimes consulted by U.S. diplomats and military officials for his observations on North Korea. "You really have to admire these State Department people who do these negotiations and go through these grueling talks for days and weeks," Mr. Myers said. "They haven't given up on them. I never have expected anything from the talks with the North Koreans."

North Korean Talks To Resume Monday (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

BEIJING _ North Korea is digging in its heels before crucial nuclear talks rev up Monday, raising questions over whether it wants to buy time or is ready to negotiate in earnest.

In recent days Pyongyang's main government-controlled newspaper has dismissed any suggestion that the lure of a massive aid package might pry the North from its nuclear weapons program.

If North Korea listens to the "sweet talk" of the West and accepts massive aid to give up its nuclear weapons, "it will lead to our destruction," said an editorial in the Rodong Shinmun earlier this month. The editorial went on to assert that Europe and the United States hoodwinked Libya a few years ago with a similar deal and stiffed the former Communist bloc nations of Eastern Europe in pledges that led them to capitalism.

Blustery talk from Pyongyang may be designed to bolster a negotiating position for the talks, which come 10 weeks after the North conducted its first nuclear test.

Amid reports of pending U.S. incentives to stir North Korea to action at the talks, a senior Bush administration official said North Korean envoys led him to believe in late November that Pyongyang may be ready to take specific steps toward dismantling its nuclear program.

"There were indications that the DPRK (Democratic People's Republic of Korea), the North Koreans, would be prepared to deal in specifics at the coming round," Christopher Hill, an assistant secretary of state who is the chief U.S. envoy on North Korea, said in a briefing in Washington.

Hill said Washington wants "concrete progress," not just talk, at the negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0106776

China tried to dampen expectations Thursday, and one veteran North Korea watcher voiced skepticism whether the sixth round of negotiations _ and the first after a 13-month stalemate _ would lead to any breakthrough.

"The six-party talks are likely to remain a meaningless exercise," said Andrei Lankov, a Russian-born expert on North Korea at Seoul's Kookmin University, referring to the talks hosted by China that include the two Koreas, Russia, Japan and the United States. "The North Korean side is not willing to consider any serious concessions."

With a successful nuclear test under their belt, Lankov said, North Korean officials "are not in the mood to compromise. . . . From their point of view, giving up the nuclear weapons is unnecessary and unthinkable."

North Korea is believed to be the world's ninth nuclear power.

Hill arrives in Beijing Sunday, after a possible stop in Tokyo, and said he would meet immediately in informal talks with Russian, Chinese and North Korean envoys.

The six-party negotiations, which China began hosting in 2003, formally begin Monday and are open-ended in length and flexible in format.

A flurry of media reports around the region offered conflicting signs about the positions of Washington and Pyongyang in the run-up to the talks. In Seoul, the quasi-official Yonhap news agency, citing diplomatic sources, said the Bush administration has offered Pyongyang a written security guarantee in exchange for concrete actions to end its nuclear program.

A South Korean newspaper, the Hankook Ilbo, reported that North Korea has told the United States that it's willing to shut down the key Yongbyon nuclear complex and accept inspections by U.N. nuclear monitors if conditions are met, mainly the lifting of U.S. sanctions imposed on the North over its alleged counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

One critical question remains unclear: Is North Korea willing to consider giving up its nuclear weapons in exchange for abundant aid, diplomatic recognition and security guarantees?

Hill said he didn't know if Pyongyang had yet made that strategic decision.

"I wish I could answer that question," Hill said. "At this point, I cannot tell whether that choice has been made or not."

The Bush administration says it believes North Korea has enough nuclear material for anywhere from eight to 10 bombs. As time passes, the number may be growing.

The former president of South Korea's military academy, Jang Joon-ik, told Yonhap this week he believes Pyongyang will have 55 kilograms (121 pounds) of weapons-grade plutonium by the end of the year, and that continued reprocessing of spent fuel rods would give it enough fissile material to produce 50 nuclear bombs by 2010.

N. Korea Coming Back To The Table (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

BEIJING — After a 13-month boycott, a nuclear test and much posturing, North Korea returns Monday to six-nation talks that have yielded few results and resume with few expectations.

An important focus for early jostling will be timing and deadlines, analysts said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has called on the North to dismantle its nuclear weapons program within two years in exchange for aid, energy assistance and improved relations.

North Korea has an interest in avoiding a quick resolution. The longer it keeps the program intact, the more likely the world is to accept its status as a member of the nuclear club, as Pakistan and India discovered. Extending talks beyond the 2008 U.S. elections also could bring it a new negotiating partner, in the form of a new administration, that it might find easier to deal with.

As always, each participant in the talks will be looking over its shoulder. Though the U.S. and the other parties — China, South Korea, Japan and Russia — favor quick results, they don't want to push North Korea so hard that it walks away.

The last time North Korea left in a huff, the standoff led to its Oct. 9 test of what experts believe was a relatively small nuclear device — probably less than 1 kiloton, or about 7% of the explosive capability of the 1945 Hiroshima bomb. Another breakdown in negotiations could lead to a second test.

DOJ_NMG_0106777

The regime in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital, has an interest in producing a more powerful and technologically sophisticated explosion. Such a test would not only bolster the country's deterrence against attack but would also raise its weapons program's value as a bargaining chip, offering hope that other countries will pay it more to disband the program.

A key short-term reason North Korea is returning to the table could be the carrots and sticks China quietly offered its neighbor, calling into question how motivated Pyongyang is to achieve real progress.

The longer North Korea keeps the other nations talking, the less likely they are to impose cargo inspections on it or strictly implement economic sanctions involving luxury goods and conventional, ballistic, chemical and nuclear weapons under United Nations Resolution 1718, a measure passed unanimously by the Security Council on Oct. 14.

In recent weeks there has been some narrowing of the wide gap between the U.S. and North Korea in at least two areas: financial sanctions and direct talks.

Pyongyang has been incensed by the sanctions the U.S. imposed in 2005 involving at least $24 million in North Korean assets at a Macao bank. The action was taken in response to Pyongyang's reported money laundering, weapons proliferation and counterfeiting activities, and Washington has insisted this issue be handled outside the six-party framework.

In recent weeks, however, the Bush administration has said that $12 million of the funds might not be related to illegal activity, and officials have indicated a greater willingness to bring the issue into the talks.

After long maintaining that the administration would not hold direct talks with Pyongyang, chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill met with his North Korean counterpart Nov. 28. The three-way meetings also involved China, but Beijing officials left the two alone for substantial periods.

"So in effect, the United States was talking directly with North Korea," said Shi Yuanhua, deputy director of the Center for Korean Studies at Fudan University in Shanghai. "The Americans have made their greatest compromise so far."

But huge differences remain as Washington insists on a complete dismantling of the nuclear weapons program before anything else, even as North Korea insists on compensation before it dismantles a program it has been working on and using as leverage since 1990.

"It would certainly be good if we could solve this within two years," said Yan Xuetong, a professor at Beijing's Qinghua University. "But looking at cases in South Africa, Ukraine, Libya, it can take decades to solve a nuclear crisis. This one has only lasted 16 years."

Analysts say that if this round of talks both prevents the North from testing again and stops other nations from tightening sanctions on the regime — in effect a stand-down on both sides — that in itself will be a small achievement.

"Everyone wants good results," said Zhang Liangui, a Korea expert at the Central Party School in Beijing. "Without deadlines and an agreement on holding regular talks, however, that's just a nice wish."

NKorea May Stage Second Nuclear Test During Six-party Talks: Minister (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

North Korea may stage a second nuclear weapons test to strengthen its hand during upcoming negotiations on scrapping its nuclear programme, South Korea's new defence minister has warned.

Kim Jang-Soo, a former army chief of staff, ordered the 650,000-strong military to step up combat-readiness to deter possible aggression from the North, the defence ministry said.

"We have to be thoroughly prepared to counter the possibility of a second or third nuclear test by North Korea and a possible hostile act by it in the process of negotiations over its nuclear weapons programme," Kim said in a message to troops.

The six-nation nuclear talks are set to resume in Beijing on Monday, 13 months after the North walked out. They involve the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia.

The North staged its first nuclear test on October 9, sparking international condemnation and United Nations sanctions.

Later that month North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il told China that he had no plans for a second test but that increased international pressure could trigger "further measures".

Defence minister Kim issued his letter after a closed-door meeting of 130 senior commanders, including General Kim Kwan-Jin, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the army, navy and air force chiefs of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0106778

The defence minister also urged no further delay in the planned relocation of US bases to Pyeongtaek south of Seoul.

The defence ministry said this week that South Korea would not be able to complete a major relocation of US military bases by 2008 as scheduled, due to protests by residents and a dispute over cost-sharing.

The US forces want to consolidate 35 US bases scattered across the nation into two hub bases by 2008, including one at Pyeongtaek.

Some 29,500 troops are stationed in the country, a legacy of the Korean War. The number is set to drop to 25,000 by 2008.

$1M Fund Intended To Assist Activists (AP)

AP, December 15, 2006

The State Department announced a $1 million emergency fund Thursday to help cover such expenses as legal fees and medical bills for human rights activists.

The fund is meant to pay short-term bills for people who take great risks by defending human rights "in countries where tyranny persists," the department said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also redefined U.S. goals and expectations for international treatment of independent groups that promote democracy and human rights.

People should be able to freely join such groups, which the State Department calls non-governmental organizations or NGOs, and the groups should be free to act within international law, the department said.

"Whenever NGOs and other human rights defenders are under siege, freedom and democracy are undermined. The world's democracies must push back," Rice said in commemorating national human rights week. "We must defend the defenders."

The department issued a 10-point statement of principles on NGOs.

In a slap at Russia, one principle says governments seeking to regulate the groups should aim to protect, not impede, their work. Russia was not mentioned in literature the department handed out Thursday nor in Rice's brief remarks, but the United States has been concerned about a law passed this year that requires groups such as Amnesty International to register with the government.

Another such group, the non-governmental National Endowment for Democracy, said Wednesday that Russia had "steadily retreated from democratic reform" under President Vladimir Putin.

Bush Creates Activists' Funding (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

The Bush administration will create a $1 million fund to support democracy and human rights advocates around the world who are being harassed and persecuted by their governments, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

Miss Rice also announced that, beginning next year, she will bestow a Freedom Defenders Award on a foreign activist or nongovernmental organization and a Diplomacy for Freedom Award on a U.S. ambassador for "working to end tyranny and promote democracy."

"The fund will begin at $1 million and will be replenished each year as needed," the secretary said. "This fund, to be administered by the State Department, will enable us to quickly disburse small grants to human rights defenders facing extraordinary needs due to government repression. This funding, for example, could go to cover legal or medical costs or short-term support to meet the pressing needs of an activist's family."

The initiative, announced at a State Department ceremony to mark Human Rights Week, is the administration's response to a global trend of government crackdown on NGOs, said U.S. officials. They cited Russia and other former Soviet republics in Central Asia as examples of some of the most drastic measures.

A Russian law limiting the activities of NGOs and their ability to receive support from abroad sparked criticism from Washington and concern about their work with American and other Western organizations in the vast country.

The governments in Moscow and Central Asia "mischaracterized the recent color revolutions" in Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan, said a senior officer at a U.S. organization that promotes democracy around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0106779

"Those governments wrongly concluded that the color revolutions were somehow fomented by the United States and by NGOs," said the officer, who asked not to be named for fear of retribution. "What actually took place was that pro-democracy organizations were supporting a credible democratic process, not a particular election outcome."

Barry F. Lowenkron, assistant secretary of state for democracy, human rights and labor, said that, in addition to Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan and others, countries in Asia, Latin America, Africa and the Middle East have "pushed back against NGOs."

Even though the situation in Indonesia, Malaysia, China and Vietnam is not as grim as that in Iran, Burma or Venezuela, "a clear statement in support of NGOs is needed," Mr. Lowenkron told reporters. He said the $1 million will come out of the $60 million budget of his bureau, pointing out that it is only "one vehicle" the administration will use to promote the rights of NGOs.

He also said that, if a foreign government does not allow U.S. funding to reach its recipients, the issue will become part of the relationship with that country.

American groups active overseas welcomed Miss Rice's announcement yesterday.

"The amount of money is not as important as the political message this is sending," said Kenneth D. Wollack, president of the National Democratic Institute. "Any initiative that gives concrete expression to our commitment to human rights, democracy and the rule of law is something to be welcomed and should draw strong bipartisan support."

Pentagon Calls For New African Command (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, December 15, 2006

The Pentagon is recommending a new U.S. military command for Africa, which is seen as having greater strategic importance to America since the start of the fight against terrorism.

The Defense Department has sent the proposal to President Bush for his approval, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Thursday.

The U.S. military has a system under which each region of the world is overseen by a specific command. Africa is split among several commands, which have been increasing activities on the continent greatly in recent years.

Central Command, which controls the Horn of Africa, set up a task force there in attempt to catch any al-Qaida escaping from Afghanistan after the war started in late 2001. It has since has expanded to humanitarian and other missions.

The European Command has sent Special Forces to do training exercises in North Africa and worked on humanitarian projects, medical training and other missions such as harbor maintenance in oil-producing nations in the Gulf of Guinea.

The various types of operations are aimed at building partnerships and strengthening the ability of African governments and militaries — as well as winning hearts and minds.

The hope is that the efforts will make African nations less vulnerable to the recruiting efforts of terrorists and help drive out those already using Africa as a safe haven.

Officials say Africa also is strategically more important because of increased efforts by China to involve itself and gain influence on the continent.

Egypt Arrests Opposition Leaders After A Protest (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

CAIRO, Dec. 14 — Egypt on Thursday arrested several leading members of the Muslim Brotherhood, the banned but powerful opposition group, and more than 140 student members after a campus protest. The government said the group had formed what amounted to militant squads that planned "acts of unrest."

The arrests followed a demonstration at Al Azhar University in which dozens of students, some in militant-type clothing with black face masks, paraded through the university campus while performing what looked liked martial exercises.

In a statement, Interior Ministry officials charged that the brotherhood had created what it called "deterrence committees," which were "trained in the arts of combat and provided with knives, sticks and chains, and appointed to start holding strikes and demonstrations and acts of unrest in the university."

DOJ_NMG_0106780

The Muslim Brotherhood, the largest and most organized opposition force in Egypt, has a violent history and was banned after trying to assassinate Gamal Abdel Nasser when he was the prime minister. But the brotherhood disavowed violence in the 1970s and has instead tried to spread its influence through politics and by creating an extensive network of social services.

It has been tolerated, even while many of its leaders and members are often jailed, as part of a cold peace between the brotherhood and the government.

Candidates allied with the brotherhood did well in the parliamentary elections last year, weakening the governing party's power monopoly.

But the sight of brotherhood members parading in costumes that resembled the militant attire of the Palestinian group Hamas apparently crossed a red line. The students immediately apologized, and brotherhood leaders said it was a mistake, but the arrests were ordered anyway, and included the detention of one of the group's top officials.

"What happened was peculiar and wrong, and the students apologized, and the apology should have been accepted," said Essam el-Erian, a leading member of the group.

The Azhar students were protesting because they had been barred from offering their own slate in student government elections.

UK Drops BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe (FT)

By Christopher Adams And James Boxell

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

Britain was accused on Thursday night of caving in to intense pressure from Saudi Arabia after Tony Blair's government intervened to end a Serious Fraud Office inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE Systems.

The SFO's decision to abandon its investigation into the Al Yamamah oil-for-arms contracts came under fierce attack from opposition peers and leading international lawyers.

The decision was announced by Lord Goldsmith, the attorney-general, on a day when the UK government appeared determined to rush out all its controversial news under the cover of the publication of a long-awaited police investigation into the death of Diana, Princess of Wales.

Mr Blair also chose Thursday as the best day to make himself available to police seeking to question him over allegations that honours were sold in return for political donations. The event made him the first sitting prime minister to be questioned in a criminal inquiry.

The abandonment of the BAE inquiry is expected to save a multibillion-pound jet fighter contract with Riyadh and safeguard thousands of jobs. BAE in recent weeks had run a media and lobbying campaign warning that Saudi Arabia would scrap the deal and purchase French Rafale jets instead unless the inquiry was dropped.

For more than two years, the SFO had been investigating allegations of slush funds and other unethical practices surrounding the 20-year-old Al Yamamah oil-for-arms agreement with Riyadh, the UK's biggest export deal.

The proposed deal to purchase 72 Eurofighters would supercede the Al Yamamah contracts and could eventually be worth as much as £40bn (€60bn) to BAE. A similar sum has been made from Al Yamamah, in which BAE supplied Tornado fighter jets, among other military equipment.

But the SFO's decision to seek bank account information from Switzerland in relation to its Al Yamamah probe sparked anger in Riyadh, leading to a suspension of commercial talks over a purchase of the Eurofighters.

BAE, which has always denied any wrongdoing, welcomed the attorney-general's statement. Officials were unaware of whether the Eurofighter talks had recommenced, though the decision to abandon the probe is certain to remove any obstacles to the deal, Britain's biggest export agreement. The Ministry of Defence refused to comment.

The decision to halt the investigation followed a warning by the prime minister that the SFO's inquiry risked causing "serious damage" to British security, intelligence and diplomatic co-operation with the Saudis.

Mr Blair, backed by Margaret Beckett, the foreign secretary, and Des Browne, defence secretary, argued that continuing the inquiry could leave Britain exposed in the war against terrorism by threatening the flow of Middle East intelligence. His intervention followed months of public and behind-the-scenes pressure by Saudi Arabia and BAE to end the inquiry.

DOJ_NMG_0106781

Lord Goldsmith said the SFO had taken the decision on public interest grounds and in part because of "the need to safeguard national and international security". Uncertainty over how long the inquiry would take, and whether a prosecution could be brought, was also a factor.

He said: "It has been necessary to balance the need to maintain the rule of law against the wider public interest. No weight has been given to commercial interests or to the national economic interest."

Insiders said Mr Blair's influence had been crucial.

"Everybody wanted it [the inquiry] to go away," said one source. However, suggestions that Mr Blair spoke with the Saudi ruler King Abdullah about the issue were denied by Downing Street.

White House Hosts Malaria Summit (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, December 15, 2006

US President George W. Bush designated eight African countries as new beneficiaries of US aid to battle malaria, which kills one million people annually around the world.

Bush added Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali and Zambia to his five-year, 1.2-billion-dollar President's Malaria Initiative (PMI) for Africa, bringing to 15 the number of countries covered.

"For malaria, we know exactly what it takes to prevent and treat the disease. The only question is whether we have the will to act," said the US president, who unveiled the program last year.

Bush, speaking to US and African activists, civic leaders and government officials at a White House summit on the killer mosquito-borne disease, also proposed doubling US development aid to Africa by the end of the decade.

"This administration has doubled development aid to Africa during my presidency -- and I propose to double it again by the end of this decade," he said.

Also at the summit, First Lady Laura Bush unveiled a 30-million-dollar plan to help African communities battle malaria by funding non-governmental organizations and civic and religious groups battling the disease.

"It will encourage more charitable organizations to join the fight" and will complement work by African governments by "creating independent, sustainable malaria-control programs" in villages across the continent, she said.

Malaria kills more than a million people a year, 90 percent of them in Africa, according to the World Health Organization (WHO). It is the leading cause of death for children under five in Africa.

The summit also aimed to raise awareness in the United States about the disease and galvanize public-private cooperation to fight its spread.

"One American with just 10 dollars can help save a life in Africa. A school, a church or a team can help save a village. Together, Americans can help protect an entire continent," the White House said in a statement.

The participants included African and UN officials, non-governmental organizations and stars, including South African singer Yvonne Chaka Chaka, a UNICEF goodwill ambassador for malaria.

PMI aid in Angola, Tanzania and Uganda has already reached six million people, said retired admiral Timothy Ziemer, who leads the initiative. The assistance includes spraying against mosquitoes, drug treatment and handing out bed nets to protect humans from the insects.

Four other countries -- Malawi, Mozambique, Rwanda and Senegal -- have been picked to receive the assistance.

John Bridgeland, who heads the non-profit campaign Malaria No More, said his group would use the summit to rally private support for the cause.

"It's literally our base camp, where this is a first step in ... a three-month undertaking to help galvanize and organize the private sector," said Bridgeland, a former Bush aide.

Other summit participants included US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, WHO chief Margaret Chan and Melinda Gates, the co-chair of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation.

The Gates Foundation of Microsoft founder Bill Gates and his wife, Melinda, pledged 83.5 million dollars Monday in new grants to boost access to bed nets and treatment, as well as speed research on vaccines.

DOJ_NMG_0106782

Bush Celebrates Early Victories In Campaign Against Malaria (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Malaria, a deadly tropical disease long overshadowed by AIDS, shared the stage with the president and the first lady on Thursday when the Bushes were the hosts of a forum at the National Geographic Society to raise the profile of this neglected scourge.

The gathering highlighted the growing efforts of influential evangelical, business and charitable leaders to raise money and mobilize volunteers against malaria, which kills 800,000 African children each year. Their rallying cry: Donate $10 for a mosquito net, save a life.

It also gave President Bush, whose reputation for compassionate conservatism has taken a beating during the grueling war in Iraq, a moment to bask in some of the early victories in the five-year, $1.2 billion campaign against the disease that his administration undertook a year and a half ago.

For example, on one of the spice islands of Zanzibar, where the United States helped distribute mosquito nets to cover every slumbering pregnant woman and child younger than 5 years old, the number of malaria cases has plummeted almost 90 percent since last year.

"So we're acting and we're leading," Mr. Bush said. "And with partners across the world we are helping the people of Africa turn the tide against malaria."

Melinda Gates, who with her husband, Bill, has invested heavily in research for a malaria vaccine, told the Who's Who of global malaria warriors packed into the auditorium that a decade ago, their number would have fit in a broom closet.

The top leaders of all the main malaria-fighting organizations — from the World Health Organization to the World Bank, from the United States Agency for International Development to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to Unicef — were at the forum, which the Bush administration titled the White House Summit on Malaria. They met for hours after the public session to plot strategy.

A Gallup poll that was done free for Malaria No More in recent days found that while 96 percent of Americans counted AIDS as a very serious problem in Africa, only two-thirds knew that malaria was also a grave threat.

Malaria No More, a nonprofit group of business and charitable groups that organized in response to a challenge from Mr. Bush, talked up its Web site, www.malarianomore.org, as a place where people can donate $10 to provide a family with a mosquito net to prevent malaria, and the education to use it properly.

The big money, however, has come from big donors. The Global Fund has so far committed $2.6 billion to malaria. The Gates Foundation has promised to spend $766 million. The World Bank has approved $357 million in loans.

The president's Malaria Initiative is supposed to gradually ramp up spending. But money for this year's programs in Uganda, Tanzania, Angola, Mozambique, Rwanda, Senegal and Malawi — $135 million — is still uncertain. Whether it survives depends on collaboration between the administration and Democratic leaders in Congress.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, a Vermont Democrat expected to lead the Senate appropriations subcommittee that oversees foreign aid, was at the forum and said he wanted to find a way to finance the administration's malaria program. "We're trying to get the kind of money we spend in a day in Iraq," he said. "Somewhere we've got to have our priorities right. It's a moral issue."

Bush Says Ending Malaria 'Possible' (WT)

By Tom Carter

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Malaria, a disease that kills two African children every minute, can be eliminated if governments, private business and religious organizations have the will to make it happen, President Bush said yesterday.

"It is possible to eliminate malaria," Mr. Bush said at the White House Summit on Malaria. "We know exactly what it will take to prevent and treat the disease ... It is not going to require a miracle. It requires smart, sustained effort."

Some of the world's leading global health specialists gathered at the National Geographic Society to announce a new initiative called Malaria No More.

DOJ_NMG_0106783

The program will focus on the mosquito-borne disease in a massive publicity campaign to encourage every American to "save a life" by contributing $10 for a bed net treated with insecticide to prevent mosquitoes from biting at night.

In June 2005, Mr. Bush created a five-year $1.2 billion program to fight malaria in Africa, called the President's Malaria Initiative. On the island of Zanzibar in Tanzania, where PMI is getting bed nets to people, spraying insecticides in houses and getting medicine to those who are infected, malaria has dropped by 90 percent since last year.

"Your taxpayer money is working to save lives," said Mr. Bush, announcing the PMI campaign will expand to eight more African countries next year.

The program already is operating in Uganda, Tanzania, Angola, Malawi, Mozambique, Rwanda and Senegal. The countries to be added are Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali and Zambia.

Related private initiatives were announced yesterday by Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank; Richard Feachem, executive director of the Global Fund to Fight Aids, Tuberculosis and Malaria; Melinda Gates, co-chair of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation; Dr. Steven Phillips, medical director of Exxon Mobil Corp.; Ann Veneman, head of UNICEF; Rick Warren, pastor of the Saddleback Church; and the U.S. heads of the United Way, Boys and Girls Club and the Red Cross.

Laura Bush, who has made preventing and treating malaria a focus of her efforts as first lady, organized and convened the conference.

"Any individual who can raise $10, can buy a net and save a life," Mrs. Bush said.

It was not clear why the Malaria No More nets would cost $10; Mr. Feachem of the Global Fund said in his presentation that nets cost between $5 and $6. It was suggested that the extra money may be used for education.

Roger Bate, head of Africa Fighting Malaria, which has been working on malaria for a decade, said he was gratified that powerful people with money are finally paying attention, but that getting bed nets into African homes is only a first step.

"Research done last summer by [the U.S. Agency for International Development] in Togo and Zambia found that the bed nets had been distributed to 90 percent of the homes but only hung up in 70 percent," he said.

"And only 56 percent were being used on the night they were surveyed. They have to be used, even on hot nights. If that [extra $4] is used for education on this, that would be good."

U.S., China Clash On Currency (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 14 -- U.S. and Chinese leaders clashed publicly on the opening day of strategic economic talks, with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. pushing China to revalue its currency and Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi saying Americans do not have a full understanding of the situation.

After standing by as U.S. officials criticized her country's economic policies in the media during the past week, Wu set the tone for the meeting with assertive introductory remarks that spanned 20 typed pages and 5,000 years of Chinese history.

"Some American friends are not only having limited knowledge of, but harboring much misunderstanding about, the reality in China," Wu said, according to a copy of her remarks provided by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. For example, Wu noted that China needed to create enough jobs to absorb an estimated 300 million rural workers -- equal to the entire population of the United States -- into its urban economy in the next two decades.

Paulson was equally aggressive in his follow-up speech, saying that the U.S. government's "strong view" is that China should allow its currency, the yuan, to be more flexible. Most countries allow the value of their currencies to be set in global markets, but China intervenes to keep its currency pegged to the dollar at an exchange rate that many Western economists regard as skewed in China's favor.

The Chinese economy "would be more effective under a regime where currency values are determined in a competitive, open marketplace based upon economic fundamentals," Paulson said. A revaluation of the yuan upward would make U.S. goods cheaper in China and Chinese goods more expensive in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0106784

Throughout the day, U.S. officials pushed on issues such as trying to resolve the huge trade imbalance between the two countries and making sure that China lives up to commitments it made five years ago when it joined the World Trade Organization. By the afternoon, they said they were optimistic.

"They were very much in a receiving mode," Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao said in an interview with reporters. "They were listening very carefully."

Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said that the meeting "exceeded expectations" and that "it was a very candid . . . honest, solid dialogue."

High-level U.S. officials, interviewed after the close of meetings for the day, said the two sides agreed on many things in principle, such as the need to keep their economies open to other countries. But specific measures and a timetable were less clear, with the United States pushing for rapid change and China seeking to move cautiously.

Skepticism toward foreign trade, particularly with China, played a major role in the recent U.S. elections, and proposals for punitive tariffs or other protectionist measures could gain support in Congress next year.

"I sense that they have an understanding of the stakes," Gutierrez said. "And the stakes are very large. You are talking about a lot of business, a lot of jobs on both sides. We are their No. 1 customer."

While most of the day was focused on U.S. requests of Beijing, China also listed some priorities: fewer obstacles to the export of U.S. technology and to Chinese investment in the United States. The complaint about U.S. export controls, in particular, led to some tense exchanges, U.S. delegates said,

"They would like no restrictions, and we have restrictions, so there are certain things that they would like that we can't give on," Guttierez said.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said in an interview that she told the Chinese that their country was "slowing if not backsliding" on economic reforms.

Paulson is a former Wall Street executive who has made dozens of trips to China. He has taken command of the Bush administration's economic discussions with that country and took a high-level delegation of Cabinet members and others with him on this trip as he seeks to make progress toward resolving thorny disputes.

The format of the meeting included formal presentations and broad debate on issues such as China's transport problems and the U.S. culture of easy credit.

Perhaps the meeting's most anticipated and sensitive talks -- about whether China should allow the yuan to rise in value -- were anchored by a statement from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who accompanied Paulson on the trip.

Bernanke said an increase in the currency's value would benefit China, according to U.S. officials present at the talk.

"Other people piped in to say the U.S. has a very interested stake in China's economic well-being," Chao said.

China Entreats U.S. To Broaden Its Understanding (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

BEIJING -- From the first moment of this week's top-level economic talks here between the U.S. and China, the hosts made clear what they believe to be the root of bilateral tensions: Americans simply don't understand China.

In the Great Hall of the People, under a painting of Chairman Mao Zedong and other revolutionary heroes, Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi gave Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and his delegation a history lesson about her country's struggles with poverty and foreign interference. American misconceptions about the Asian country aren't "conducive" to good relations, she said as she opened two days of talks yesterday, according to the written text of the speech.

"Throughout all these years' interactions with all quarters of the U.S., the government and the public, we have had the genuine feeling that some American friends are not only having limited knowledge -- but [also] harboring much misunderstanding -- about the reality in China," said Ms. Wu, who is considered an advocate of economic change.

Ms. Wu reiterated longstanding Chinese complaints that foreign critics fail to grasp the extent of her country's huge economic and social challenges, from profound poverty to the waves of rural residents pouring into cities. She and other Chinese officials also have said foreigners misread Beijing's efforts to address those problems through economic development as a threat to its trading partners. Chinese officials argue they have done more to address foreign complaints than critics acknowledge, but that ultimately China must move at its own pace to avoid triggering social unrest.

DOJ_NMG_0106785

The American delegation came to Beijing hoping to create a mood of mutual trust that would spur progress on a host of contentious issues, from piracy of U.S. computer software to market access for U.S. financial-service companies to China's alleged practice of keeping its currency weak against the dollar. The Americans here sense that U.S. lawmakers, worried by the huge U.S. trade deficit and the loss of manufacturing jobs, are ready to blame China and are flirting with protectionist legislation.

"It is in everyone's interest that China's growth continues and in doing so that it strengthens the world economy," Mr. Paulson told the Chinese in the closed-door session, according to a copy of the speech. "This dialogue can help us work together to do just that while reducing tensions along the way."

Mr. Paulson has described this round of talks as the beginning of two years of strategic dialogue aimed at creating a climate in which thorny trade, financial, energy and other issues can eventually be resolved. He has gone to great lengths to reduce expectations that this week's meetings would produce instant changes in Chinese policies.

Nonetheless, the participants couldn't avoid the issues of the day. Tensions over the currency issue are particularly sharp, with American manufacturers charging that the weak yuan gives Chinese companies an unfair edge over their American competitors.

Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke told the Chinese that their economy would benefit if they were to allow the yuan to rise against the dollar, according to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, who participated in the talks. And Mr. Paulson said that eventually China should allow the yuan to move unfettered against other currencies. "We believe that China should move toward such a system over the next several years," Mr. Paulson said. "And of course you understand our strong view that in the meantime, more currency flexibility is necessary."

Ms. Wu repeated earlier statements that China seeks a "rough balance" between imports and exports, rather than its current large trade surplus, and that Beijing intends to move toward a system that would let markets set the yuan's value. The yuan has gained almost 5.9% against the dollar since the Chinese initially allowed it to move against the dollar in July 2005.

The size of the gathering had a slightly stifling effect on what Mr. Paulson hoped would be a free-flowing conversation about the long-term economic issues that both countries face. In the cavernous Golden Hall, 14 senior Chinese officials, backed by 72 aides, faced off with 13 senior U.S. representatives, including seven of cabinet rank, with 48 aides of their own. Participants who wanted to speak had to place their name cards on end as a signal; their names were then entered into a queue posted on a giant video screen. A senior U.S. official nevertheless described discussions as "honest and frank."

Ms. Wu opened the event with a presentation that included a map of China's ancient trade routes, accompanying a speech that ran from the Silk Road and the Opium War to farm policy and taxation. She characterized the main purpose of the talks as educating U.S. officials.

"Our particular hope is to let people in the world know that China's development is an opportunity instead of a threat," she said, emphasizing that China is committed to trade and economic liberalization.

That language was intended to reassure her audience. U.S. officials have publicly worried that China may slow down the pace of overhaul now that it has largely completed the market-opening commitments it made upon joining the World Trade Organization in 2001.

according to one person present, and several U.S. officials urged the Chinese to accelerate overhauls. "We've got to move as quickly as possible, and whatever we're doing today, we've got to do it quicker," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez told reporters.

Ms. Wu emphasized the challenge of promoting equitable growth in a country where 150 million people -- more than 10% of the population -- live on less than a dollar a day and where 300 million people are expected to migrate from the fields to the cities over the next 20 years.

U.S. officials took the Chinese lecture in stride. "The reason we are having this dialogue is to improve the understanding between our two countries," one senior U.S. official said.

New U.N. Leader Is Sworn In And Promises To Rebuild Trust (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0106786

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 14 — Ban Ki-moon of South Korea was sworn in Thursday as the next secretary general of the United Nations, and he pledged to rebuild faith in an organization that has been tarnished by scandal and riven by disputes between rich and poor nations.

"You could say that I am a man on a mission, and my mission could be dubbed 'Operation Restore Trust:' trust in the organization, and trust between member states and the Secretariat," he said.

He added, "I hope this mission is not 'Mission: Impossible.' "

Mr. Ban, 62, takes office on Jan. 1, succeeding Kofi Annan, 68, who is at the end of his second five-year term.

Addressing the packed General Assembly hall after taking the oath, Mr. Ban heaped praise on Mr. Annan, who received two standing ovations, as a man of "high ideals, noble aspirations and bold initiatives."

But in a subsequent news conference, he distanced himself from Mr. Annan's plea Monday that the United States return to a more multilateral foreign policy grounded in respect for international law.

"That, I think, was his own personal assessment and insight, which he gained during his tenure," he said.

Mr. Ban, who had strong United States backing, acknowledged that the relationship between the United Nations and the United States had become strained.

"But even in such a case," he said, "it is very important to discuss, to resolve the difference of opinions, and I, as secretary general, will try to harmonize so that we can expect constructive contribution and participation of the United States."

Mr. Ban was emphatic in answering questions about the campaign in Iran to cast doubt on the Holocaust and about statements by Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, that Israel should be wiped off the map.

He said denying the Holocaust was "not acceptable," as was urging the elimination of a nation or people."

He also pledged to become "directly and personally engaged" in trying to persuade Sudan to accept United Nations peacekeepers for Darfur.

Calling the Middle East "the most serious issue" today he urged Israeli and Palestinian leaders to deal directly with each other.

He stumbled only once, appearing uncomprehending when a Canadian reporter asked a question in French. Traditionally, French speakers have held the job, and Mr. Ban had underscored the point by giving part of his address in French.

"I was not able to follow everything you said," he told the questioner, and asked for a translation.

The question was, "I would like to know why, in your view, it is important that French should remain the second official working language of the United Nations."

Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, December 15, 2006

South Korea's Ban Ki-moon was sworn in Thursday as the eighth secretary-general of the United Nations, promising to make his top priority the restoration of trust in the world body that has been tarnished by corruption scandals.

Ban, 62, will take the reins of the United Nations on Jan. 1 when Kofi Annan steps down after 10 years at the helm. He will be the first Asian to lead the organization in 35 years

Ban will oversee an organization with some 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $5 billion annual budget. Its reputation has been battered by scandals in the oil-for-food program in Iraq and in peacekeeping procurement, and its outdated practices need reform to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

General Assembly President Sheikha Haya Rashed Al Khalifa administered the oath of office to the career diplomat who served as South Korea's foreign minister. Ban swore to conduct himself solely in the interests of the United Nations and to refuse to accept instructions from any government or other authority.

DOJ_NMG_0106787

In a brief address, Ban told delegates from the 192 U.N. member states that he was "deeply mindful" of key words in the oath — "loyalty, discretion and conscience" — which he said "will be my watchwords as I carry out my duties as secretary-general."

He pledged "to set the highest ethical standard" and "work to enhance morale, professionalism and accountability among staff members, which in turn will help us serve member states better, and restore trust in the organization."

"The good name of the United Nations is one of its most valuable assets — but also one of its most vulnerable," Ban said.

He promised to strengthen the three pillars of the United Nations — security development and human rights — in order to build "a more peaceful, more prosperous and more just world for succeeding generations."

"As we pursue our collective endeavor to reach that goal, my first priority will be to restore trust," Ban said. "I will seek to act as a harmonizer and bridge-builder."

He said one of his "core tasks will be to breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary Secretariat."

"The member states need a Secretariat that is dynamic and courageous, and not a Secretariat that is passive and timid," he said.

Ban also paid warm tribute to Annan, saying "it is an honor to follow in your revered footsteps."

"Your tenure has been marked by high ideals, noble aspirations, and bold initiatives," he said. "Your courage and vision have inspired the world. ... You have given the United Nations new relevance to the people's lives."

Before the ceremony, diplomats also paid tribute to Annan and approved a resolution lauding his "many bold initiatives" to reduce poverty, promote peace and security, protect the environment and launch the reform process. They rose and gave him a sustained standing ovation.

In his farewell speech, Annan said that "despite many difficulties and some setbacks, in the past decade we have achieved much that I am proud of."

At a time of sweeping change, he said, the U.N. reoriented and remolded itself, "became more transparent, accountable and responsive ... (and) began to better address the needs of individuals worldwide."

The United Nations and its member also accepted that development, security and human rights "must go hand in hand," he said.

"I depart convinced that today's U.N. does more than ever before, and does it better than ever before. Yet our work is far from complete — indeed, it never will be," Annan said.

He told the General Assembly, which appointed Ban in October, that "you have chosen well."

"Our organization will be in safe hands," Annan said.

Then, looking at Ban, he said the new secretary-general already had a distinguished career in international diplomacy.

"But I can safely tell you that your most rewarding years lie just ahead," Annan said. "I wish you both the strength and the courage to make the most of them."

Ban Ki-moon Sworn In As Next UN Chief (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, December 15, 2006

South Korea's Ban Ki-moon was sworn in as the next UN secretary general at a General Assembly ceremony during which he vowed to be "a harmonizer and bridge-builder" and build on the legacy of the incumbent, Kofi Annan.

"I, Ban Ki-moon, solemnly swear to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted to me as secretary general of the United Nations," said Ban as he took the oath, his left hand resting on the UN charter.

The 62-year-old South Korean is to officially take up his post on January 1, 2007.

"I add my voice to the many tributes that have been paid to you today," Ban told Annan, who is to step down on December 31 after completing two five-year terms.

Ban vowed to build on the legacy of the outgoing Ghanaian UN chief, adding that one of his priorities would be to "breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary (UN) Secretariat."

DOJ_NMG_0106788

"By strengthening the three pillars of our United Nations -- security, development and human rights -- we can build a more peaceful, more prosperous and more just world for succeeding," the South Korean former foreign minister said to loud applause from the packed assembly.

Mindful of the recent corruption and sexual abuse scandals that have tarnished the world body, Ban promised to "set the highest ethical standard" and to "lead by example".

"My first priority will be to restore trust," he added, in apparent reference to the polarization between rich and poor UN member states over UN reforms. "I will seek to act as a harmonizer and bridge-builder."

Addressing a news conference later in the day, the secretary general-designate described the tragedy in Sudan's Darfur region as "unacceptable" and pledged to be personally engaged in efforts to end the bloodshed there.

And he took Iran to task for hosting a conference casting doubt on the Holocaust.

"The denial of the Holocaust is not acceptable," he said. "Nor is it acceptable to call for the elimination of any state or people," he added in reference to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's remarks that Israel should be "wiped off" the map and "would soon disappear".

He also said the deteriorating Middle East situation would be one of his priorities, particularly the need to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

He also urged Iran to resume negotiations with European powers to settle the standoff with the Security Council over its nuclear program "in a peaceful way".

On a lighter note, Ban flunked a French language test when he was was unable to answer a reporter's question posed in French as to why French should remain the second working language of the world body, after English.

After he fumbled a "je n'ai pas pu (I was not able)", an aide came to his rescue and translated the question into English, to which Ban replied that the decision to give priority to French was made by UN member states for reasons of "convenience and practicality."

By tradition, the UN secretary general is required to have a working knowledge of French.

Ban has been working assiduously on his French since he launched his bid to succeed Annan early this year. France's UN Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere certified that Ban's French was adequate.

Meanwhile the US acting Ambassador to the UN, Alejandro Wolff, whose country played a key role in Ban's appointment, said the South Korean "commands our full respect."

"We have full confidence in his ability, his goodwill and his desire to serve and to achieve," the US delegate said. "We look forward to working with the new secretary general and other member states to achieve our shared goal of making the United Nations stronger and more effective and thus further honor Kofi Annan's vision."

Earlier Thursday, the 192-member General Assembly paid a warm tribute to Annan, hailing his "exceptional contribution to international peace and security".

The assembly gave Annan a standing ovation and adopted by acclamation a resolution "acknowledging with deep gratitude" his "indefatigable efforts and dedicated service" over the past 10 years.

Ban has been at UN headquarters in New York since November working on setting up a transition team ahead of his official assumption of duties.

His election by the General Assembly last October was a mere formality after the powerful 15-member Security Council recommended him.

Ban will become the UN's eighth secretary general and the first Asian UN chief since U Thant of Burma led the organization from 1961 to 1971. He will lead a staff of over 15,000, drawn from more than 170 nations.

Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — South Korea's former foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, took the oath of office Thursday morning to become the United Nations' eighth secretary-general.

DOJ_NMG_0106789

Ban, 62, pledged that after he officially takes up his post Jan. 1, he would try to restore trust in the institution tainted by scandal and management lapses and to bridge divisions between rich and poor nations.

"I look forward with a mixture of awe and enthusiasm to taking up my duties as secretary-general of the United Nations," he said after being sworn in.

Before Ban took his oath in the vaulted General Assembly hall, representatives from 192 countries gave a thundering ovation to outgoing Secretary-General Kofi Annan, 68, who will step down after 10 years in office.

Although Annan brought international spotlight to the issues of human rights and development, saying they deserve as much attention as matters of war and peace, his tenure also was blemished by findings of corruption and mismanagement in the $64-billion Iraq oil-for-food scandal.

Annan's grand vision of reforming the institution was scuttled by developing countries, which viewed the changes as a power grab by U.N. bureaucrats and by the United States, which proposed a more stringent plan.

While praising Annan's "high ideals, noble aspirations and bold initiatives," Ban hinted at a shift from his predecessor's approach.

"The time has come for a new day in relations between the secretariat and member states," he said. "The dark night of distrust and disrespect has lasted far too long."

He also said he would strive to "lead by example" to set high ethical standards at the world body, a statement also seen by diplomats as a subtle swipe at Annan and the scandals that have been exposed at U.N. agencies under his watch.

Ban, whose career as a South Korean diplomat kept him largely out of the spotlight, has said that his modest and unassuming demeanor should not be mistaken for weakness or indecision.

He told the press that he would not evade questions, as he was reputed to do as foreign minister.

"Your colleagues in Korea may have dubbed me the 'slippery eel' because I was too charming for them to be able to catch me," he said. "But I promise today that I can be a pretty straight shooter when I need to."

Addressing concerns that he would be more of an administrator than a leader, Ban said that he was willing to personally engage to find solutions to the standoffs involving Darfur, Iran and North Korea.

"The suffering of the people of Darfur is simply unacceptable," he told reporters. He said he would push leaders in Sudan to allow U.N. peacekeepers to protect the people of Darfur if the government could not halt the violence.

He also said he would meet with Iranian leaders "wherever and when" to discuss their denial of the Holocaust, an attitude he called "not acceptable." He told a news conference that among the many crises in the world, the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians was at the core of tensions in the Middle East and "the most serious issue with which we must deal." He said he planned to revitalize the "road map" peace initiative and to speak soon with leaders in the region.

But Ban left most of his concrete plans and policies vague, saying he would like to resolve issues in the Middle East, Lebanon, Iran and Iraq in each case "in a peaceful way through dialogue."

The new secretary-general also made it clear that despite all his calls for dialogue, he won't be doing it in French.

French is the second official working language of the United Nations, and Ban's resume says that he speaks it — an unstated requirement for his new post. French President Jacques Chirac interviewed Ban to make sure he could pass muster as a Francophone.

But when a Canadian reporter asked Ban in French why it should be one of the U.N.'s working languages, he didn't understand.

"If you speak 'lentement en francais' [slowly in French] I will do my best," he said.

In the end, he relied on an interpreter and answered the question in English, earning him a new nickname from the press corps: "Franco-phony."

Incoming U.N. Chief Ban Pledges To Restore Trust (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106790

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 14 -- South Korean diplomat Ban Ki Moon was sworn in Thursday as the United Nations' eighth secretary general in a ritualistic General Assembly ceremony as the United States and other countries praised Kofi Annan's 10-year stewardship of the world's premier political institution.

Ban, 62, said his priority when he takes office Jan. 1 is to restore public confidence and civility to a body that has been buffeted by corruption and sexual misconduct scandals, and has been riven by feuding over its future between its weakest and most powerful countries.

"You could say that I'm a man on a mission, and my mission could be dubbed Operation Restore Trust: trust in the organization and trust between member states and the secretariat," Ban said at a news conference after the ceremony. "I hope this mission is not mission impossible."

Ban's remarks constituted an implicit rebuke of Annan, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate whose legacy was tarnished by his mismanagement of the agency's $64 billion oil-for-food program in Iraq. But Annan, who sat expressionless through much of the ceremony, received a rousing standing ovation and eulogistic tributes from representatives of Asian, African, European and Latin American countries.

Even the United States, whose outgoing ambassador, John R. Bolton, rarely had anything nice to say about Annan, bid an effusive farewell to the Ghanaian civil servant.

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting U.S. ambassador, said Annan had been "a champion of human rights" and a defender of the poor and disadvantaged who "worked tirelessly" to serve "the millions of people who look to the U.N. to help them improve their lives."

"We salute today Secretary General Kofi Annan for his decade of dedicated service as the U.N.'s chief diplomat and administrator," he said, crediting Annan with backing some of Washington's most important foreign policy goals. He "has pushed the U.N. to do its part in the global struggle against extremism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and terrorist threats."

But the focus of attention quickly shifted to Ban. He outlined his administrative and political priorities, saying he would move to resolve crises in North Korea; Darfur, Sudan; and the Middle East, including the "very hot and deteriorating situations in Lebanon and in Iraq, too."

He said he would select top officials primarily on the basis of merit, but would be mindful of the need to ensure geographical and gender balance in hiring. He said he will seek to identify a woman to serve as his deputy.

"One of my core tasks will be to breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary [U.N.] secretariat," he said. "As secretary general, I will aim to reward the talent and skill of staff."

Ban said he will serve as a "bridge" between the rich and poor members, who have clashed over a range of issues, including revision of the U.N. bureaucracy and the promotion of human rights.

Ban sought to counter speculation that he is too discreet and cautious to confront the world's tyrants or stand up to the big powers. But he conceded that he can be evasive at times, recalling that the Korean news media had affectionately dubbed him the "Slippery Eel" because of how he can avoid answering sensitive questions.

"But that nickname was given because I was very friendly with the media. You should understand that. But I promise today that I can be a pretty straight shooter when I need to."

Ban sounded off on Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's calls for the destruction of Israel and his hosting of a Holocaust conference that included many speakers who questioned the Nazis' mass murder of more than 6 million Jews.

"Denying historical facts, especially on such an important subject as the Holocaust, is just not acceptable. Nor is it acceptable to call for the elimination of any state or people," Ban said. "I'd like to see this fundamental principle respected both in rhetoric and practice by all the members of the international community."

He urged the international community to support Iraq's political transition, citing the "inability" of Iraqi authorities and the U.S.-led multinational force to "secure peace and security."

Ban stumbled as he tried to cross a critical rite of passage at the United Nations: speaking publicly in French, one of the institution's two official languages. Asked in French why that language merited its designation when more people speak Arabic or Chinese, Ban paused before asking the reporter to repeat the question slowly, saying in French that "it is very difficult for me, off the cuff, to reply in French." After hearing the question a second time, he called for an interpreter.

DOJ_NMG_0106791

S. Korea's Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- Ban Ki-moonwas sworn in yesterday morning as the eighth secretary-general of the United Nations, promising to restore confidence in an organization that has been tainted by corruption and ethics violations.

The former foreign minister of South Korea took the oath of the office with his hand on a bound copy of the U.N. Charter, promising "not to seek or accept instructions ... from any government or other authority external to the organization."

He also pledged "to breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary Secretariat."

Mr. Ban, 62, will become secretary-general on Jan. 1, 2007, succeeding Kofi Annan.

He inherits an organization that has been demoralized by the oil-for-food scandal, a perceived double standard in disciplining errant senior officials and persistent criticism from U.S. conservatives.

In addition, the organization has been nearly impotent in resolving the killing in Darfur and reducing tensions in the Middle East.

Mr. Ban will have to make swift and demonstrable progress on U.N. management reforms, human rights issues and security enhancement to win over skeptical observers -- many of them within the organization or powerful governments.

The next secretary-general said he is reviewing all senior U.N. positions, and plans to make staff appointments starting in January. For the key roll of deputy secretary-general, he said, he is leaning toward female candidates.

Pressed by reporters on how he perceived the organization's role in the Middle East, Mr. Ban sounded strong support for Israel and frustration on Iraq.

He was asked by an Iranian reporter whether Israel's perceived acknowledgement of holding nuclear weapons doesn't destabilize the Middle East.

"The Middle East question is of course the most serious issue with which we must deal," he said.

Mr. Ban pledged to become personally involved in tense challenges such as Darfur, the Middle East and North Korea.

The General Assembly also yesterday paid tribute to Mr. Annan, 68, with two sustained standing ovations and a half-dozen speeches. He leaves the organization after more than four decades as an international civil servant.

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff praised Mr. Annan in a brief ceremony for using his voice and office to promote human rights and development, counterterrorism, conflict prevention and recovery.

"Since early in his first term, Kofi Annan has worked tirelessly to make the U.N. a more efficient and effective organization," Mr. Wolff said. "He has understood the need for the U.N. to evolve and reform to meet the challenges of today's world, and to use its resources wisely to better serve its member states and the millions of people who look to the U.N. to help them improve their lives."

Like a half-dozen speakers before him, Mr. Ban paid tribute to Mr. Annan, who will leave the organization on Dec. 31.

"It is an honor to follow in your revered footsteps," he said. "Your tenure has been marked by high ideals, noble aspirations and bold initiatives."

Castro Near Death, U.S. Intelligence Chief Says (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Cuban President Fidel Castro is very ill and close to death, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said yesterday.

"Everything we see indicates it will not be much longer . . . months, not years," Negroponte told a meeting of Washington Post editors and reporters.

Castro relinquished power for the first time in 47 years after surgery July 31 for an undisclosed intestinal disorder. His brother, Raul, has assumed Castro's duties, but Cuban authorities have repeatedly insisted that he is recovering and eventually will return to office. He was last seen in an Oct. 28 video, shown on Cuban national television, in which he appeared gaunt and weak and warned that his convalescence would be lengthy.

DOJ_NMG_0106792

The Cuban leader did not show up as anticipated at a Dec. 2 national celebration in Havana scheduled to commemorate his 80th birthday and the 50th anniversary of the Cuban revolution. In a brief speech at the event, Raul Castro imparted no message from his brother but said that Cuba is willing to open negotiations with the United States "to settle the long U.S.-Cuba disagreement."

In rejecting the offer this week, Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Shannon told reporters that the Bush administration will deal with Cuba's Communist government only when it shows a commitment to democracy. During the period of uncertainty under Raul Castro, Shannon said, "the regime has actually become harder and more orthodox and is not in a position to signal in any meaningful way what direction it will take post-Fidel."

Congressional advocates of easing long-standing U.S. sanctions against Cuba are scheduled to fly to the island today for a three-day visit exploring potential policy changes under Raul Castro. The bipartisan group of 10 is the largest congressional delegation to visit Cuba.

After Years Of Setbacks, Embargo Opponents See Glimmer Of Hope (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Democrats' capture of Congress and Cuban leader Fidel Castro's illness have dramatically altered the battle lines over Cuba policy and given new hope to opponents of U.S. sanctions.

"There's a re-energizing of the base of people who want to work to change this policy," said Mavis Anderson of Butterfield, Minn., the head of the Cuba program for the Latin America Working Group, a left-leaning advocacy organization based in Washington. "Outside of Congress, certainly people are excited that there may be some new openings. Inside the Congress, I think that will come."

In recent years, President Bush has cut back everything from U.S. travel to bank transfers and gift packages to the island, meeting little resistance in a Republican-controlled Congress.

But now the ailing Castro is largely viewed as unlikely to return to power. Democrats, traditionally less inclined to back the sanctions against Cuba, are set to control Congress for the first time since 1994. Bush is in his final two years in office, and his brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is leaving office in January.

On top of that perfect-storm scenario, a report last month by the watchdog Government Accountability Office questioned the efficiency of U.S. democracy programs to support dissidents on the island, giving more fuel to foes who argue that a change in policy is overdue.

"If you're a hard-liner on policy toward Cuba, things are not looking very good for you," said Tomas Bilbao, the executive director of the Cuba Study Group, a centrist nonpartisan organization in Miami and Washington that promotes new ideas on Cuba policy.

Congressional interest in Cuba is growing as the island continues to chart its course in the post-Fidel Castro era.

Six Democrats and four Republicans have signed up for a trip to Havana organized by the House International Relations Committee. The visit, which begins Friday, is an initiative of Arizona Republican Rep. Jeff Flake, a vocal supporter of more U.S. engagement with Cuba.

"People are talking about Cuba again," said Sarah Stephens, the director of the Freedom to Travel Campaign, an organization that seeks to overturn the travel ban against U.S. citizens. She said the group had confirmed meetings with Cuban National Assembly President Ricardo Alarcon and Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque, and that it might meet with Cuba's interim leader, Raul Castro.

Few observers expect Congress to end the trade embargo on Cuba anytime soon, a decision that ultimately belongs to the legislative branch after the 1996 Helms-Burton Act said Cuba must initiate a democratic path as a condition for lifting sanctions.

But opponents are expected to challenge key portions of the Cuba policy, including funding levels for the South Florida-based Radio and TV Marti and the travel ban for most U.S. citizens. Observers say the 2004 restrictions on travel by Cuban-American citizens to the island - who now can go only once every three years instead of annually - are especially vulnerable.

DOJ_NMG_0106793

Several Democrats who are skeptical of Bush's Cuba policies will chair committees that will give them a platform on Cuba matters, including New York Rep. Charles Rangel on the Ways and Means Committee, Michigan Rep. John Conyers on the House Judiciary Committee and Wisconsin Rep. David Obey on the House Appropriations Committee.

In the Senate, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden is expected to head the Foreign Relations Committee and Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, who once held up Treasury Department nominations to protest restrictions on U.S. trade with Cuba, probably will chair the Finance Committee.

But bills need to pass the floor of both chambers, where supporters of the embargo think that members will be reluctant to change policy when Havana may be on the eve of a historic shift because of Castro's illness.

"I am fully confident that, despite our reversals in Congress, U.S. sanctions will be kept on the Cuban dictatorship until a democratic transition is genuinely under way," said Florida Republican Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart, one of the staunchest defenders of Bush's policies on Cuba. "We have bipartisan solid support for Cuba's freedom in Congress, and George W. Bush is still president."

The Latin America Working Group counts 182 representatives from both parties as favoring a change in Cuba policy, well short of the 218 needed to pass bills.

The big uncertainty is the 50-plus-member freshman class, dominated by Democrats. But congressional votes on Cuba tend to muddy, as farm-state Republicans often vote for more trade with Cuba, while many Democrats join Republican colleagues in keeping the restrictions on Havana.

Cuba Vows To Defy U.S. Efforts At Change (AP)

By Vanessa Arrington

AP, December 15, 2006

Cuba vowed to defy U.S. efforts for economic and political change on the island in a front-page editorial Thursday in the Communist Party's newspaper that also referred to dissidents as "mercenaries" and "counterrevolutionary puppies."

Members of the U.S. government "should not fool themselves," the editorial said. "The Cuban government and people will take charge, as they've done until now, of guaranteeing the complete failure of these plans ... to encourage the subversion and internal counterrevolution in our country."

Washington maintains a decades-old trade and travel embargo against Cuba. The Bush administration has adopted even stricter policies aimed at squeezing the island's economy and pushing out the communist leadership.

The editorial comes at a time of uncertainty in Cuba, with the island's longtime leader Fidel Castro ailing and out of sight. The 80-year-old has not been seen since July, when he temporarily handed power over to his younger brother Raul so he could recover from intestinal surgery.

The elder Castro's failure to show up at his own delayed birthday celebration this month has fueled speculation that he is more sick than originally thought. Cuba has warned the U.S. government against trying to take advantage of the situation and Raul Castro has repeated his brother's warning that the island is prepared to defend itself against any U.S. aggression.

The U.S. has dedicated $80 million to what it describes as the promotion of democracy in Cuba over the next few years.

The party newspaper criticized the American diplomatic mission in Havana for distributing books, medicine, clothes and shortwave radios to Cubans, saying the U.S. Interests Section "acts like the central barracks of the counterrevolution."

The Cuban government frequently accuses dissidents of working with U.S. officials to undermine the island's system. That charge — denied by the dissidents and Washington — was used against 75 activists rounded up in the spring of 2003 and sentenced to prison terms ranging from six to 28 years.

"The poorly named dissident movement is no more than a group financed and directed by the U.S. government, true mercenaries ... at the service of the Cuban people's historic enemy: Yankee imperialism," the editorial said.

"No matter how much money they spend, they'll never be able to bend the will of the Cuban people," it added.

On Wednesday, a senior State Department official said the deterioration in Castro's health has been accompanied by the rise of hardline elements to key positions in Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0106794

"With Fidel Castro still alive, the regime has become more orthodox," said Thomas Shannon, who heads the State Department's Western Hemisphere affairs bureau. "It is hard to say what position it will take post-Fidel."

Poll: 1 In 4 Cubans OK With Freedoms (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, December 15, 2006

About one-quarter of Cubans interviewed in the island's two biggest cities are satisfied with their freedom to choose what they do with their lives, according to a poll released Thursday.

When asked about the job performance of Cuba's leaders, about 40 percent of those surveyed said they disapproved, the Gallup Poll found. Not quite half gave their approval. The poll surveyed 600 people in Havana and 400 in Santiago.

The survey comes as Cuba is at a crossroads. Leader Fidel Castro is ill and questions abound about whether he will recover and what will happen if he does not.

Castro's autocratic rule has fueled widespread criticism, though he has supporters, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Gallup conducted the Cuba survey only in two cities because of the difficulty in getting around the island and because of the absence of a reliable way to buy food and provisions, said Carlos Denton, president of CID Gallup Central America.

The results are not meant to be representative of Cuba's more than 11 million citizens — only a look at those nearly 3 million people living in Havana and Santiago, Gallup officials said.

According to the survey:

_When asked about the "ideal partner" for Cuba to increase commercial ties with, the United States was most commonly mentioned, followed by China and Venezuela. The U.S. government maintains a decades-old trade and travel embargo against Cuba.

_Nearly all of those interviewed said they thought Cuban health care was accessible to any person who needed it, regardless of their economic status.

_Nearly all said Cubans who wanted to study have access to education, regardless of their economic situation.

_Only about 40 percent said Cubans can get ahead by working hard.

_About two-thirds of the respondents who had jobs said they were satisfied with them.

Ten people from other Latin American countries conducted the interviews along with 10 Cubans, mostly college students Gallup had previously dealt with. The workers tried to stay away from the homes of people responsible for reporting on neighborhood activities to the government. Such homes, Gallup said, are on nearly every block.

The interviews were not monitored by the Cuban government, the polling group said, and no incentives to answer questions were given to respondents. Gallup said it did not request governmental permission to conduct the survey.

The poll workers entered their results daily in computers at the Internet cafes that have sprung up to cater to tourists. They burned their data each night to avoid having the results recovered by the government.

Jesus Rios, Gallup's director of research for Latin America, said that the questions were the same ones his company uses in similar polls all over the world and were not customized for Cuba.

The poll was conducted Sept. 1-15 with residents above the age of 15. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points for the total sample.

A Central Character In Russian Whodunit Says He Was A Victim (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

MOSCOW -- For 15 years, a former Kremlin security agent named Andrei Lugovoi deftly navigated the treacherous waters of post-Soviet Russia.

In the 1990s, he guarded top government officials, and three times traveled with them to the U.S., where he says he once stood next to President Clinton at the White House. Even a 14-month stint in jail in 2001 didn't throw him for long. Within months, he bounced back to become head of a private-security company whose clients included legislators, governors and even some Kremlin critics.

DOJ_NMG_0106795

Today, some of those clients wonder whether he was guarding them or spying for the Kremlin. Mr. Lugovoi, 41 years old, is now at the center of the investigation by Britain's Scotland Yard into the death of Kremlin critic Alexander Litvinenko, who was poisoned by radioactive polonium 210 in London last month.

Trusted by many of the dissident exile Russian community in London, Mr. Lugovoi in October introduced the victim, a longtime acquaintance, to Moscow businessman Dmitry Kovtun. When the three met a second time Nov. 1, at the Pine Bar of London's Millennium Hotel, police believe Mr. Litvinenko got the fatal dose of polonium. Police are investigating whether Mr. Kovtun brought the poison from Moscow via Hamburg, Germany.

Since police have found traces of polonium in Mr. Lugovoi's London hotel, as well as in a Hamburg car and an apartment used by Mr. Kovtun, the widening investigation has opened a window onto a netherworld of former Russian agents who turn their secret contacts into lucrative careers.

In the Russia of President Vladimir Putin, whom Russian media have quoted as saying there's no such thing as a former KGB agent, the case highlights how blurred the distinction can be between active and retired operatives when ex-spies are still in great demand for their services and expertise.

In several phone interviews, Mr. Lugovoi said he is deeply offended by suggestions that he helped kill Mr. Litvinenko. He said he is now undergoing tests for radiation poisoning in a Moscow hospital. "It's nonsense," he said, that he still has ties to Russian security services. "I have a private company, and it guards many people who have only good things to say about me."

The Kremlin has vehemently denied that it had anything to do with Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning. Russia's state-run television has suggested that he poisoned himself, or that other oppositionists killed him in an effort to generate bad publicity for the Kremlin.

Mr. Lugovoi was trusted by some of the country's opposition because of his jail term, when he was charged with conspiring to help one of his clients, a critic of Mr. Putin, escape from prison in Moscow.

Now some wonder whether the prison term -- as well as Mr. Lugovoi's subsequent business dealings -- may have been an elaborate ruse to infiltrate the ranks of the Kremlin opposition and report on them.

Sergei Dorenko, a prominent radio personality and critic of Mr. Putin, said he has let go his bodyguards from Mr. Lugovoi's firm, effective Jan. 1. As Kremlin control tightens throughout Russia, he said, it isn't clear who works for whom.

"If they want to hurt you, I'm not sure there is any defense," said Mr. Dorenko. "In that case, I don't need a bodyguard -- what I really need is a witness."

Mr. Lugovoi's long history of working around Russia's ruling elite includes a few mysterious episodes with political overtones.

A graduate of the Soviet Union's equivalent of West Point, he commanded a platoon of Kremlin guards in the waning years of the Cold War. After the Soviet collapse in 1991, he was chief bodyguard to top officials such as acting Prime Minister Yegor Gaidar and Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev.

In 1996, he says, he left government service to head up security at the main state TV channel, which was controlled at the time by the politically powerful businessman Boris Berezovsky.

But when Mr. Putin came to office in 2000, the political winds shifted dramatically. Mr. Berezovsky came under pressure and left the country to avoid criminal charges. Prosecutors jailed one of his associates, Nikolai Glushkov, on charges that he had looted OAO Aeroflot, the national airline, where Mr. Glushkov was CEO.

Mr. Lugovoi was arrested, too, in 2001, when police said he tried to help Mr. Glushkov escape from prison during a visit to a local hospital. Mr. Glushkov said the escape charges were just a trick to keep him in prison and that Mr. Lugovoi might have been part of the plot. While sitting in court, he said, Mr. Lugovoi let slip that he was talking to officers of Russia's FSB, the successor to the KGB, while he was in prison. None of those conversations turned up in court records, Mr. Glushkov says.

When Mr. Lugovoi was released from prison the following year, he headed up the security firm "Ninth Wave," which he said he founded with some friends.

DOJ_NMG_0106796

Mr. Glushkov said he was suspicious of Mr. Lugovoi's quick success. After Mr. Glushkov was released from prison in 2004, he says he invited Mr. Lugovoi to his house for a chat. "I tried to get him to tell me about his conversations with the FSB and where his money was coming from," Mr. Glushkov said. "He didn't explain one or the other."

Mr. Lugovoi said he was "shocked" at Mr. Glushkov's accusations. He said the meeting never happened.

Mr. Glushkov said he advised Mr. Berezovsky, now living in London, to stay away from Mr. Lugovoi. But Mr. Glushkov said the tycoon didn't listen. Others say Mr. Berezovsky may have even helped Mr. Lugovoi's business by recommending his security company to political allies still living in Russia.

One of them was Ivan Rybkin, a former speaker of Russia's Parliament who made an abortive Berezovsky-backed attempt to run against Mr. Putin for president in 2004. Eight private security guards watched Mr. Rybkin, and occasionally Mr. Lugovoi would stop in to check on them, Mr. Rybkin says.

As the campaign entered the home stretch, Mr. Rybkin disappeared. When he resurfaced a few days later, he said that while on a trip to Kiev, he had been drugged and that two men had made a videotape of him that was embarrassing in some unspecified way, before he regained consciousness. He dropped out of the presidential race and retired from politics.

Mr. Rybkin said he always felt uneasy under Mr. Lugovoi's care. It was never clear, he said, whether his security guards were watching him, or trying to learn his next move. He fired Mr. Lugovoi's guards in 2004, and now lives with his family -- and without security guards -- at a dacha outside Moscow.

"Now I only trust my brother," said Mr. Rybkin.

That mishap didn't dent Mr. Lugovoi's business, however. Last year, he plowed his profits into a new venture -- a brewery producing wine, beer and kvas, a Russian beverage made from fermented bread.

He says the business required him to travel to London more than a dozen times this year. While in London, he would often visit his old boss, Mr. Berezovsky, as well as Mr. Litvinenko, who at one time worked as a bodyguard for the tycoon.

Mr. Litvinenko, who fled to London in 2000, had written two books there that were both deeply critical of Mr. Putin and Mr. Litvinenko's former employers in the security services.

In mid-October, Mr. Lugovoi took a trip to London, and brought with him Mr. Kovtun, a fellow military-academy graduate who also said he had moved to the private sector, as a consultant to foreign firms in Russia. Mr. Lugovoi said he introduced Mr. Kovtun to Mr. Litvinenko so they could share business contacts.

Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Kovtun returned to London two weeks later. This time Mr. Kovtun traveled via Hamburg, where he served back in the days of the Soviet Union. Police said Mr. Kovtun left traces of polonium on his ex-wife's sofa, where he slept, and on the seat of a BMW that picked him up at the airport.

In London, the three men met again Nov. 1 at the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel.

Detectives from Scotland Yard flew to Moscow but have not been allowed to directly question either of the men, who both say they have been hospitalized with polonium poisoning. Mr. Lugovoi says he spoke to Russian investigators for three hours, however, in the presence of British detectives. Mr. Lugovoi waived his right to a lawyer, saying he's a victim, not a perpetrator. "I have nothing to hide," he said.

Defining Democracy Down (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Over the course of five days in Caracas last week, I couldn't help but notice the ubiquitous image of President Hugo Chávez peering down from hundreds of his campaign banners that read "Vote against the devil; vote against the empire." The nationalistic message denouncing President George W. Bush and the U.S. blanketed the capital.

On election night, as it became clear that more votes had been cast for Mr. Chávez than for candidate Manuel Rosales, the president appeared on the balcony of Miraflores, the presidential palace, to proclaim that "the devil who tries to dominate the world," had suffered another defeat.

The red-clad Chávez dramatically recited from the Lord's Prayer and then borrowed from it for his own prophesy. "Thy kingdom come," he bellowed, and thereafter, "the kingdom of socialism." The ailing Fidel Castro reportedly sent a short message from Havana congratulating Mr. Chávez and noting that "the victory was resounding, crushing and without parallel in the history of our America."

DOJ_NMG_0106797

Mr. Chávez has for eight years been heading a devoutly anti-American government and he is widely considered the region's heir apparent to Fidel. But be prepared for the Venezuelan bad boy to become even more menacing to the U.S. now. The reason, in a word, is "legitimacy." Having gone through an electoral exercise against candidate Rosales, who managed to garner nearly 40% of the vote, Mr. Chávez is likely to be emboldened by the conventional notion around the region that he heads a "democracy."

This is regrettable. There isn't a shred of evidence to support the claim that Venezuela has a democracy and voices for freedom are badly needed to point out this reality.

The assault on Venezuelan democracy, which began before Mr. Chávez came to power, has been possible largely because of state corruption. But the Chávez government has taken the concept to a whole new level. In this space last week I cited a report by Gustavo Coronel, a former director of the state oil company. His paper, "Corruption, Mismanagement and Abuse of Power in Hugo Chávez's Venezuela," published by the Cato Institute, deserves a fuller airing.

Mr. Coronel, who was the Venezuelan representative for Transparency International from 1996-2000, has painstakingly traced the "hypercorruption" that is now flourishing as a result of record oil income, poor management, and the "ideological predilections" of a president trying to "play a messianic role in world affairs." In 23 pages he neatly shows that Mr. Chávez, who claims to represent the progressive left, is nothing but an old-fashioned authoritarian otherwise known in Latin America as a caudillo.

The report properly notes that government corruption is "the violation of public interest for personal or partisan gain," a definition that goes beyond graft to "the use and abuse of political power." Chávez corruption includes the 1999 constituent assembly, which was packed with his supporters and given supraconstitutional powers to dissolve the country's democratic institutions and create new ones made up of pro-Chávez actors. "This ended with all Venezuelan political institutions under the control of the government and eliminated effective checks and balances," Mr. Coronel writes. "From that moment on . . . Venezuela ceased to be a democracy."

Since then the government has used its unchecked power to "spend" the country's oil wealth arbitrarily and without any accountability. Using the data from the Center for Economic Research in Caracas, Mr. Coronel identifies $17 billion in Venezuelan "donations to politically friendly countries," various infrastructure projects around the region and weapons purchases. Bolivian President Evo Morales, who famously used street violence to bring down two elected governments, got $30 million on a visit to Caracas in January. "According to the Venezuelan Central Bank," Mr. Coronel writes, "about $22.5 billion has been transferred to accounts abroad by the Chávez government since 2004." Some $12 billion of it, he says, remains unaccounted for.

Mr. Coronel notes that "according to Transparency International 95% of all known public contracts are awarded without bidding." In a country where the state owns the oil and the oil is the economy this means massive politicized fraud. False invoicing and the signing of contracts with "nonexistent suppliers" are among the tricks of the trade and explain why the country is witnessing the "emergence of a new rich 'revolutionary' class."

The politicized Supreme Court, National Electoral Council (CNE) and state-owned oil company PdVSA no longer have any transparency obligations. The CNE, for example, has not allowed an independent audit of the voter registry, which contains almost 17 million names, "a statistical improbabilty" in a country of 26 million, "60% of whom are too young to register." With Chávez carte blanche comes power to destroy political enemies too. After a PdVSA strike to oppose the politicization of the oil company 20,000 skilled employees were fired in violation of Venezuelan labor laws.

Drug trafficking through Venezuela has also boomed under the Chávez government and there is good reason to believe the military is involved. A May report for Jane's Intelligence Review by Andy Webb-Vidal contains an interview with a former Colombian guerrilla who knows how to get illegal substances into Venezuela: "Once across the river, the [Colombian rebels] would make a payment to the National Guard and then transport the drugs in four-wheel drive vehicles."

Just days after the election, Mr. Chávez took off on a South American tour to exert his regional leadership as a man chosen by the people. His aircraft was escorted by the first two of 30 Russian-made warplanes that Venezuela has recently ordered. Back home his government had just announced a joint venture with Iran to make cars in Venezuela.

DOJ_NMG_0106798

Venezuela is not a democracy by any definition and Mr. Chávez is sure to be a thorn in the side of democrats for years to come. But legitimizing his abuse of power, in face of all the evidence, only makes things worse.

Hair-Raising New World (WSJ)

By Henry Sokolski

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Israeli officials this week made two painfully honest nuclear pronouncements. The first -- Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's indirect admission on Monday that Israel had nuclear weapons -- got the lion's share of attention. Another statement, however, was easily as interesting: On Wednesday Israeli officials publicly applauded Saudi Arabia's announcement that it and its Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) neighbors intended to develop "peaceful nuclear energy." Why Jerusalem's endorsement? Because, as Israeli officials explained, these Arab nations' announcement was "directed against Iran." That is, it threatened to check Iran's bomb activities with a Sunni nuclear-weapons option.

Welcome to the new nuclear age where peace is the sturdy child of terror and "peaceful nuclear energy" is the not-so-secret weapon of choice. Unlike Washington, which last month applauded Egypt and earlier Turkey (two other Iran-fearing nations) for the utility and peacefulness of their own just-announced nuclear programs, Israel deserves credit for candidly outing such projects for what they truly are -- nuclear-weapons options.

Still, even with Israel's atomic honesty and America's embrace of a new world full of nuclear-energy programs and a growing number of mutually-not-so-deterred states, no one has yet thought through just how hair-raising this new world is likely to be. Without any luck, in 15 to 20 years, we could see a Middle East (Turkey, Algeria, Egypt, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Syria and Israel), an Asia (Vietnam, Indonesia, Burma, Malaysia, Australia, Japan, Taiwan, Korea, China, India and Pakistan), and even a Latin America (Mexico, Venezuela, Cuba, Argentina and Brazil) full of nuclear weapons-ready states.

This may seem far-fetched but consider: The U.S. is now encouraging nuclear power to sustain economic growth and save the world from global warming. The Bush administration has condoned or backed nuclear expansion in India, China, Brazil, Argentina, South Africa, Ukraine, France, Britain, Japan and Australia. Because of this and previous U.S. winking at the nuclear fuel-making activities of key U.S. allies, our own State Department's lawyers now eagerly insist that all nations have a right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) to make nuclear power and fuel. All that's required, they say, is that states claim their activities have some conceivable civilian application and open them to occasional international visits.

The risk of pursuing such egregious policies is obvious: A world full of nuclear fuel-making states, claiming they are on the right side of the NPT, only days or weeks from having bombs.

The latest idea that is supposed to prevent this is to assure countries affordable (i.e., subsidized) nuclear fuel and reactors in order to bribe them to forgo nuclear fuel-making. If this is not enough, the International Atomic Energy Agency recently suggested that perhaps it would also be useful to share "proliferation resistant" -- but not necessarily proliferation proof -- reprocessing technologies (a key way to make nuclear-weapons fuel). All of this, of course, would be voluntary. Countries that signed up could change their minds.

Much of this is worse than doing nothing. Such subsidized nuclear aid, at a minimum, will undermine whatever moral or economic authority we might otherwise have to scold or isolate would-be bomb makers about their unnecessary, uneconomical and dangerous activities.

What then should we do instead? The short answer is to rely more on market mechanisms and less on government guessing to guide us through the myriad of choices that must be made to fuel and generate clean, economical electricity. Fortunately, the most dangerous nuclear activities, like nuclear fuel-making, are uneconomical as is producing large amounts of nuclear power in oil- and gas-rich countries with small electrical grids (e.g., much of the Middle East). There are also a number of non-nuclear ways to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. We need to exploit this.

First, we should encourage open international bidding on the construction of large electrical power generators and their related fuel-making plants. Winning bids in any national competition should go not to the priciest or the most subsidized project but rather to the option that is the best value in producing a desired amount of clean electricity. Here, one might begin by pushing the Global Energy Charter for Sustainable Development, a popular treaty which calls for "open and competitive" energy markets.

DOJ_NMG_0106799

Second, we must recognize that to meet tough greenhouse-gas emission goals, a consumption tax on carbon-generating fuels will be necessary. Besides making its introduction revenue neutral and progressive through tax reform (income and other tax reductions, plus rebates for citizens who are poor), these new taxes should be accompanied with an early sunset on all the fuel-specific subsidies now in place for nuclear and natural gas, oil, clean coal and renewables. Anything less would only stack the deck higher in favor of nuclear against safer, less subsidized alternatives.

Firms building and operating fuel-making and electricity-generating plants would have to assume the full costs of financing, insuring and decommissioning them. In the case of nuclear facilities, they also would have to assume the expense of safeguarding and physically securing them against diversions and terrorist and military attacks. Ideally, keeping governments from subsidizing these activities should be a priority not only for national governments, but for trade organizations like the EU and WTO.

Under such a market regime, nations that choose to subsidize any particular form of energy production would be called to account for undermining economic fairness. If they subsidized nuclear activities, they also could also be collared for threatening international security. Certainly, subsidizing nuclear fuel-making (where the world capacity is projected to exceed demand for the next decade or more) makes no economic sense.

Would this stop nuclear proliferation? No. But, unlike today's interpretation of the NPT, which ignores suspicious "civilian" nuclear undertakings even when it's obvious that they lack any economic rationale, it would help flag worrisome nuclear activities far sooner -- well before a nation came anywhere near making bombs. Would it stifle nuclear power? No. A carbon tax should favor nuclear power but no more than cheaper, clean alternatives.

Would it take care of a nuclear-ready Iran? Hardly. Only military, economic and diplomatic efforts to squeeze Iran (as we did the Soviet Union during the Cold War) can handle that problem. But it would prevent Iran from becoming an international nuclear model. It certainly would be far more effective in promoting nonproliferation than any American-led effort to subsidize atomic power, and clearly less risky than backing Israeli and GCC efforts to surround Iran with peaceful nuclear-weapons options.

Mr. Sokolski is executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center is editor of "Taming the Next Set of Strategic Weapons Threats" (Strategic Studies Institute, 2006).

A Tough Beginning (WP)

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

WHEN FELIPE CalderÃ³n took office as Mexican president two weeks ago, the dominant question was whether he would be able to govern the country. Having won election by a razor-thin margin, he faced a virtual insurrection on the part of the leftist populist he defeated, plus a separate standoff with militants attempting to overthrow an unpopular state governor and escalating violence by drug traffickers. It wasn't even clear that he would manage to take the oath of office, since opposition militants vowed to physically block him from entering Congress.

Fortunately Mr. CalderÃ³n has opened his presidency with aggressiveness and skill. He outmaneuvered the congressional dissidents at his swearing-in; five days later, he ordered the arrest of one of the main leaders of the violent protests in Oaxaca state. Next came a raid on the offices of Oaxaca state police and prosecutors, who had failed to act against those who shot and killed some of the anti-government protesters.

This week Mr. CalderÃ³n launched an offensive against the drug traffickers, dispatching 6,500 federal forces to his home state of Michoacan. Feuding gangsters there have committed some 500 murders this year, including a series of grisly beheadings. Though no one expects that the gangs will be quickly vanquished, the new president has sent an important message: He does not intend to allow his narrow election to produce a weak or indecisive government.

That is fortunate, because after six years of passivity and political impasse under former president Vicente Fox, Mexico badly needs an effective leader. In addition to the dangers of political rebellion and criminal disorder, Mexico's economy is being held back by monopolies and unions whose resistance to competition and deregulation needs to be tackled. There are also unnecessary obstacles to foreign investment, especially in the energy sector. Mr. CalderÃ³n has spoken of the need for tax and fiscal reform that would leave the government less dependent on revenue from the state oil company.

DOJ_NMG_0106800

So far Mr. CalderÃ³n has accompanied his law-and-order campaign with populist gestures: He slashed his own salary and the presidential budget and adopted some of the social spending measures championed by AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador, the failed presidential candidate who now seeks to destroy Mexico's democracy. Considering the divided electorate and Mr. CalderÃ³n's shaky starting point, that looks wise. Good politics and aggressive law enforcement should help to increase and consolidate the new president's authority. Then he will have to use it to push through the institutional and structural reforms Mexico needs to thrive.

Pacts Americana? (NYT)

By David Kaye, K. Russell Lamotte And Peter Hoey

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WHAT can the incoming Democratic Congress do to help reverse the steep erosion of America's standing abroad, particularly the impression that the United States has disengaged from global problem-solving? Though the President dominates foreign policy, the Senate can make an impact in one significant area: by giving the required two-thirds majority vote to approve a raft of treaties awaiting action.

The Senate has before it more than two dozen treaties submitted for approval by President Bush and his predecessors — some, in fact, were negotiated as long ago as the Eisenhower administration. These agreements are not like the Kyoto Protocol on climate change or the statute that established the International Criminal Court, which are too controversial even to be transmitted to the Senate.

Indeed, these are widely supported pacts, making it difficult to discern why many stalled in the first place: perhaps it's as simple as a senator's vague concerns about "sovereignty," a lack of domestic constituency or the press of other legislative business.

Early approval of key agreements in areas of great international concern, like the environment and the laws of war, would show the world that the United States is committed to solving global problems. To hit the point home, the Senate should act within the first six months of the next Congress. Quick approval for most is eminently doable.

There is a pressing need to repair America's image now, even while the Democratic Congress and the White House battle over the future of Iraq policy. Approving treaties from this list would make a good start.

DOJ_NMG_0106801

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Warns About Attacks If Ill Cleric Dies (NSDY) 3
Jailed Sheik Has Tumor On Liver (NYDN) 4
Sheik's Declining Health Puts FBI On Alert (USAT) 4
Sheik's Illness Prompts Bulletin (NYT) 5
Feds Find No Credible Terror Threats For Holiday (ABC News) .. 5
Behind This Very Real Threat (NSDY) 6
Port Protectionism Doesn't Work (LAT) 7

Homeland Response:

Pelosi Wants Panel To Oversee Spy Budget (USAT) 8
House Democrats Planning New Intelligence Oversight (NYT) 8
Pelosi Announces Intelligence Plans (AP) 9
New Panel To Check Intelligence Budgets (WT) 11
Pelosi Looks To Boost Oversight Of Intelligence And Ethics (WP) 11
Pelosi Wants New House Committee To Oversee Spy Spending (AP) 12
Homeland Security Chief Defends Real ID Plan (CNET) 13
Government Proposes Rail Security Plan (AP) 14
Tighter Rule On Hazardous Rail Cargo Is Ready (NYT) 15
U.S. Is Dropping Effort To Track If Visitors Leave (NYT) 15
U.S. Preparing To Drop Tracking Of Foreigners' Departures By Land (WP) 17
GAO Finds Homeland Security Tech Issues (HC/AP) 17
Travel Industry Groups Oppose Risk Tests (AP) 18
A Gag On Free Speech (NYT) 19
Pentagon Papers Revisited (WP) 19
When Disaster Strikes (WP) 20

War News:

Bush Weighing Deeper Commitment In Iraq, Officials Say (MCT)20
Call To Add U.S. Forces Is Resisted At Home, In Iraq (WSJ)..... 22
Military Considers Sending As Many As 35,000 More U.S. Troops To Iraq, McCain Says (NYT) 23
McCain Calls For More Troops In Iraq (AP) 25
Bush Seeks Ideas On New War Plan Here And In Iraq (USAT) . 26
Iraqi VP Says Bush Wants Coalition To Counter Al-Sadr (USAT)26
Iraq Coalition Plan Gains Urgency (LAT) 27
In Baker's Blunder, A Chance For Bush (WP) 28
Panned In Baghdad (WSJ) 29
Truman's Trials Resonate For Bush (WP) 30
Top Commanders Appear Set To Urge Larger U.S. Military (NYT) 31
General Says Army Will Need To Grow (WP) 32
Army Chief Seeks More Forces, Reserves (AP) 34
Army Is Stretched Too Thin (LAT) 34
General Says Army 'will Break' Without More Reserves (MCT) . 35
Rice Rejects Overture To Iran And Syria (WP) 37
Could Iran Help The US Stabilize Iraq? (CSM) 38
Rice Lying Low At The Middle East Crossroads (FT) 39
Saudi Ex-ambassador Urged No US Talks With Iran (AFP) 40
White House: Syrian Visits Hurt Progress (AP) 41
Bush Administration Says Senator's Trip To Damascus Is A Mistake (MCT) 42
White House Criticizes Senator's Syria Trip (AFP) 42
White House Upset By Senator's Trip To Syria (NYT) 43
Kerry Urges Bush To Engage Iran, Syria On Iraq (AFP) 44
What Syria Would Say (WP) 44
New General Takes The Reins As No. 2 U.S. Commander In Iraq (LAT) 45
'We're Seeing Positive Results' (USAT) 46
White House Defends Enemy Body Count (AP) 47
Troops In Iraq To Get Fire-resistant Uniforms (USAT) 47
Sectarian And Ethnic Lines In Sand Stall Provision Of Iraqi Oil Law (NYT) 48
Gunmen Kidnap Shopkeepers, Bystanders In Baghdad (MCT) . 48
Panic, Then Quiet, As Kidnappers Strike (LAT) 49
Gunmen Kidnap Baghdad Shopkeepers, Bystanders (WP) 50
Bitter Detour For Expatriate Back In Iraq (NYT) 51
From Head Scarf To Army Cap, Making A New Life (NYT) 53
4 Are Killed And 22 Hurt In Bomb Attack In Afghanistan (NYT) .. 56
Pakistan Will Have To Reckon With Tribal Leaders, Negroponte Says (WP) 57
Gift Of Wreaths Touches Nation (USAT) 58
In The 83rd Congress, A Senate In Constant Turmoil (WP) 60

DOJ:

FEDERAL DIARY: Nearing Takeoff: Compensation For Justice Lawyers' Travel Time (WP) 61
U.S. Attorney John McKay Announces Resignation (AP) 62

Corporate Scandals:

Sycamore: Ex-exec Thwarts Options Probe (BZJRNL) 62
Dell Delays Filing Quarterly Report, Cites SEC Probe (BLOOM) 63

Coherent Faces Informal SEC Probe (CFO) ... 63
Apollo Finds Issues With Option Grants (AP) ... 63
S.E.C. Eases Regulations On Business (NYT) ... 64
Auditing Reform: Mission Accomplished! (WP) ... 65
Street Chiefs In For Big Paydays (WSJ) ... 66
Executive Compensation Comes Into The Clear (WP) ... 67

Criminal Law:

Criminal Inquiries Look At U.S. Oil-Gas Unit (NYT) ... 68
5 Oil And Gas Companies To Pay Royalties (AP) ... 69
Interior Strikes Deal On Owed Fees With Oil Companies; Foregoes Collecting $900 Million In Back Royalties (FEDT) 70
Duke Athletes Ask Judge To Bar Use Of Photo Lineup (WP/AP) 70
Polygamist Leader Ordered To Stand Trial (USAT/AP) ... 71
Authorities Launch Crackdown On L.A. Schemes (LAT) ... 72
Anti-Piracy Program Halting Cash Payouts To Employee Tipsters (IBD) ... 73
Engineer Indicted For Alleged Espionage (NSDY/AP) ... 74
California Man Charged In Theft Of Military Secrets (WT) ... 75
Paper Company Denies Misconduct (MJS) ... 76

Civil Rights:

Dallas Jail Violates Rights Of Inmates, U.S. Report Says (FWST) ... 76
L.A. County Hate Crimes Jump 26% (LAT) ... 77
NJ Lawmakers Approve Civil Unions (AP) ... 78
Legislators Vote For Gay Unions In New Jersey (NYT) ... 78
New Jersey Lawmakers Approve Gay Civil Unions (LAT) ... 79
Death Sentences Decline, And Experts Offer Reasons (NYT) ... 80
Executions In U.S. Drop To A 10-year Low (LAT) ... 81

Antitrust:

Feds Defend Approval Of Telecom Megamergers (CNET) ... 82
Stalemate Keeps AT& T-BellSouth Merger Off Of FCC's Agenda (WP) ... 83
Merger Hold Up (WSJ) ... 84
If More US Airlines Merge, Who Would Benefit? (CSM) ... 85
Antitrust Wait Ends In $1.1B Sirna Acquisition (BZJRNL) ... 86
Merck-Sirna Deal Clears Waiting Period (AP) ... 86
ProSieben Holders To Sell Stake In Private Buyout (WSJ) ... 86
Hearst Expects To Close "Daily Breeze" Purchase This Week (E&P) ... 87
Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard (AP) ... 87
Municipal Bond Probe May Spur Damage Claims, Legal Experts Say (BLOOM) ... 88
Samsung Electronics, LCD Makers May Face Record Antitrust Fines (BLOOM) ... 89
Japan Returns To Global Stage As An Acquirer (WSJ) ... 90

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Casino Plan For Catskills Moves Closer To Reality With Interior Department's Approval (NYT) ... 91

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pipe Bombs Lead To Arrest (PITTTRIB) ... 93
FBI Hails Phila. Labor Leader's Crime-prevention Work (PHI) ... 93
Briefly... CITY/REGION (PHI) ... 94
A Travesty Of Injustice (BOS) ... 94
2 Plead Guilty In Ski Resort Fire (NSDY/AP) ... 95
Shiite? Sunni? Some In US Learn Who's Who. (CSM) ... 95
Guards In Prison Sex Scandal Sentenced (WP/AP) ... 97
Murderer Of Witness Gets Life In Prison (PHI) ... 97
Officials Say Man Arrested After Mixing Pills On Flight (HC) ... 98
Body In Mexican Park Had U.S.agents' Business Cards (HC/AP) 98
Cyclist Indicted In Steroids Probe (NYT/AP) ... 99
Cyclist Indicted In BALCO Steroid Scandal (SFC) ... 100
Former American Cyclist Indicted As Balco Inquiry Takes New Step (NYT) ... 101
Cyclist Cited For Perjury (NYDN) ... 101
Cyclist Faces Perjury Charge In Balco Probe (MERCN) ... 102
Former Cyclist Charged With Hindering Steroid Probe (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 103
33 Indicted On Drug Ring Charges Tying City, Suburbs (MJS) 103
Five From Hazleton, Freeland Indicted On Heroin Conspiracy Charges (TLPA) ... 105
Marijuana Co-op Duo Out On Bail (CCT) ... 105

Immigration:

The System Is The Problem (WP) ... 106
Texas Official's Report Ignites A New Border Conflict (WP) ... 107

Congress-Administration:

Sen. Johnson 'Recovering' After Surgery (AP) ... 108
Johnson's Illness Threatens Dems' Power (AP) ... 109
Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery Amid Tide Of Sympathy And Well Wishes (AL) ... 110
Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery For Bleeding In Brain (USAT) ... 112
What The Fate Of Johnson's Seat May Portend (WSJ) ... 112
As A Senator Is Felled, A January Vote Looms Big (TIME) ... 114
Ill Senator Is Called Responsive (NYT) ... 114
Good Wishes Pour In For Sen. Johnson (USAT) ... 115
Johnson 'Critical' After Surgery (WT) ... 116
Democratic Senator Survives Brain Surgery (MCT) ... 117
Senator Tim Johnson Has Brain Surgery, Doctor Says (Update6) (BLOOM) ... 118
Control Of Senate At Issue As Sen. Johnson Undergoes Brain Surgery (CQ) ... 119
Senator Recovering From Brain Surgery (CHIT) ... 121
Senate Is Loath To Remove Disabled Members (LAT) ... 123
Democratic Sen. Johnson In Stable Condition After Brain Surgery (WP) ... 124
Experts Optimistic About Senator's Recovery (WP) ... 125
Senator's Chances Are Mixed For Recovery From Rare Disorder (WSJ) ... 126
Malformation Caused Johnson's Bleeding (USAT) ... 127
Birth Defect Led To Stroke In Senator, Doctors Say (NYT) ... 127
What Is Arteriovenous Malformation, Or AVM? (LAT) ... 128
Senator's Improvement Connected To Control Of Chamber (LAT) ... 129
Sen. Johnson Seldom In The Spotlight (AP) ... 130
An Unfamiliar Spotlight For An Unassuming Senator (NYT) ... 131
House Considers Independent Ethics Panel (AP) ... 132

DOJ_NMG_0106803

First Steps Toward Ethics Reform In Congress (CSM) 132
Page Board Chair Wants Monthly Meetings (AP) 133
Pelosi: GOP To Get 1 Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills (WSJ/DJ) 134
GOP Misses Chance To Reshape Environmental Laws (LAT). 135
Fitzgerald Mum On Cheney In Leak Case (AP) 136
Last-Minute Inserts Offer Benefits In Medicare Bill (NYT) 137
Minority Hiring On Hill Pushed (WT) 138
Chertoff Says FEMA Still Has Work To Do (AP) 139
Dow Sets Another Record Close On Strong Corporate Profits (WP/AP) 139
Markets Go On Record-breaking Binge (USAT) 140
Dow Hits Record Over 12400 Mark Despite Oil Rise (WSJ) 140
Import Prices Climb 0.2% After Two-Month Decline (WSJ) 141
Opec Flexes Its Muscles By Agreeing To Cut Production (FT). 142
OPEC Sets Reduction In Output (NYT) 142
OPEC's Cut Aims To Prop Up Prices (WSJ) 143
OPEC Plans Another Cutback In Oil Production (BLOOM) 144
Americans Open To New Kinds Of Candidates (WSJ) 145
Whichever Way The Wind Blows (NYT) 146
Trade Ruling On Steel May Boost Auto Industry (WSJ) 147
Obama: Not 'the Un-Hillary' (CHIT) 147
Taking 'Obama-mania' In Stride (CSM) 149
Commission Seeks School System Overhaul (AP) 150
Expert Panel Proposes Far-Reaching Redesign Of The American Education System (NYT) 150
Schools Report Urges Drastic Change, Higher Salaries (WP).. 151
Panel: Revamp U.S. High Schools (CHIT) 152
To Fix US Schools, Panel Says, Start Over (CSM) 154
Report Calls For Overhaul Of U.S. Education System (WSJ)... 155
U.S. Schools Overhaul Sought, Using Private Control (Update3) (BLOOM) 156
A Pentagon Agency Is Looking At Brains -- And Raising Eyebrows (WSJ) 157

Other News:

Local Elections Test For Iran President (AP) 158
Rogues And Fools (NYT) 159
Israel Bars Hamas Official Carrying Millions (NYT) 159
Palestinian Premier Barred At Border (WP) 160
Palestinian PM Found With $35m In Cash (FT) 161
Hamas In Control Of Gaza Border Crossing (AP) 162
Israel's High Court OKs Targeted Attacks (CHIT) 163
Israeli High Court Backs Military On Its Policy Of 'Targeted Killings' (WP) 164
In Lebanon, Hizbullah's Rise Provokes Shiite Dissent (CSM)... 165
Lebanese Government Still Standing (LAT) 166
U.S. Standing Sinks In Mideast (WT) 167
North Korea Emphasizes Nuclear Pride (WSJ) 167
North Korean Talks To Resume Monday (MCT) 169
N. Korea Coming Back To The Table (LAT) 169
NKorea May Stage Second Nuclear Test During Six-party Talks: Minister (AFP) 170
$1M Fund Intended To Assist Activists (AP) 171
Bush Creates Activists' Funding (WT) 171
Pentagon Calls For New African Command (AP) 172
Egypt Arrests Opposition Leaders After A Protest (NYT) 172
UK Drops BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe (FT) 173
White House Hosts Malaria Summit (AFP) 173
Bush Celebrates Early Victories In Campaign Against Malaria (NYT) 174
Bush Says Ending Malaria 'Possible' (WT) 175
U.S., China Clash On Currency (WP) 176
China Entreats U.S. To Broaden Its Understanding (WSJ) 177
New U.N. Leader Is Sworn In And Promises To Rebuild Trust (NYT) 178
Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (AP) 178
Ban Ki-moon Sworn In As Next UN Chief (AFP) 179
Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary (LAT) 180
Incoming U.N. Chief Ban Pledges To Restore Trust (WP) 181
S. Korea's Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (WT) 182
Castro Near Death, U.S. Intelligence Chief Says (WP) 183
After Years Of Setbacks, Embargo Opponents See Glimmer Of Hope (MCT) 183
Cuba Vows To Defy U.S. Efforts At Change (AP) 184
Poll: 1 In 4 Cubans OK With Freedoms (AP) 185
A Central Character In Russian Whodunit Says He Was A Victim (WSJ) 185
Defining Democracy Down (WSJ) 187
Hair-Raising New World (WSJ) 188
A Tough Beginning (WP) 190
Pacts Americana? (NYT) 190

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Warns About Attacks If Ill Cleric Dies (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau
Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

The FBI is putting out a warning saying if the sickly, blind Egyptian helf in the 1993 WTC bombing dies, it could trigger attacks against the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0106804

WASHINGTON -- The blind Egyptian cleric convicted in 1995 in connection with a plot to blow up the World Trade Center suffered a "medical emergency" at a federal prison in Springfield, Mo., last week, and the FBI is warning that his death could trigger attacks against the United States.

Law enforcement and homeland security officials said an FBI advisory was sent about the deteriorating condition of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, 68, "out of an abundance of caution," and there was no specific threat information about planned attacks.

Sources said that the man considered a spiritual leader to the Islamist radical movement was rushed to a Springfield hospital emergency room last week after spitting up blood. A tumor was found on his liver and he was diagnosed with terminal liver cancer, the sources said. The cleric is now "stable," and has been returned to the prison, according to Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley.

New York City Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said yesterday that the FBI had shared its assessment with his department, "and we'll take appropriate precautions as, you know, as our intelligence indicates."

Abdel-Rahman was convicted in October 1995 of being part of a wide-ranging conspiracy to blow up the World Trade Center, bomb the United Nations and kill Egypt's president.

"He is a man of great substance and following in parts of the Islamic world, and there is no doubt that his death will provoke an outpouring of both sympathy and anger," said Vincent Cannistraro, a terrorism expert and former director of intelligence programs for the National Security Council. "Will that translate into a terrorist event? It's possible. But the case is more likely to create spontaneous violence abroad."

He discounted the likelihood of such incidents in the United States because of the lack of what he called "a substantial Muslim fundamentalist constituency."

Abdel-Rahman has long suffered from ill health, including diabetes. As his condition deteriorated, he was moved from a maximum-security prison in Colorado to the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo. Six years ago, al-Qaida released the cleric's purported "last will and testament" in which he exhorted his followers to "extract the most violent revenge" if he died in U.S. custody.

"His death could arguably inspire others, but I think that more than anything, this is a cautionary step," Frank Cilluffo, director of the Homeland Security Policy Institute at George Washington University, said of the advisory. "I think it comes from the recognition that some solutions aren't going to be out of the FBI, but from state and local authorities, and any information they have ... could be valuable."

Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said that it was the FBI's job to advise of developments, but "I don't think we should be overly concerned."

Staff writer Herb Lowe contributed to this story.

Jailed Sheik Has Tumor On Liver (NYDN)

New York Daily News, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The notorious blind Egyptian sheik who led the first terrorist assault on New York City is "falling apart" and was recently hospitalized, federal officials said yesterday.

Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the imprisoned Islamic cleric known as the Blind Sheik, was rushed from a federal prison hospital in Springfield, Mo., to an emergency room after he started "throwing up blood," according to an FBI intelligence bulletin obtained by the Daily News.

While under examination at St. John's Regional Health Center's trauma unit on Dec. 6 to stop bleeding in his esophagus, doctors "discovered a small tumor on his liver," the FBI said.

Abdel-Rahman is now stable and "is not at death's door," a U.S. official lamented.

"The guy is sick; he's falling apart," the official added.

He is also back in prison.

The FBI sent notice to police agencies Dec. 8 because Rahman has begged for revenge if he died in an America prison.

Abdel-Rahman was convicted a decade ago and is serving a life sentence for planning to destroy city landmarks. He issued a religious fatwa to kill Americans that was cited by Osama Bin Laden, whose original Sept. 11 plot involved hijacking jets to secure Abdel-Rahman's release.

James Gordon Meek

Sheik's Declining Health Puts FBI On Alert (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106805

WASHINGTON — The FBI issued a security alert to law enforcement agencies last week because of the declining health of imprisoned terrorism conspirator Omar Abdel-Rahman, the blind Egyptian cleric who once called for attacks on America if he died in U.S. custody, two federal law enforcement officials said Thursday.

Rahman, 68, who has ties to al-Qaeda and is widely known as the "Blind Sheik," was sentenced to life in prison in 1996 after being convicted of assisting a plot to attack New York City landmarks. He suffers from diabetes and has been held at the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo., said the officials, who described the contents of the Dec. 8 bulletin. The officials requested anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly on the matter. Rahman has been in declining health almost since his conviction more than a decade ago.

The officials said that there was no indication an attack on the USA is coming, but that the FBI bulletin was a reminder that Rahman had called on terrorist associates to seek "the most violent revenge" if he died in U.S. custody. His statement was part of his will, which was made public in 1998.

U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Tracy Billingsley, said Thursday that Rahman was taken to an undisclosed hospital for treatment last week, but that his condition stabilized and he was returned to the prison hospital. She declined to elaborate on his condition, citing federal prison policy.

Rahman, who has been praised in recent years by al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, was convicted of taking part in a plot to assassinate political and religious leaders and blow up the United Nations and other landmarks in New York City. At his sentencing hearing in New York, Rahman called his case "an extension of the American war against Islam."

The sentencing came nearly two years after the convictions of four men in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, which killed six people and injured more than 1,000. Conspirators in the terrorist plot linked to Rahman were not charged in the '93 bombing but were accused of being part of the group that carried it out. Rahman is regarded as the spiritual leader of the radical Islamic group Al-Gamaa al-Islamiya, a group based in Egypt that has claimed responsibility for a 1997 attack at a Luxor temple in protest of the sheik's confinement by the United States.

Sheik's Illness Prompts Bulletin (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

The hospitalization of Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, who is serving a life sentence at a Missouri prison for his role in a 1993 plot to bomb New York City landmarks, prompted the authorities to issue a bulletin saying that he had urged his followers to engage in violence if he died in custody, law enforcement officials said. The officials said they had received no credible threats associated with Sheik Abdel Rahman, a 69-year-old blind Islamic cleric, but sent the advisory Dec. 8 as a precaution, two days after the sheik was transferred to a Springfield, Mo., hospital for a blood transfusion. A spokesman for the Bureau of Prisons declined to describe details of the sheik's medical problem or say how long he was hospitalized, but said he was returned to the prison when his condition stabilized.

Feds Find No Credible Terror Threats For Holiday (ABC News)

By Richard Esposito

ABC News' The Blotter, December 15, 2006

As the height of the holiday season approaches, the FBI and Department of Homeland Security say there are no known credible terrorist attacks in the making inside the United States, but crowded stores and New Year's celebrations remain attractive targets.

This was a key finding of a "Holiday Season Security Awareness" bulletin circulated Wednesday and obtained by ABCNews.com

"DHS and the FBI currently have no credible intelligence that terrorist organizations are planning attacks against the Homeland during the holiday period," the bulletin stated. "Attacks overseas and disrupted plots abroad continue to suggest a focus on attacks against lightly-defended targets or facilities with lower security profiles. We continue to urge vigilance during the holiday period and ask law enforcement and security personnel to report suspicious activity."

The report cited the Dec. 6 FBI arrest of Derrick Shareef on charges of plotting to detonate hand grenades at an Illinois shopping mall during the holiday season as a reminder of the potential threat.

In a separate security report, the Department of Homeland Security Infrastructure Threat and Risk Analysis Center noted a continued interest on the part of al Qaeda in attacking a national monument or icon. The world-renowned Statue of Liberty and Washington Monument continue to be at the top of that terror wish list, that report said.

Click Here for Full Blotter Coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0106806

"DHS lacks credible, specific evidence suggesting any terrorist group currently is targeting national monuments and icons (NMI) assets," the strategic sector assessment report said.

"Nonethess, al-Qa'ida remains a serious threat and desires another strike in the United States. An attack against NMI assets (National Monuments and Icons) meet its targeting strategy of causing mass casualties and economic and psychological damage and would further its strategic goals."

One of a series of sector analyses produced regularly by the Department of Homeland Security, the report notes that "other extremist groups and homegrown Islamic radicals whose views are informed and inspired by, but not necessarily linked to, al-Qa'ida also are a threat to the sector."

"Two sector assets, the Statue of Liberty and the Washington Monument, have featured prominently in detainee and threat reporting."

National monuments and landmarks make a uniquely attractive target, the report said, because they attract large crowds, have symbolic value and allow relatively easy access.

"The NMI sector is unique because of the diverse values its assets represent. The most devastating attack against a particular NMI target would likely cause mass casualties and destroy the symbolic structure. Even a less severe attack, however, would undermine the great value placed in an austere and unblemished monument or icon, especially those that symbolize freedom and safety."

Behind This Very Real Threat (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The common denominator was salad. Over several weeks, hundreds of people reported falling ill with diarrhea and severe intestinal distress after eating leafy green vegetables at salad bars.

The time was September 1984, the place a small town in Oregon called The Dalles.

It took more than a year before investigators determined that 751 people had been sickened, not by accidental contamination, but as a result of deliberate poisoning in what would be the first documented case of bioterrorism in the United States. An obscure religious sect had sprayed Salmonella typhimurium on salad bars and drinking cups in 10 restaurants in an attempt to influence an upcoming election.

"That was probably the first bona fide case of a biological terrorist act in the U.S. in terms of intentional contamination of the food supply," said Peter Chalk, a RAND Corp. terrorism expert. "But there have been other cases of this around the world in terms of simple extortion, carried out by criminals against food companies, as well as by animal rights activists and environmental extremists."

While the U.S. food supply is among the world's safest, experts say it is vulnerable to deliberate, as well as accidental, contamination - a reality brought home by the deaths of three people and the sickening of hundreds as a result of tainted spinach, tomatoes and a still-unidentified food source at Taco Bell. The country's exposure to deliberate sabotage is increasing, moreover, as a result of the centralization of the food supply, growing foreign imports and the system's oversight by a "fragmented and problem-laden" national safety system, in the words of a 2003 report by the Government Accounting Office.

Increased preparations

"The threat from agroterrorism may not be widely recognized, but the threat is real and the impact could be devastating," said FBI Deputy Director John Pistole, speaking at a recent summit of law enforcement and agriculture officials.

Noting that documents about U.S. agriculture, which had been translated into Arabic, were discovered in Afghan caves, Pistole said that, while the FBI had no specific intelligence regarding attacks, "the absence of a communicated threat does not prove the absence of a threat."

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, national response plans to agroterrorism have been prepared by agencies, including the Department of Homeland Security, the FBI, the Food and Drug Administration and the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Stepped-up planning and surveillance have also been spurred by analyses showing growing criminal interest in biological agents. Nineteen of 27 confirmed terrorist efforts to use such agents around the world, and 40 of 56 confirmed criminal cases, occurred in the 1990s, according to a study by W. Seth Carus for National Defense University in Washington, D.C..

But many say that recent contamination episodes are proof that such plans are inadequate.

"What these incidents show is that the actual oversight of the food supply is questionable," said Chalk, the Rand expert. "One of the major problems is that we require only self-regulation of the food processing industry and that the FDA lacks sufficient inspectors and resources to do the job."

Opinion is divided

DOJ_NMG_0106807

Those deficiencies become magnified by the food industry's growing centralization, which could make the introduction of even a small amount of poison devastating. Two Stanford researchers published a study last year concluding that just a third of an ounce of botulinum toxin poured into a milk tanker could cause hundreds of thousands of deaths.

"Food poisoning and food contamination have always been with us," said Michael Pollan, author of "The Omnivore's Dilemma: A Natural History of Four Meals." But it doesn't become a national story like this until it affects hundreds of people. ... If you really cared about national security and public health, you would take steps to promote decentralization of the food supply."

Others, however, discount the terrorist threat. They say an attack on the food supply simply doesn't produce the shock value - or in most cases, the casualties - of crashing planes into buildings.

"If your intent is to kill people, then you can do it in a lot more effective ways," said Jean Weese, a food scientist at Auburn University in Alabama.

Intentional food poisonings

Cases of intentional poisonings of the food supply:

2003: Ninety-two people fall ill after purchasing ground beef from a Michigan supermarket that was intentionally contaminated with nicotine. An employee of the supermarket was subsequently indicted for the contamination of 200 pounds of beef.

1997: Israeli settlers spray pesticides on grapevines in two Palestinian villages, destroying up to 17,000 metric tons of grapes.

1990s: Before using sarin nerve gas in the Tokyo subways in 1995, which killed 12 people and sickened thousands, Aum Shinrikyo produced biological agents including botulinum and anthrax, and tried unsuccessfully to use them. The group outfitted three vehicles to disseminate botulinum toxin, according to testimony by former members, one of which was targeted at the U.S. Navy base at Yokosuka. The effort is believed to have failed because the agents were not sufficiently virulent.

1984: The Rajneeshee cult spreads salmonella in salad bars at 10 restaurants in The Dalles, Ore., to influence a local election. Health officials say that 751 people were sickened and more than 40 hospitalized.

1978: Members of a group calling itself the Arab Revolutionary Council poison Israeli oranges with mercury, injuring at least 12 people and reducing exports by 40 percent.

SOURCE: CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH REPORT,

"AGROTERRORISM: THREATS AND PREPAREDNESS"

Port Protectionism Doesn't Work (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

SIX MEMBERS OF Congress traveled to the Dominican Republic on Sunday for a look at the future of U.S. port security. At Puerto Caucedo, east of Santo Domingo, they examined an X-ray scanning system for cargo containers. The port performing this cutting-edge work is operated by Dubai Ports World.

Yes, that's the same company that Congress thinks can't be trusted to run U.S. ports. Earlier this year, Dubai Ports World bought a British firm that operated several ports and cargo terminals in the U.S. Unfortunately for the company, the deal came during an election year when lawmakers were having chest-thumping contests to prove who was tougher on national security. Though Dubai Ports World is headquartered in the United Arab Emirates, one of this country's strongest Middle Eastern allies, the fact that the UAE is a Muslim country was apparently enough to prove to lawmakers that the deal would make U.S. ports unsafe. Dubai Ports World headed off congressional action by promising to sell its U.S. assets.

On Sunday, insurance giant American International Group agreed to buy the port operations. The lawmakers who spearheaded the xenophobic attacks on Dubai Ports World have since made a lot of self-congratulatory noises, but they have yet to explain why the Dubai company can be trusted to oversee foreign ports where cargo is screened before it's shipped to the U.S., but not ports in the U.S. itself. Nor is it clear why these U.S. port facilities are better off being owned by a financial services company.

Puerto Caucedo isn't the only Dubai Ports World facility where new security programs for U.S. cargo are performed. Last week, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced that, starting in February, six foreign ports will scan U.S.-bound cargo for nuclear materials. Of those, only three will scan 100% of U.S.-bound containers, and two of the three are operated by Dubai Ports World.

Ports all over the U.S. are facing a capacity crunch amid a flood of imports, especially from Asia. For East Coast ports — like the ones just purchased by AIG — this problem will worsen in the long run after the widening of the Panama Canal. At a time when ports need money to expand, the United States has sent a self-defeating message to foreign port operators that they aren't welcome to invest here. Three of the four biggest such companies in the world (including Dubai Ports World) are foreign owned.

DOJ_NMG_0106808

The best thing about the AIG deal is that it closes the chapter on one of the most embarrassing fits of isolationist hysteria in recent U.S. history. Unfortunately, with a pack of protectionist Democrats about to enter Congress, there could be more bouts of hysteria on the way.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pelosi Wants Panel To Oversee Spy Budget (USAT)

USA Today, December 15, 2006

House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi called Thursday for creation of a congressional panel that would oversee the administration's intelligence budget.

The California Democrat said the proposed intelligence oversight panel would be made up of lawmakers from the Appropriations Committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence, and would work within the Appropriations Committee.

Such a panel, Pelosi said, "makes oversight stronger and makes the American people safer."

Pelosi also said:

·Democratic and Republican leaders have agreed to form a bipartisan task force that will study whether an outside, independent panel on ethics should be created to police the House. Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio has agreed to the idea.

·House Democrats have six objectives they hope to accomplish in the first 100 hours after they return to work and assume control in January.

Those six: Ethics and lobbying overhaul, implementing the 9/11 Commission recommendations, raising the federal minimum wage, cutting interest rates on student loans, making health care more affordable and cutting subsidies to the oil industry.

Chertoff defends risk-assessment program

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff defended the government's computerized system for assessing international travelers as potential terrorists.

He said it is a legal effort "to make sure that we don't inconvenience the rights of most travelers" while focusing "on those people that do potentially pose a threat." Seven major U.S. and foreign travel industry associations said Wednesday that the "far-reaching and invasive screening of millions of business travelers" could harm the travel industry. Details of the 16-year-old system were made public last month.

Fund created for human rights activists

The State Department announced a $1 million emergency fund to help cover such expenses as legal fees and medical bills for human rights activists. The fund is meant to pay short-term bills for people who take great risks by defending human rights.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also redefined U.S. expectations for how groups that promote democracy and human rights will be treated around the world. People should be free to join them and the groups should be free to act within international law, the State Department said.

Pentagon wants an African command

The Pentagon is recommending to President Bush that a new U.S. military command for Africa be created, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. Commanders believe Africa's strategic importance has risen in the age of terrorism and operations there should not be split among several commands.

House Democrats Planning New Intelligence Oversight (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Responding to a recommendation from the Sept. 11 commission, the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said Thursday that House Democrats would create a new type of committee to better scrutinize spending on the nation's intelligence efforts.

The select committee, which would include the lawmakers who set intelligence policy as well as those who oversee the intelligence budget, is intended to address a central commission finding that Congressional oversight of intelligence matters was dysfunctional and needed to be more centralized. The committee will review intelligence spending requests, conduct hearings, make financing recommendations and assess how the money is spent.

The initiative is the latest indication from the Democratic leadership that it intends to be aggressive in the opening weeks of Congress, when the party coming into power may have its best opportunity to push through major changes.

DOJ_NMG_0106809

"It's with really some degree of excitement, frankly, that I make this proposal," said Ms. Pelosi, who served on both the Appropriations and Intelligence Committees. "I know it will make the American people safer."

After the Sept. 11 commission issued its report in 2004, the Republican-led Congress explored the idea of making in-house changes sought by the panel. But few were seriously pursued after lawmakers ran into the traditional resistance from senior members of Congress unwilling to surrender any authority.

The Democratic proposal, which would apply to the House only, does not go as far as the commission recommended, but one member of the panel welcomed it on Thursday as a substantive step.

"I think it is a creative, bold solution," said Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman who served on the panel and consulted with lawmakers on the new committee. "You can't point to the F.B.I. to clean up its culture and ask the C.I.A. to improve human intelligence without cleaning up your own backyard."

In another major break with House practice, Ms. Pelosi also formally announced that Democrats, with Republican cooperation, would form a task force to study ways the House could establish an independent entity to enforce House ethics rules.

"There's no question that the ethics process in the past couple of years has lost the confidence of the American people," said Ms. Pelosi, referring to a string of corruption cases that drew little response from the internal ethics panel, which has members from both parties.

Earlier this week, the leadership also announced that it would not try to complete a series of spending bills left on the table by Republicans. This would result in the unusual stalling of thousands of pet projects sought by lawmakers.

The new intelligence committee would be established through proposed changes in House rules to be presented to lawmakers when the 110th Congress convenes on Jan. 4. Under the Democratic proposal, it would consist of members of the Intelligence Committee as well as the Appropriations Committee and make recommendations to the full Appropriations Committee.

Advocates of the approach say it should provide some "cross-pollination" that will lead to lawmakers' gaining more expertise and depth of knowledge about intelligence activities, giving them a greater ability to monitor operations and suggest changes.

Ms. Pelosi said the plan "removes the barriers between the House appropriators and authorizers, makes the oversight stronger."

"What we are doing, I think, is quite remarkable and new," she said.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, was noncommittal about the intelligence plan. He said he would "take a look at her proposal and confer with my colleagues about it."

The proposal would have to be approved by the entire House. Democrats, if they are united on the plan, would be able to override even unanimous opposition from Republicans in the new Congress.

Mr. Boehner took the opportunity to take a jab at Ms. Pelosi, accusing her of backtracking on a high-profile campaign pledge to adopt all of the remaining recommendations of the commission that Republicans resisted. The commission, for instance, had proposed a new joint House-Senate intelligence panel.

But Ms. Pelosi said it would not be possible to follow all the ideas suggested and indicated that Democrats, after pushing through the new internal rules, would immediately turn to other commission recommendations.

"We'll go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores," she said.

Senate Democrats have been less enthusiastic about making such changes, but the House action could step up pressure for a new approach to intelligence matters across the Rotunda as well. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said last week that he would consult committee chairmen to see what recommendations could be enacted.

On the ethics task force, Democrats said its findings on an independent watchdog would be due March 15. Ms. Pelosi said the group should determine how such an enforcement arm might work.

Pelosi Announces Intelligence Plans (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, December 15, 2006

Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi on Thursday recommended creating a House panel to closely examine U.S. spy agencies' actions and spending, a step toward adopting all the proposals of the anti-terror Sept. 11 commission.

Pelosi, D-Calif., said the panel would "protect the American people with the best possible intelligence, recognizing the role that Congress plays in all of this."

It also would shake up long-standing power structures in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0106810

The Select Intelligence Oversight Panel would be part of the powerful Appropriations Committee and would draw its membership from that spending committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Through a series of hearings, it would examine the president's intelligence budget, prepare the classified details to the annual defense spending bill and conduct oversight of the use of appropriated funds by intelligence agencies.

Pelosi's proposal does not follow the exact recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. But it moves closer to the overhaul recommended two years ago when the commission found weaknesses in how Congress monitors the 16 intelligence agencies.

A Democratic member of the Sept. 11 commission — former Rep. Timothy Roemer of Indiana — said the change would achieve the commission's two major goals: forcing spy agencies to disclose more to Congress, which they often have ignored, and linking the expanded oversight to the power of the purse.

"This is a major step forward in terms of correcting some of the dysfunction on Capitol Hill," Roemer said.

The commission's Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean, said Pelosi's plan was a helpful step. But, he added, "It depends very much who the chairman is and who the members are."

Yet Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, who will lead House Republicans next year, was lukewarm about the proposal. "I appreciate the incoming speaker's efforts to reach out to Republicans in hopes of continuing to improve congressional oversight of America's intelligence systems," Boehner said in a statement.

The full House will have to approve Pelosi's proposal. It was one of six she outlined Thursday as her priorities for the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January.

The others are ethics and lobbying overhaul; raising the federal minimum wage; cutting interest rates on student loans; making health care more affordable; and cutting subsidies to the oil industry.

It also is not clear if the Senate would create a similar intelligence committee, which would be needed to avoid awkwardness as the two chambers work together on intelligence spending bills.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and other senators are reviewing Pelosi's proposal in the context of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, said his spokesman, Jim Manley.

U.S. intelligence agencies will continue to work closely with Congress, should it create the new panels, said Ross Feinstein, a spokesman for National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

In late 2004, the Republican-controlled Congress put in place many post-Sept. 11 changes with a law that created a national intelligence director and other changes. Some of the most vexing recommendations were put aside.

Pelosi has pledged to improve on Republican efforts.

"We'll go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores," Pelosi said.

Less than 10 percent of cargo containers arriving at seaports are physically inspected. The Bush administration has said other security measures will permit officials to screen 100 percent of incoming containers — by checking each container's origin, destination and purported contents to see whether anything raises suspicions.

"By the end of next year, we expect to have virtually all containers coming into the U.S. screened through radiation portal monitors," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday.

The potency of Pelosi's proposed overhaul will not be known until the Democrats go public with their legislation next year. For now, Pelosi is looking internally at how Congress will do its work.

The classified nature of intelligence spending creates risks that improper spending will go undetected. That became apparent this year when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was convicted of taking bribes in return for using classified legislation to steer government contracts to favored companies. Cunningham was a member of both the intelligence and appropriations committees.

In 2004, the Sept. 11 commission found widespread dissatisfaction with the way Congress oversees spy agencies, saying the current committee structure lacked the muscle to reign in spending.

The commission suggested two alternatives: form a joint House and Senate intelligence committee or create committees in each chamber that conduct the oversight and allocate money for the spy agencies.

Tweaking the second option, Pelosi would create an intelligence oversight subcommittee within the Appropriations Committee, rather than establishing a new stand-alone panel.

The success of her plan depends on her colleagues, some of whom would have to cede more control to Pelosi's new panel.

"Few things are more difficult to change in Washington than congressional committee jurisdictions and prerogatives," the Sept. 11 commission wrote. "To a member, these assignments are almost as important as the map of his or her congressional district."

DOJ_NMG_0106811

New Panel To Check Intelligence Budgets (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi yesterday said intelligence budgets would get an extra layer of congressional oversight, giving Democrats opportunity to curb the scope of some of President Bush's programs.

Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats will create a select intelligence oversight panel that will function within the House Appropriations Committee.

The panel will be responsible for crafting the classified portion of the Defense Department's budget and will allow the lawmakers who authorize spy programs to have an additional role in funding them.

The California Democrat promised that the panel will hold hearings on the president's intelligence budget, which includes funding for the CIA and National Security Agency.

The Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence now is the only panel that handles intelligence policy, and funds are allocated through the Appropriations defense subcommittee. Democrats propose bridging the two committees, creating a separate panel with a few members from each.

"I know it will make the American people safer," Mrs. Pelosi said.

The new panel, for example, could adjust funding for the NSA's wiretapping program, which many Democrats oppose, and oversee intelligence agencies' use of the funds.

The bipartisan National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States said oversight would have helped avoid many of the intelligence failures leading up to the September 11 attacks.

It also called the intelligence agencies "too complex and secret," and lamented a shortage of oversight.

"Even the most basic information about how much money is actually allocated to or within the intelligence community, and most of its key components is shrouded from public view," the September 11 commission's report said.

Mrs. Pelosi, who has served on both the intelligence and appropriations panels, has long advocated transparency in intelligence agencies.

A Republican appropriations aide, however, said the intelligence budgets must remain secret to prevent enemies from becoming aware of U.S. spy programs.

A transparent budget could signal to enemies, for example, large procurements such as satellite systems. The aide said "one or two" appropriations staffers now have "need-to-know" access.

September 11 commission member John F. Lehman, a Republican former Navy secretary, said the plan to eliminate disconnect seems to be "a very good move in the right direction."

Former Rep. Timothy J. Roemer, an Indiana Democrat who served on the September 11 commission, said the idea is "creative" and "a major step forward" to meeting the panel's goals.

Incoming House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said he is analyzing and discussing Mrs. Pelosi's plan with his colleagues.

Mr. Boehner will recommend which Republican members will serve on the panel, but Mrs. Pelosi has final appointment power. The chairmen and ranking members of both the full Appropriations Committee and the defense subcommittee will serve as ex-officio members of the new panel.

Pelosi Looks To Boost Oversight Of Intelligence And Ethics (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi announced yesterday that she will create a new panel within the Appropriations Committee to oversee the nation's intelligence agencies and a House task force to examine establishing an outside ethics panel.

The twin moves demonstrated the delicate balance that Pelosi (D-Calif.) is trying to strike to maintain her political power while fulfilling the promises of the Democrats' successful 2006 campaign. Both decisions fall short of recommendations coming from the bipartisan commission that examined the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and from ethics groups. But they go well beyond what Republicans were willing to do while they controlled Congress and beyond even what some Democrats were anticipating in recent weeks.

"I think it's a significant step forward on improving oversight and a major step forward on correcting the dysfunction on Capitol Hill," former congressman Timothy J. Roemer (D-Ind.), a member of the Sept. 11 commission, said of the intelligence plan.

DOJ_NMG_0106812

In 2004, the commission urged Congress either to create a House-Senate intelligence panel or grant the House and Senate intelligence committees the power not only to oversee the nation's intelligence agencies but also to fund them and shape intelligence policy. The intelligence committees' gains would come at the expense of the Armed Services committees and the Appropriations panels' defense subcommittees, which now control intelligence spending. But, the commissioners said, intelligence agencies were routinely ignoring the intelligence committees because those panels did not have the power of the purse.

Appropriators, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally and the incoming chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, strongly objected to any efforts to strip them of jurisdiction over the intelligence budget. Democratic sources on the Appropriations, intelligence and Armed Services committees said last month that Pelosi was leaning toward establishing a panel to examine options for reorganizing the House along the lines suggested by the Sept. 11 commission.

But news reports on the issue emboldened commissioners and families of Sept. 11 victims to renew their push for stronger congressional oversight on intelligence. So Pelosi found a middle ground: Members of her intelligence oversight panel would come from both the intelligence and Appropriations committees, and would have the tasks of overseeing the intelligence agencies and drafting their budgets. Those budgets, however, would be folded into the larger annual defense spending bill, which would still be under the jurisdiction of Murtha's subcommittee and the larger House Appropriations Committee.

The plan "removes the barriers between the House appropriators and authorizers, makes the oversight stronger and makes the American people safer," Pelosi said.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) would not promise to follow suit.

"We will work with key senators to carefully examine the House proposal as part of our larger discussion about the best ways to ensure implementation of the spirit and letter of the 9/11 commission's recommendations," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Similarly, proposals to establish an outside panel of experts to examine ethics complaints have met staunch opposition from ethics committee members, who say they should be expected to do their job. Rep. Martin T. Meehan (Mass.), one of the Democrats' point men on the ethics package that will come to a vote in January, said last week that an outside panel would not be part of the initial wave of ethics rules but could come up later.

Pelosi put some weight behind that yesterday, saying she and Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the incoming House minority leader, would create a panel to report back by late March on an outside panel.

Joan Claybrook, president of the watchdog group Public Citizen, said she is sympathetic to the internal politics involved. But she added that the panel "worries me enormously," saying "I think they ought to bite the bullet" and create an independent Office of Public Integrity now.

Aides close to Pelosi said that by creating such an investigatory panel, she is all but ensuring she will push for an outside group, possibly of former House members and judges, to examine ethics complaints and watch over ethics committee efforts.

Democratic leaders circulated their proposed rules changes yesterday ahead of a conference call with House Democrats. They include a ban on gifts and travel from lobbyists, preapproval from the ethics committee on all lawmakers' travel funded by outside groups, a ban on the use of corporate jets, and mandatory ethics training. Under the rules package, Republicans would be guaranteed some votes on amendments. Members would be given extra time to read bills before a vote is scheduled, and votes could no longer be held open indefinitely while House leaders twist arms to win passage.

House-Senate negotiating conferences would be opened somewhat, and provisions could no longer be sneaked into final agreements after the negotiations are closed.

On budget matters, rules would be reinstated saying tax cuts or spending increases would have to be offset by tax hikes or spending cuts to ensure the deficit does not expand. Special parliamentary rules that prohibit filibusters in the Senate could no longer be used on legislation that expands the budget deficit, a slap at Republicans who used such rules to pass successive waves of large tax cuts. And home-district pet projects, known as earmarks, would have to be claimed by their sponsors, who would have to certify that the earmarks would not benefit them or their spouses.

Pelosi Wants New House Committee To Oversee Spy Spending (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The AP, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi on Thursday recommended creating a House panel to closely examine U.S. spy agencies' actions and spending, a step toward adopting all the proposals of the anti-terror Sept. 11 commission.

Pelosi, D-Calif., said the panel would "protect the American people with the best possible intelligence, recognizing the role that Congress plays in all of this."

It also would shake up long-standing power structures in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0106813

The Select Intelligence Oversight Panel would be part of the powerful Appropriations Committee and would draw its membership from that spending committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Through a series of hearings, it would examine the president's intelligence budget, prepare the classified details to the annual defense spending bill and conduct oversight of the use of appropriated funds by intelligence agencies.

Pelosi's proposal does not follow the exact recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. But it moves closer to the overhaul recommended two years ago when the commission found weaknesses in how Congress monitors the 16 intelligence agencies.

A Democratic member of the Sept. 11 commission -- former Rep. Timothy Roemer of Indiana -- said the change would achieve the commission's two major goals: forcing spy agencies to disclose more to Congress, which they often have ignored, and linking the expanded oversight to the power of the purse.

"This is a major step forward in terms of correcting some of the dysfunction on Capitol Hill," Roemer said.

The commission's Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean, said Pelosi's plan was a helpful step. But, he added, "It depends very much who the chairman is and who the members are."

Yet Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, who will lead House Republicans next year, was lukewarm about the proposal. "I appreciate the incoming speaker's efforts to reach out to Republicans in hopes of continuing to improve congressional oversight of America's intelligence systems," Boehner said in a statement.

The full House will have to approve Pelosi's proposal. It was one of six she outlined Thursday as her priorities for the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January.

The others are ethics and lobbying overhaul; raising the federal minimum wage; cutting interest rates on student loans; making health care more affordable; and cutting subsidies to the oil industry.

It also is not clear if the Senate would create a similar intelligence committee, which would be needed to avoid awkwardness as the two chambers work together on intelligence spending bills.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and other senators are reviewing Pelosi's proposal in the context of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations, said his spokesman, Jim Manley.

In late 2004, the Republican-controlled Congress put in place many post-Sept. 11 changes with a law that created a national intelligence director and other changes. Some of the most vexing recommendations were put aside.

Pelosi has pledged to improve on Republican efforts.

"We'll go them one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores," Pelosi said.

Less than 10 percent of cargo containers arriving at seaports are physically inspected. The Bush administration has said other security measures will permit officials to screen 100 percent of incoming containers -- by checking each container's origin, destination and purported contents to see whether anything raises suspicions.

"By the end of next year, we expect to have virtually all containers coming into the U.S. screened through radiation portal monitors," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday.

The potency of Pelosi's proposed overhaul will not be known until the Democrats go public with their legislation next year. For now, Pelosi is looking internally at how Congress will do its work.

The classified nature of intelligence spending creates risks that improper spending will go undetected. That became apparent this year when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was convicted of taking bribes in return for using classified legislation to steer government contracts to favored companies. Cunningham was a member of both the intelligence and appropriations committees.

In 2004, the Sept. 11 commission found widespread dissatisfaction with the way Congress oversees spy agencies, saying the current committee structure lacked the muscle to reign in spending.

The commission suggested two alternatives: form a joint House and Senate intelligence committee or create committees in each chamber that conduct the oversight and allocate money for the spy agencies.

Tweaking the second option, Pelosi would create an intelligence oversight subcommittee within the Appropriations Committee, rather than establishing a new stand-alone panel.

The success of her plan depends on her colleagues, some of whom would have to cede more control to Pelosi's new panel.

"Few things are more difficult to change in Washington than congressional committee jurisdictions and prerogatives," the Sept. 11 commission wrote. "To a member, these assignments are almost as important as the map of his or her congressional district."

Homeland Security Chief Defends Real ID Plan (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET News.com, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON--U.S. Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Thursday defended forthcoming national ID cards as vital for security and consistent with privacy rights.

Chertoff said one of his agency's top goals next year is to forge ahead with recommendations for the controversial documents established by a federal law called the Real ID Act in May 2005. By 2008, Americans may be required to present such federally approved cards--which must be electronically readable--to travel on an airplane, open a bank account or take advantage of myriad government services such as Social Security.

Credit: DHS Michael Chertoff

"I think this is an example (of) when security and privacy go hand in hand," the Homeland Security chief said in a half-hour speech at George Washington University here. "It is a win-win for both."

The importance of such documents was magnified by an announcement Wednesday, Chertoff said. Federal authorities reported that they had made more than 1,200 arrests related to immigration violations and unmasked criminal organizations stealing and trafficking in genuine birth certificates and Social Security cards belonging to U.S. citizens.

"Do you think your privacy is better protected if someone can walk around with phony docs with your name and your Social Security number, or is your privacy better protected if you have the confidence that the identification relied upon is in fact reliable and uniquely tied to a single individual?" Chertoff asked rhetorically.

The upcoming federally approved IDs are intended to be a secure, tamperproof means of protecting Americans' identities while keeping out terrorists and other wrongdoers, Chertoff said.

The Homeland Security chief, who is nearing his two-year mark with the agency, was likely trying to quell rampant skepticism about the IDs voiced by some privacy advocates, immigrants and other groups. Some have said they fear that the IDs are a stepping stone to a veritable police state, complete with ready surveillance of individuals.

Some have argued that the idea of creating more tamperproof IDs is only a marginally better way to screen out those intent on committing terrorist acts because ID cards don't even begin to tackle a core crime prevention challenge: determining a person's unspoken intentions.

State governments have also been critical of the 2008 deadline and what they have said amounts to an unfunded mandate to switch over their systems. A September study released by the National Governors Association, National Conference of State Legislatures and American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators estimated that the overhaul of their identification systems (PDF) would cost states more than $11 billion over five years. The New Hampshire state legislature even considered passing a law earlier this year that would prohibit the state from complying with the federal Real ID law.

Government Proposes Rail Security Plan (AP)

By Leslie Miller

AP, December 15, 2006

A government proposal to prevent terrorists from attacking trains would require railroads to inspect rail cars and keep them in secure areas when not in use.

The plan, to be announced Friday, would affect freight and passenger rail systems.

The Homeland Security Department's proposal falls short of the more stringent measures proposed by Democratic lawmakers who are set to take control of Congress next month.

The incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee indicated Congress may impose stricter requirements than those proposed by the Bush administration.

"I am not convinced that all of the security gaps plaguing our current hazmat transport system will be filled by this proposal," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss.

A major concern is that terrorists would attack or sabotage a rail car filled with poisonous chemicals, which would spread quickly and kill thousands.

The proposal would give the Transportation Security Administration authority to inspect railroads, rail yards and mass transit rail systems, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press from a person involved in the rulemaking process.

The 708 railroads affected would have to designate a rail security coordinator to receive intelligence from the government, and would have to report significant security concerns and potential threats.

The proposal also would require receivers of hazardous materials to keep the rail car in a secure area until it is unloaded. Freight railroads would have to report the location of a rail car when requested by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0106815

The plan does not match what at least nine cities have proposed — rerouting around densely populated areas trains that are carrying hazardous material.

The District of Columbia passed a law in 2005 banning hazardous material shipments within 2.2 miles of the Capitol. CSX Transportation sued; the case is pending.

"The only significant risk reduction is rerouting," said Fred Millar, a consultant to the city council in the nation's capital. "Anything short of rerouting isn't serious."

The rail industry fears that other cities would follow Washington's lead if the city prevails. Eight other cities have introduced legislation to ban hazardous shipments.

Railroads say forcing trains to take longer, circuitous routes would create a safety hazard by increasing the likelihood of an accident.

The Federal Railroad Administration has met with freight railroads in an effort to come up with voluntary efforts to secure hazardous materials.

TSA chief Kip Hawley previously was a senior executive with Union Pacific.

The eight cities that introduced legislation to require trains carrying hazardous material be rerouted around them, according to Millar, are Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Albany and Buffalo, N.Y., Cleveland, Baltimore and St. Louis.

Tighter Rule On Hazardous Rail Cargo Is Ready (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Seeking to make rail shipments of chlorine and other hazardous chemicals less vulnerable to attack, the Homeland Security Department intends to announce a proposed rule on Friday to require railroads to track continuously tanker cars of "toxic inhalation hazards" and bar them from leaving the cars unattended or parked for long periods.

The proposal would also clarify how government workers inspect tank cars and railyards for compliance, establish rules on the chain of custody and handoff of dangerous cargoes and set communications requirements.

Each year, the railroads carry 1.7 million shipments of hazardous materials, of which 100,000 are toxic chemicals prone to become airborne in an accident. About 80 percent of the shipments that can become poison gases are chlorine, for purifying water and other applications, or anhydrous ammonia, for fertilizer.

An official of the Homeland Security Department provided details of the plan on the condition that he not be identified further, because it has not been published. The plan is to be open for public comment for 60 days.

Among other changes, each railroad would have to have a round-the-clock security coordinator to receive tips on threats to cargoes and immediately inform the government of details like the location of cargo.

Many high-hazard cargoes move through densely populated areas, and some cities would like to ban them. The District of Columbia adopted an ordinance in February 2005 that requires permits for "ultra-hazardous materials," including explosives, flammable liquids like liquefied petroleum gas, toxic solids and toxic gases, from an area extending 2.2 miles from the Capitol.

CSX, which operates a stretch of tracks between the Federal buildings just south of the Mall, challenged the ordinance in court as unduly burdensome to interstate commerce. Enforcement has been blocked while the case works its way through the federal courts.

Fred Millar, a consultant to the City Council who drafted the ordinance, said eight cities were weighing similar rules: Albany, Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Philadelphia and St. Louis.

The new rule would not address routes. Such rules would be sensible, Mr. Millar said, but railroads did not like them because they might be forced to give business to one another.

Officials say that the Transportation Department is considering rules on routes that could be published soon.

The domestic security proposal is that carriers would have to establish security zones around affected rail cars parked, loaded or unloaded in urban areas.

More than five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, few federal rules specifically try to prevent terrorists from attacking materials on the rails. Train crews carry manifests showing what they carry and where, and placards on tank cars identify the contents.

The coded placards identify the contents to emergency responders and anybody else with a readily available emergency response handbook.

U.S. Is Dropping Effort To Track If Visitors Leave (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns And Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106816

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — In a major blow to the Bush administration's efforts to secure borders, domestic security officials have for now given up on plans to develop a facial or fingerprint recognition system to determine whether a vast majority of foreign visitors leave the country, officials say.

Domestic security officials had described the system, known as U.S. Visit, as critical to security and important in efforts to curb illegal immigration. Similarly, one-third of the overall total of illegal immigrants are believed to have overstayed their visas, a Congressional report says.

Tracking visitors took on particular urgency after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, when it became clear that some of the hijackers had remained in the country after their visas had expired.

But in recent days, officials at the Homeland Security Department have conceded that they lack the financing and technology to meet their deadline to have exit-monitoring systems at the 50 busiest land border crossings by next December. A vast majority of foreign visitors enter and exit by land from Mexico and Canada, and the policy shift means that officials will remain unable to track the departures.

A report released on Thursday by the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, restated those findings, reporting that the administration believes that it will take 5 to 10 years to develop technology that might allow for a cost-effective departure system.

Domestic security officials, who have allocated $1.7 billion since the 2003 fiscal year to track arrivals and departures, argue that creating the program with the existing technology would be prohibitively expensive.

They say it would require additional employees, new buildings and roads at border crossings, and would probably hamper the vital flow of commerce across those borders.

Congress ordered the creation of such a system in 1996.

In an interview last week, the assistant secretary for homeland security policy, Stewart A. Baker, estimated that an exit system at the land borders would cost "tens of billions of dollars" and said the department had concluded that such a program was not feasible, at least for the time being.

"It is a pretty daunting set of costs, both for the U.S. government and the economy," Mr. Stewart said. "Congress has said, 'We want you to do it.' We are not going to ignore what Congress has said. But the costs here are daunting.

"There are a lot of good ideas and things that would make the country safer. But when you have to sit down and compare all the good ideas people have developed against each other, with a limited budget, you have to make choices that are much harder."

The news sent alarms to Congress, where some Republicans and Democrats warned that suspending the monitoring plan would leave the United States vulnerable.

Representative Dana Rohrabacher, a California Republican who is a departing subcommittee chairman on the House International Relations Committee, said the administration could not say it was protecting domestic security without creating a viable exit monitoring system.

"There will not be border security in this country until we have a knowledge of both entry and exit," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "We have to make a choice. Do we want to act and control our borders or do we want to have tens of millions of illegals continuing to pour into our country?"

Representative Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who is set to lead the Homeland Security Committee, also expressed concern.

"It is imperative that Congress work in partnership with the department to develop a comprehensive border security system that ensures we know who is entering and exiting this country and one that cannot be defeated by imposters, criminals and terrorists," Mr. Thompson said in a statement Thursday.

In January 2004, domestic security officials began fingerprint scanning for arriving visitors. The program has screened more than 64 million travelers and prevented more than 1,300 criminals and immigration violators from entering, officials said.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other officials often call the program a singular achievement in making the country safer. U.S. Visit fingerprints and photographs 2 percent of the people entering the country, because Americans and most Canadians and Mexicans are exempt.

Efforts to determine whether visitors actually leave have faltered. Departure monitoring would help officials hunt for foreigners who have not left, if necessary. Domestic security officials say, however, it would be too expensive to conduct fingerprint or facial recognition scans for land departures. Officials have experimented with less costly technologies, including a system that would monitor by radio data embedded in a travel form carried by foreigners as they depart by foot or in vehicles.

Tests of that technology, Radio Frequency Identification, found a high failure rate. At one border point, the system correctly identified 14 percent of the 166 vehicles carrying the embedded documents, the General Accountability Office reported.

DOJ_NMG_0106817

The Congressional investigators noted the "numerous performance and reliability problems" with the technology and said it remained unclear how domestic security officials would be able to meet their legal obligation to create an exit program.

Some immigration analysts said stepping away from the program raised questions again about the commitment to enforce border security and immigration laws.

A senior policy analyst at the Center for Immigration Studies, Jessica Vaughn, said the government had long been too deferential to big businesses and travel groups that raised concerns that exit technology might disrupt travel and trade.

"I worry that the issue of cost is an excuse for not doing anything," said Ms. Vaughn, whose group advocates curbing immigration. Domestic security officials said they still hoped to find a way to create an exit system at land borders. "We would to do more testing," a spokesman for the department, Jarrod Agen, said. "We are evaluating the initial tests to determine how to move forward."

U.S. Preparing To Drop Tracking Of Foreigners' Departures By Land (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

U.S. homeland security officials are preparing to abandon plans to develop a system to track the departure of foreign visitors at land borders, citing cost and technical obstacles in scaling back a major post-Sept. 11 domestic security initiative, officials said.

Launched in 2004, US-VISIT was designed to automate the tracking of visitors upon entry and exit from the United States, using fingerprints and digital photographs to help find criminals, potential terrorists and visitors who illegally overstay.

The system, which has cost $1.7 billion so far, recorded 61 million people entering the country as of July through 115 airports, 15 seaports and 154 of 170 land ports.

But pilot projects have recorded only about 4 million people leaving the country, and US-VISIT officials have concluded that technology and personnel "cannot now be implemented" at land crossings without major delays in the flow of cross-border traffic, or without enormous cost to expand facilities, roads and communications links, according to a congressional report released yesterday.

"The department is looking at strategies for US-VISIT exit that are the most cost effective, and we are examining strategies for implementation at air and sea ports," said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security. "We are also looking at land ports. However, there are costs associated, including the physical infrastructure as well as the economic impact, and we are in the process of evaluating all that data now."

Several homeland security officials said a final decision has yet to be made, but that, given the limited time and resources, the department intends to focus on expanding US-VISIT at airports, where the majority of visa holders exit the country. Although land ports register about 309 million border crossings a year, compared with 87 million airport crossings, the majority of land crossers are repeat travelers and Mexican, Canadian and U.S. citizens who do not need visas.

"It comes down to, we have to get at this elephant in chunks," one senior official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because a formal decision has not been announced. "It's a recognition that over the short term, over the next couple of years, you can't do an exit system, holistically, land borders and air. Which one do you get more bang for your buck? It's air."

In comments reported by the New York Times and confirmed by Agen, DHS assistant secretary for policy Stewart A. Baker said a land-border exit system would cost "tens of billions of dollars," which he called daunting.

A report by the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm, said it would cost $3 billion and take five to 10 years to implement a biometric system to confirm visitors' identities upon exit. But there is a December 2007 deadline for phasing it in at 50 major land crossings.

US-VISIT has captured 1,100 criminals using false documents, DHS officials said. They said other programs underway to integrate homeland security and FBI fingerprint databases -- which automatically generate risk assessments on travelers and track down immigration violators -- are offsetting the potential value of an exit system.

"Knowing that bad guys have left the country is important, but knowing the bad guy is coming in is more important," one DHS official said. "We want to do it, but it is not as high a priority as the entry piece of it."

The United States is testing the use of radio frequency identification technology -- involving tiny microchips with a unique code embedded in a tag on visitors' departure forms -- instead of a fingerprint or facial-scan system. But a January 2006 test correctly identified only 16 percent of 166 vehicles with RFID tags. Among the tags' drawbacks is that they cannot be physically tied to an individual.

GAO Finds Homeland Security Tech Issues (HC/AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia Ap Business Writer, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0106818

Houston Chronicle, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Department of Homeland Security system that uses biometric technology to screen people entering the country has aided border patrol agents, but computer snafus and management shortfalls need to be resolved, according to a report issued Thursday.

Government Accountability Office investigators visited 21 border crossings and officials at every one said the U.S. Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, which uses two fingerprints and a digital photograph to identify people, had improved their ability to process visitors and verify identities, according to the GAO report.

But U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials at 12 of the 21 sites said "computer slowdowns and freezes" hindered visitor processing and inspection times. At nine of those 12, "computer processing problems were not always reported to CBP's computer help desk, as required by CBP guidelines," according to the report.

"These computer processing problems have the potential to not only inconvenience travelers because of the increased time needed to complete the inspection process, but to compromise security, particularly if CBP officers are unable to perform biometric checks, one of the critical reasons US-VISIT was installed," according to the report.

Bermuda-based Accenture Ltd., a management and technology consulting company, is the prime contractor for US-VISIT, and works on the program with Raytheon Co., SRA International Inc. and Titan Corp., part of L3 Communications Holdings Inc.

GAO recommended that DHS improve existing management controls for the system and develop performance measures to assess its impact at border crossings. The government watchdog agency also said DHS should describe how it will move to a biometric entry/exit capability and align US-VISIT with other border security systems being developed.

In a written response, DHS officials said the computer problems are resolved, a preliminary monitoring system was established, and a working group was set up to determine how to provide detailed monitoring of all applications.

Of more than 70 million visitors processed through US-VISIT since its inception nearly three years ago, more than 1,600 criminals or immigration violators have been denied entry, Robert Mocny, the program's acting director, said late last month. US-VISIT is in place at 116 airports, 15 seaports and 154 land ports of entry.

The GAO also found that DHS's plans to upgrade US-VISIT to collecting all 10 fingerprints may aid border security, but could increase processing times and adversely affect operations where space constraints, congestion and delays already exist.

Accenture is working on moving to the 10-fingerprint system that is becoming the worldwide standard, Mocny said. A company representative did not immediately return a call for comment Thursday afternoon.

DHS received $362 million for US-VISIT in the 2007 budget, $60 million of which is to upgrade to the 10-fingerprint system. Since 2004, the program has received more than $1 billion.

Shares of Accenture added 28 cents to $34.99 in afternoon trading, while Raytheon rose 17 cents to $52.42, SRA International dipped 15 centss at $27.30, and L3 Communications rose $1.91, or 2.3 percent, to $83.94, all on the New York Stock Exchange.

Travel Industry Groups Oppose Risk Tests (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP, December 15, 2006

Eight major U.S., Canadian and European travel industry associations urged the government to suspend a computerized system for assessing international travelers as potential terrorists.

"We are deeply concerned that such a far-reaching and invasive screening of millions of business travelers entering and exiting the U.S. could do significant personal harm to them, and reduce the productivity of the organizations that field business travelers," the organizations wrote Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Wednesday.

In a speech Thursday, Chertoff defended the program as a legal effort "to make sure that we don't inconvenience the rights of most travelers so that we can focus more sensibly and in a more risk-managed fashion on those people that do potentially pose a threat."

The travel groups join some members of Congress and privacy advocates in criticizing the system, which The Associated Press disclosed last month has assigned risk assessments to millions of Americans and foreigners entering and leaving this country over the past four years.

In November, the Homeland Security Department slipped its first detailed public description of the program, which has operated since the late 1990s, into the Federal Register, a fine-print compendium of regulations. It said that travelers could not see their assessments to challenge them, the assessments would be kept 40 years and might be shared with state, local and foreign governments and even courts and private corporations under some circumstances.

The letter was circulated by the U.S.-based Business Travel Coalition, which lobbies for the interests of business travelers.

DOJ_NMG_0106819

Other signers included the Institute of Travel Management and the Guild of Travel Management Companies in Great Britain; the International Association of Exhibitions and Events and the Travel Management Alliance in the United States; the Association of Retail Travel Agents and Association of Canadian Travel Agencies in Canada; and the Netherlands Association for Travel Management. Twenty-four other corporate travel buyers and travel management companies here and abroad also signed the letter.

A Gag On Free Speech (NYT)

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

The Bush administration is trampling on the First Amendment and well-established criminal law by trying to use a subpoena to force the American Civil Liberties Union to hand over a classified document in its possession. The dispute is shrouded in secrecy, and very little has been made public about the document, but we do not need to know what's in it to know what's at stake: if the government prevails, it will have engaged in prior restraint — almost always a serious infringement on free speech — and it could start using subpoenas to block reporting on matters of vital public concern.

Justice Department lawyers have issued a grand jury subpoena to the A.C.L.U. demanding that it hand over "any and all copies" of the three-and-a-half-page government document, which was recently leaked to the group. The A.C.L.U. is asking a Federal District Court judge in Manhattan to quash the subpoena.

There are at least two serious problems with the government's action. It goes far beyond what the law recognizes as the legitimate purpose of a subpoena. Subpoenas are supposed to assist an investigation, but the government does not need access to the A.C.L.U.'s document for an investigation since it already has its own copy. It is instead trying to confiscate every available copy of the document to keep its contents secret. The A.C.L.U. says it knows of no other case in which a grand jury subpoena has been used this way.

The subpoena is also a prior restraint because the government is trying to stop the A.C.L.U. in advance from speaking about the document's contents. The Supreme Court has held that prior restraints are almost always unconstitutional. The danger is too great that the government will overreach and use them to ban protected speech or interfere with free expression by forcing the media, and other speakers, to wait for their words to be cleared in advance. The correct way to deal with speech is to evaluate its legality after it has occurred.

The Supreme Court affirmed these vital principles in the Pentagon Papers case, when it rejected the Nixon administration's attempts to stop The Times and The Washington Post from publishing government documents that reflected badly on its prosecution of the Vietnam War. If the Nixon administration had been able to use the technique that the Bush administration is trying now, it could have blocked publication simply by ordering the newspapers to hand over every copy they had of the papers.

If the A.C.L.U.'s description of its secret document is correct, there is no legitimate national defense issue. The document does not contain anything like intelligence sources or troop movements, the group says. It is merely a general statement of policy whose release "might perhaps be mildly embarrassing to the government." Given this administration's abysmal record on these issues, this case could set a disturbing and dangerous precedent. If the subpoena is enforced, the administration will have gained a powerful new tool for rolling back free-speech rights — one that could be used to deprive Americans of information they need to make informed judgments about their elected leaders' policies and actions.

Pentagon Papers Revisited (WP)

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

NO ADMINISTRATION likes leaks. But not since the Nixon administration has the government so aggressively sought to crack down -- not just on leakers, but on reporters and others who obtain leaked material. In the latest manifestation of its disregard for First Amendment principles, the administration has used -- misused, to be more precise -- a grand jury subpoena to retrieve "any and all copies" of a document, marked "secret," obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU's request that a federal judge quash the subpoena should be granted.

The grand jury is an important tool for prosecutors to investigate wrongdoing -- not a vacuum cleaner for material the government wishes hadn't gotten out. The government is seeking to abuse the grand jury process to do an end run around the constitutional prohibition against prior restraint enshrined in the Pentagon Papers case. In that 1971 ruling, the government wanted to stop the New York Times and The Post from publishing classified documents about the Vietnam War; the Supreme Court said no. What if the government, instead of suing to block publication, had simply issued a grand jury subpoena demanding that the newspapers return the Pentagon Papers? If the ACLU, which advocates and litigates on issues of public policy, can be forced to comply with such a subpoena, news organizations would be similarly at risk.

Why would that be so terrible? Because even in a time of war -- in fact, especially in a time of war -- vigorous public debate about controversial policies is essential. An uninformed public can't conduct such a debate, whether the topic is the CIA's secret prisons or the warrantless surveillance of telephone calls. As Justice Potter Stewart wrote in concurring with the Pentagon Papers ruling, "In the absence of the governmental checks and balances present in other areas of our national life, the only effective restraint upon executive policy and power in the areas of national defense and international affairs may lie in an enlightened citizenry -- in an informed and critical public opinion which alone can here protect the values of democratic government."

DOJ_NMG_0106820

The government's aggressive -- the ACLU says unprecedented -- use of the subpoena power is especially disturbing because it appears so excessive under the circumstances. According to the ACLU, the 3 1/2 -page document, which came to it unsolicited, outlines "a set of general policy guidelines on a matter of longstanding concern to the ACLU." Its release "might perhaps be mildly embarrassing to the government but the document contains no information concerning matters such as troop movements, communications methods, intelligence sources or the like," the ACLU said. This does not appear to be a document so sensitive that its disclosure would inflict serious damage on national security. In addition, the government, to the extent that it has a legitimate interest in punishing leakers, apparently already knows who leaked it and to whom.

This subpoena, as the ACLU argues, has no "investigatory purpose" but only a "confiscatory, information-suppressive one." That might be in the Bush administration's interest. It's not in the public's.

When Disaster Strikes (WP)

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

IMAGINE THAT a terrorist introduces the plague into downtown Washington, or that a nasty strain of bird flu flies in from Southeast Asia. How well is the region prepared to cope with thousands of casualties and prevent the spread of lethal contagions? Not very, according to a report from the Trust for America's Health, a private watchdog group that rated every state and the District on readiness to respond to a public health crisis.

The report ranked the District and Maryland near the bottom. Maryland, for example, would suffer a chronic shortage of hospital beds in the event of even a moderate pandemic. The District lags in demonstrating that it has the organization to quickly distribute medicine and equipment to communities throughout the city during a health emergency. In all, Maryland satisfied only four of 10 measurements of preparedness, and the District met only five.

Gregg A. Pane, director of the D.C. Health Department, says that the report gives a misleading picture of regional preparation; he notes that the city and its public health professionals have a great deal more experience planning for and responding to crises than other places in the country do. Mr. Pane is right that the measures used do not capture the whole picture. But he admits that there is room for improvement: Better organizing distribution of the pneumonia vaccine and other inoculations, for example, would enhance the city's ability to dispense critical medication during an emergency.

One way to boost the region's disaster preparedness depends on the new Congress, which should fund the ER One project -- a proposal that languished during the recent lame-duck session. The proposed revamp of Washington Hospital Center, which is the busiest acute-care center in the region, would not only vastly increase the region's bed capacity -- coveted real estate during a disaster -- but also provide special emergency training for doctors, nurses and first responders, and increase diagnostic lab space. Its backers plan many other innovations for the facility, which could serve as a model of emergency planning for the rest of the country.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Weighing Deeper Commitment In Iraq, Officials Say (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush is weighing whether to make a deeper American commitment in Iraq despite growing public unhappiness with the war, according to senior U.S. officials and former officials familiar with Bush's high-level review.

The proposed changes, with a few exceptions, conflict with the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which warned earlier this month against an open-ended commitment to Iraq and said American combat brigades could be out of Iraq by early 2008.

The president signaled Wednesday that neither the study group's pessimistic assessment nor the bleak situation in Iraq nor the results of the midterm elections have shaken his belief that victory in Iraq is possible.

"We're not going to give up," said Bush, who plans to announce his new strategy early next year.

While some key decisions haven't been made yet, the senior officials said the emerging strategy includes:

DOJ_NMG_0106821

-A shift in the primary U.S. military mission in Iraq from combat to training an expanded Iraqi army, generally in line with the Iraq Study Group's recommendations.

-A possible short-term surge of as many as 40,000 more American troops to try to secure Baghdad, along with a permanent increase in the size of the U.S. Army and the Marine Corps, which are badly strained by deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Military commanders look warily at a surge, saying that even 20,000 more soldiers and Marines may not be available and wouldn't necessarily help reduce Iraq's violence.

"We would not surge without a purpose," Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, said Thursday. "And that purpose should be measurable."

-A revised Iraq political strategy aimed at forging a "moderate center" of Shiite Muslim, Sunni Muslim Arab and Kurdish politicians that would bolster embattled Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki. The goal would be to marginalize radical Shiite militias and Sunni insurgents.

-More money to combat rampant unemployment among Iraqi youths and to advance reconstruction, much of it funneled to groups, areas and leaders who support Maliki and oppose the radicals.

-Rejection of the study group's call for an urgent, broad new diplomatic initiative in the Middle East to address the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and reach out to Iran and Syria.

Instead, the administration is considering convening a conference of Iraq and neighboring countries - excluding Iran and Syria - as part of an effort to pressure the two countries to stop interfering in Iraq.

It remains far from clear whether these moves would help stabilize Iraq, where a civil war rages nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion.

Only a year ago, on Nov. 30, 2005, Bush, under pressure to show progress, unveiled a "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq." Then, as now, he pledged to focus on training Iraq's security forces.

Bush also faces huge hurdles in getting public support behind his latest plan. Disapproval of his handling of Iraq has shot up to anywhere from 60 percent to 75 percent this month in polls.

"If he's going to trash the Iraq Study Group report, he's going to have to come up with something coherent, different and that is demonstrably better. I think he's not likely to persuade the country that he's done so," said Larry Diamond of Stanford University's Hoover Institution, who was among the study group's expert advisers.

The study group, chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and retired Congressman Lee Hamilton, released its report Dec. 6.

Bush appears to have been emboldened by criticism of its proposals as defeatist by members of the Republican Party's conservative wing and their allies on the Internet, the radio and cable TV.

Diamond and others close to the group said the report's primary value had been to focus White House and public attention on what the document termed the "grave and deteriorating" situation in Iraq.

The president and his national security team "are going to pick and choose from the Iraq report, and they're not going to choose much," a recently retired U.S. official predicted.

He and others spoke on the condition of anonymity because Bush's policy review is still under way.

According to a senior State Department official, the president is listening closely to a former Republican secretary of state, but it isn't Baker. Henry Kissinger, a frequent White House visitor, has been to see Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice a half-dozen times, he said.

In recent public comments, Kissinger has warned that an early withdrawal of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq could lead to the country's breakup, although he's also questioned whether victory in Iraq is possible.

In an interview Thursday with CNN, Kissinger said he didn't think Bush could achieve his goal of a democratic Iraq before his term ended in two years. But he said he thought that the president could fashion a strategy that stabilized the country, allowed normal civilian life to return and provided incentives to political leaders to reconcile internally and with other countries in the region.

Kissinger said he'd favor a temporary American troop increase if U.S. military commanders determined that it could make a difference as part of a broader political strategy.

"That, I think, is achievable. For that, I think, increased capability would play a role if only because it would show that the United States is not just running out ... because this conflict will not end in Iraq," Kissinger said. "We are dealing with a movement, and it's running through the Islamic world."

Two senior Iraqi officials confirmed Thursday that Bush is considering a short-term increase in the number of U.S. troops in Baghdad as part of a new strategy to contain the escalating civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0106822

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al Hashemi, a leader of the country's Sunnis, said after a speech Thursday at a U.S. government-funded institute in Washington that he and Bush had discussed the option Tuesday in a meeting at the White House.

Hashemi said that while he favored the idea, Bush should set "a timetable" for eventually withdrawing all American forces, linked to "serious efforts to reform the Iraqi military and security forces."

The reforms must include re-enlisting Iraqi soldiers and low-ranking officers who'd been excluded from the new forces under sweeping U.S.-approved purges of members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, he said.

Iraqi Ambassador to the United States Samir Sumaidaie, in a brief interview after Hashemi's speech, said the options that Bush was reviewing included putting more Iraqi forces in the capital.

He and Hashemi confirmed that Bush and his top aides are exploring the formation of a new government coalition to strengthen Maliki.

In a memo leaked last month to The New York Times, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the White House would consider "monetary support" for moderate Iraqi groups that broke with sectarian parties and backed Maliki.

Hashemi said he'd be willing to lead his bloc of Sunni politicians into such a coalition, despite sharp differences with potential Shiite and Kurdish members.

He urged caution in dealing with radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls the largest bloc of Shiite seats in parliament and heads the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that's blamed for much of the anti-Sunni violence in Baghdad.

Hashemi suggested that there might be a way to crack down on the militia while drawing the firebrand cleric's supporters into a new coalition. Excluding Sadr's followers could trigger a backlash that worsens the violence, he said.

McClatchy correspondent John Walcott contributed to this report.

Call To Add U.S. Forces Is Resisted At Home, In Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

The Bush administration is leaning toward temporarily sending as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, even as the Democrats taking charge of Congress demand a drawdown of forces.

U.S. officials say the increase is needed to make a new push to stabilize Baghdad and to bolster efforts to train the Iraqi army. The emerging plan is facing opposition from Iraqi officials adamant that more U.S. forces aren't the answer. U.S. military commanders in Baghdad have drawn up plans for the country that don't require any new personnel. The debate over whether to send additional U.S. forces to Iraq is the most visible manifestation of the high-level tumult roiling the Bush administration as it works to find a way forward there ahead of a presidential address to the nation early next year.

Although White House officials stress that no final decisions have been made, several aides involved in the internal deliberations say President Bush and senior administration officials appear receptive to calls to temporarily send 15,000 to 30,000 new U.S. forces to Iraq to bolster the 140,000 troops there.

In recent meetings with Mr. Bush, senior Pentagon officials said increasing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq for a few months may improve conditions on the ground there but cautioned that timing would be critical, since limits on available troop equipment mean additional forces couldn't be sustained for a long period of time, according to people familiar with the discussions.

Pentagon officials said they would send additional U.S. forces to Iraq only if the personnel had a clear military mission. "We would not surge without a purpose," the Army's top general, Peter J. Schoomaker, told reporters yesterday. "And that purpose should be measurable."

The troop debate is taking place as U.S. forces in Iraq begin ramping up their efforts to shift the focus of U.S. combat forces to training and advising the struggling Iraqi army. Senior military officials in Baghdad are finishing a plan that would more than double -- and could triple -- the number of U.S. troops who live with and train Iraqi forces. The expansion of the training efforts would be accompanied by a phased redeployment of U.S. forces out of major cities such as Baghdad and onto a small number of large military facilities in more remote parts of the country.

The proposal to send more troops to Iraq is most closely identified publicly with Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, a stalwart war supporter who argues that the U.S. venture will fail unless more troops are sent to the country.

Mr. McCain repeated that message yesterday on a brief trip to Baghdad with other senators, telling reporters there "is still a compelling reason to have an increase in troops here in Baghdad and in Anbar province in order to bring the sectarian violence under control" and to allow Iraq's political process to move ahead.

Deploying more U.S. forces to Iraq would be deeply unpopular in the U.S., where polls show that an increasing majority believes the U.S. is losing in Iraq, disapproves of the administration's handling of the war and wants to see a fixed timetable for a military withdrawal. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll this week found that declining public support for the war had brought Mr. Bush's overall approval ratings down to 34%, the lowest recorded to date in his presidency. The poll showed 35% of those surveyed favor a phased troop withdrawal "beginning immediately," up from 27% in July.

DOJ_NMG_0106823

The idea is also running into strong opposition in Baghdad. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has flatly told Gen. George Casey, the top American military commander in Iraq, that he doesn't want more U.S. personnel deployed to the country, according to U.S. military officials. The U.S. sent thousands of additional combat personnel to Baghdad earlier this year in an attempt to quell the daily violence there, but American officials say Mr. Maliki has made clear that he wants to see those forces -- except for U.S. trainers and advisers -- moved out of the city.

Senior U.S. commanders on the ground in Iraq, meanwhile, say they aren't sure additional forces are needed in Iraq.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli's staff is finishing a plan to significantly expand the teams that live with and train Iraqi forces by breaking up some big U.S. combat units into smaller military-advisory teams. The current teams, which number 10 soldiers, could expand to as large as 40 soldiers. As many as one-third of the 4,000-soldier U.S. combat brigades could be broken into teams. But according to the current plan, the overall size of the force wouldn't increase. The plan, which would mark a radical change in the U.S. military approach, hasn't yet been formally approved by Gen. Casey.

Although some senior military commanders in the Pentagon support sending more forces to Iraq, some officers in Iraq question how much impact the additional troops would have. The skeptics argue that the military, strained by the lengthy deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, could sustain the new forces in Iraq only for approximately six months. Critics of the proposal express concerns about where the additional forces would come from. Cobbling together 20,000 to 30,000 additional soldiers may require the Army to extend the deployments of units in Iraq.

Calling up National Guard troops would pose other problems. The White House would have to change Pentagon policies that allow the Army to call up National Guard and Army Reserve troops for a second Iraq tour. Such a move would be politically unpalatable.

Military Considers Sending As Many As 35,000 More U.S. Troops To Iraq, McCain Says (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 — Senator John McCain said Thursday that American military commanders were discussing the possibility of adding as many as 10 more combat brigades — a maximum of about 35,000 troops — to "bring the situation under control" while Iraq's divided political leaders seek solutions to the worsening bloodshed here.

After talks in Baghdad with Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and other top American generals, Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, said a substantial United States troop increase was one of the strategy changes the generals were considering as they reviewed what he called "a steadily deteriorating situation."

He said meetings with Iraqi government leaders showed that they, too, "have certainly not ruled out the option of more troops."

"Five to 10 additional brigades is what is being discussed," Mr. McCain said, outlining an increase that could bring overall American troop strength to the highest levels since the invasion in March 2003. While American combat brigades vary, Pentagon officials say they average about 3,500 soldiers. At present, there are 15 combat brigades in Iraq, amounting to about 50,000 of the total American force of about 140,000.

"The American people are disappointed and frustrated with the Iraq war, but they want us to succeed if there is any way to do that," Mr. McCain told a news conference. Unlike some American military commanders who have said any troop increase should be temporary, he said any increase should last "until we can get the situation under control, or until it becomes clear that we can't."

Mr. McCain spoke as the leader of a Congressional delegation that included five senators who have been strong backers of the war, among them Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, who won re-election in Connecticut last month as an independent after losing the Democratic nomination to an antiwar challenger. Mr. Lieberman, too, spoke strongly in favor of a substantial troop increase, saying, "A failed state in Iraq will be a disaster for the region and the world."

Two other Republican senators in the group, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John Thune of South Dakota, said they also backed troop increases, but Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, said she had yet to make up her mind. "I for one am not yet convinced that additional troops will pave the way for a peaceful Iraq," she said. "My fear is that if we have more troops sent to Iraq, we will just see more injuries and more deaths."

The trip amounted to a high-stakes campaign appearance by Mr. McCain, who is all but building his presidential campaign on the issue of Iraq. A leading contender for the Republican nomination in 2008, Mr. McCain strongly supported the original invasion but has shifted to criticizing the war's execution. He now holds the politically risky position that the Bush administration should send in more troops, or withdraw entirely.

DOJ_NMG_0106824

But Mr. McCain said personal ambition would not guide his Iraq policy.

"I take the position I'm taking with the full knowledge that only 15 to 18 percent of the American people agree with my position that we need more troops," he said. Still, he said he supported the troop increase to stabilize the situation in Baghdad and other turbulent areas and give Iraqi leaders time to work out compromises to bring the Sunni insurgency and Sunni-Shiite sectarian violence under control.

The visit by Mr. McCain came at a time of disarray in Washington and across the United States over how to proceed in Iraq. Mr. McCain, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, is effectively doubling down his bet on the war, figuring that embracing a strong resolution in Iraq will give him an effective campaign cudgel. If the administration sends more troops, Mr. McCain can hope for a speedy resolution in Iraq that allows him to claim partial victory; if President Bush pulls back and chaos persists, he could contend that his advice was ignored.

Without a troop increase, Mr. McCain said at the news conference, "the results are going to be inevitable, in my view" — a defeat for America and for its Iraqi allies that would create a terrorist haven that could be used as a base for attacks in the United States.

He contrasted the situation with the Vietnam War, saying, "when we came home, the war was over." But now, he said, Iraq's Islamic militants "will follow us home" if the American effort fails.

But even Mr. McCain, a decorated Vietnam hero, acknowledged the perils of his approach. He described a troop increase as "the least bad option" and said it could cost him his shot at the presidency. "I happen to feel that I have to do what my many years of life involved in the military dictate to me," he said. As if to emphasize his military credentials, he and other members of the delegation left Baghdad by helicopter after the news conference to fly to an embattled Marine base at Ramadi, 85 miles west of the capital, which is considered one of Iraq's deadliest places.

Although Mr. McCain did not say so, American commanders here are divided on the recommendations they will present to Mr. Bush, who has said he will announce a new strategy for the war in early January, officials familiar with the generals' discussions say.

General Casey, the top commander here, is said to be cautious, arguing that an increase could lower violence in Baghdad, at least temporarily, but that it could also encourage Iraq's feuding political leaders to delay tough decisions needed to stem the slide toward anarchy.

Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-highest-ranking American officer in Iraq, has been the allied forces' operational commander for the past year, and he has resisted a troop increase, the officials say, believing an American-financed job creation program could do as much to weaken the insurgents and political militias.

General Chiarelli's successor, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who took over at a ceremony in Baghdad on Thursday, is bullish, seeing a troop increase as a way for American and Iraqi troops to gain the upper hand in Baghdad and Anbar Province, a desert region virtually overrun by Sunni insurgents, the officials say.

Another cautionary voice has been that of Gen. John P. Abizaid, leader of the Central Command, which oversees the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. General Abizaid has said increasing troop strength, especially in Baghdad, could have an impact on the mounting cycle of revenge in which Sunni suicide bombings of Shiite civilian targets have set off murderous attacks on Sunni civilians by Shiite death squads. But General Abizaid, like General Casey, has said the impact would be temporary if Iraqi politicians failed to end sectarian feuding.

Iraq's growing anarchy was highlighted Thursday by another mass kidnapping in central Baghdad that appeared to have been driven by sectarian motives. Masked gunmen in elite police uniforms abducted dozens of men in the morning from the Sinak neighborhood, an area of automobile spare-parts shops close to the Shiite working-class district of Sadr City, an Interior Ministry official and witnesses said.

The neighborhood is not far from the site of a suicide bombing on Tuesday in which at least 70 Shiite day laborers were killed and more than 230 wounded.

The gunmen drove up in cars with police markings and brandished automatic rifles, witnesses said. "People were in a panic," said a 36-year-old spare-parts merchant. "Some people were trying to close their shops and leave. Others were just trying to slip away. I walked away as fast as I could. A few seconds later, I heard heavy shooting."

Another merchant said he broke free from the gunmen before they could shove him into a car. "They seemed to know who they wanted to kidnap because they'd take one person and leave others behind," he said.

The men were blindfolded and driven off to a building in an unknown location, a Shiite man who was later freed said. He said the captives were shackled and kept in a poorly lighted room. The kidnappers asked the victims whether they were Sunni or Shiite, and whether they had ties to any terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0106825

By late Thursday, at least 25 abductees had been freed, all Shiites, the Interior Ministry official said. It was unclear how many others — presumably Sunnis, though that was impossible to determine — were still being held.

In the area of the predominantly Shiite city of Kut in southern Iraq, 17 bodies were found by a stream, police officials said. All the victims had been shot dead after being tortured.

In Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near an Iraqi Army patrol, killing two people, including one soldier and mortar rounds killed a woman, according to Interior Ministry reports.

McCain Calls For More Troops In Iraq (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, December 15, 2006

Sen. John McCain took his controversial proposal for curbing Iraq's sectarian violence to Baghdad on Thursday, calling for an additional 15,000 to 30,000 U.S. troops and joining a congressional delegation in telling Iraq's prime minister he must break his close ties with a radical Shiite cleric.

The lawmakers' trip came as the bloodshed showed no signs of abating. At least 74 more people were killed or found dead, including 65 bullet-riddled bodies bearing signs of torture. And gunmen in military uniforms kidnapped as many as 70 shopkeepers and bystanders from a commercial area in central Baghdad in what was apparently an attack against Sunnis; at least 25 were later released, police said.

McCain's position puts him at odds with American public opinion and with the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended withdrawing substantial number of U.S. troops over the coming year. The Army in recent days has been looking at how many additional troops could be sent to Iraq if President Bush decides a surge in forces would be helpful.

Army officials say only about 10,000 to 15,000 troops could be sent and an end to the war would have to be in sight because the deployment would drain the pool of available soldiers for combat. Further, many experts warn, there is no guarantee a surge in troops would work to settle the violence.

"We would not surge without a purpose," the Army's top general, Peter J. Schoomaker, told reporters Thursday in Washington. "And that purpose should be measurable."

McCain said he realizes that few Americans favor deploying more U.S. troops to Iraq, and that if such a move proved unsuccessful in the unpopular war it could hurt his presidential ambitions.

But the Arizona Republican said Americans must realize that if U.S. troops leave Iraq in chaos, groups such as al-Qaida "will follow us home and that we will have a large conflict and greater challenges than those that we now face here in Iraq."

"The American people are confused, they're frustrated, they're disappointed by the Iraq war, but they also want us to succeed if there's any way to do that," McCain told reporters in Baghdad.

He said conditions in some areas of Iraq have improved since his last visit in March, but "I believe there is still a compelling reason to have an increase in troops here in Baghdad and in Anbar province in order to bring the sectarian violence under control" and to "allow the political process to proceed."

Two other senators in the delegation, Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said they agreed.

"We need more, not less, U.S. troops here," Lieberman said.

Another senator in the group, moderate Republican Susan Collins of Maine, disagreed.

"Iraq is in crisis. The rising sectarian violence threatens the very existence of Iraq as a nation," she said. The current U.S. strategy in Iraq has failed, but "I'm not yet convinced that additional troops will pave the way to a peaceful Iraq in a lasting sense," Collins said.

"My fear is that if we have more troops sent to Iraq that we will just see more injuries and deaths, that we might have a short term impact, but without a long-term political settlement," she said.

Collins' remarks appeared to reflect the findings of the Iraq Study Group, which concluded that sustained increases in U.S. troops would not solve the fundamental problem and that violence would renew once those forces left the area.

While the senators were meeting with U.S. and Iraqi officials in Baghdad, Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, was in Washington, where he called on the Bush administration to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops. Al-Hashemi said the timetable should be "flexible" and depend on development of an Iraqi security force.

"You've done your job," al-Hashemi, who met with Bush this week, said at the United States Institute of Peace, a U.S.-financed think tank. Currently, however, "there is across-the-board chaos in my country," he said.

Graham said he was shocked by the situation in Baghdad.

"The first time I came here with Sen. McCain we went rug shopping. Yesterday, we moved around in a tank. It's one of the most dangerous places on the planet," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106826

The congressional delegation, which also included Republicans Sen. John Thune of South Dakota and Rep. Mark Kirk from Illinois, left Baghdad on Thursday to tour the southern port city of Basra and Ramadi, the insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad.

Lieberman said the senators met with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, and urged him to break his ties with Muqtada al-Sadr and disarm the anti-U.S. cleric's Mahdi Army militia, which has been blamed along with Sunni Arab insurgents for the sectarian violence and ruthless attacks on U.S. forces.

Al-Sadr controls 30 of the 275 parliament seats and is a key figure in al-Maliki's coalition.

Lieberman said the delegation left its meetings with al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and other Iraqi officials believing "there is a force of moderates within the context of Iraqi politics coming together to strengthen the center here against the extremists."

He said the delegation was "quite explicit" about "how important it is that the Iraqis themselves begin to take aggressive action to disarm the militias, to stop the sectarian violence and to involve all the people in country to governance," including promised provincial elections.

But the senator also said moderates in parliament may look for another leader if al-Maliki fails to do that.

"What the U.S. needs and wants, and has to demand, is that in return for all that we're putting on the line here is that they take on the extremists," Lieberman said. "That's what this battle is all about."

Bush Seeks Ideas On New War Plan Here And In Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush will be spending part of his holidays in "continuous consultations" as he makes final decisions on a new Iraq war plan to be unveiled in the new year.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday that Bush will seek more information from a variety of sources, including members of the Iraqi government, Pentagon and the National Security Council, which is coordinating the administration's review of its war policy.

GOOD ADVICE: President gets advice from several sources

The result could make or break the United States' push for democracy in Iraq, according to those who have participated in the review.

"We've basically got about one more chance to get this right," said Stephen Biddle, a senior fellow with the Council on Foreign Relations who attended a White House meeting with Bush on Monday.

Said Snow: "The endpoint of what's going on right now is not a speech, it's policy. It is a way forward where the president will be instructing those involved to do things differently than they are doing now."

Since meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan two weeks ago, Bush has listened to ideas on Iraq from heads of state and non-government experts, as well as military commanders.

The options include adding U.S. troops as well as minimizing the role of the estimated 140,000 troops already in Iraq. There have also been discussions about forging what Snow called a "moderate consensus" within the country's democratic government.

Some ideas have already been ruled out by Bush, including one to partition Iraq into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish zones. He also has questioned a proposal to negotiate with Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, in part, he says, because they are helping insurgents in Iraq.

The consequences for Bush and the United States go beyond Iraq.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who lost the 2004 presidential election to Bush, believes the war was poorly planned and has damaged U.S. credibility in the Middle East.

Jordan's King Abdullah II has said civil war in Iraq could spread to Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Bush, whose approval ratings have dropped as more U.S. troops have died, has repeatedly said a premature withdrawal could turn Iraq into a haven for terrorists eager to strike America: "The stakes are high in this fight."

Iraqi VP Says Bush Wants Coalition To Counter Al-Sadr (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is pressing Iraqi politicians to form a new Cabinet to reduce the power of Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American cleric whose militia is responsible for much of the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0106827

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a moderate Sunni, said Thursday that President Bush told him the administration wants Iraqi politicians to form a coalition of "moderate parties." al-Hashimi met with Bush on Tuesday.

Iraq's governing coalition includes mostly Shiite political parties and has six Cabinet ministers from al-Sadr's faction. A new coalition would reduce or eliminate al-Sadr loyalists and replace them with other Shiites, Kurds and moderate Sunni Arabs, al-Hashimi said.

Bush is weighing changes to U.S. strategy in Iraq. Military options include boosting the number of American advisers to Iraqi forces and reducing the number of combat brigades.

The administration position is that military operations alone will not solve Iraq's problems. The United States encourages Iraq's government to find a political solution that will bring the country's rival factions together.

Gordon Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said the administration was not telling Iraqis what to do but the "object of the moderate Iraqi leaders coming together is to stop the violence and create an Iraq that can govern, sustain and defend itself."

Asked whether that meant removing al-Sadr's faction from government, Johndroe said the Iraqis Bush had consulted are "serious about taking action against those who would operate outside the rule of law." Bush has also met recently with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. He spoke by phone Wednesday with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, Johndroe said. Both are prominent Kurdish leaders.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army is among the most powerful militias in Iraq and is blamed for some of the attacks on Iraq's Sunni minority, according to the U.S. military.

Al-Hashimi, who has lost a sister and two brothers to assassins, cited horror stories of Sunnis going to hospitals to pick up the bodies of relatives, only to be arrested, tortured and murdered themselves. Bodies of Sunni men are dumped on the streets full of holes from drills, al-Hashimi said. The Health Ministry has denied any connection to killings.

Al-Maliki has been reluctant to break politically with al-Sadr, whose party controls 30 of the 275 seats in parliament. Support from al-Hashimi, whose bloc has 44 seats, could allow al-Maliki to stay in power without relying on al-Sadr.

"In theory, the numbers are there," for al-Maliki to rely on al-Hashimi instead of al-Sadr, said Larry Diamond, an Iraq expert at Stanford University's Hoover Institution who served as an adviser to the U.S.-led occupation authority in Iraq. "It's possible and probably a smart move on the part of the Bush administration" to encourage al-Maliki to break with al-Sadr, Diamond said. Two U.S. senators visiting Iraq, Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., and John McCain, R-Ariz., said Thursday that they urged al-Maliki to distance himself from al-Sadr.

Lieberman said he left a meeting with al-Maliki and Talabani believing "there is a force of moderates within the context of Iraqi politics coming together to strengthen the center here against the extremists." Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, said he doubted al-Maliki would support a crackdown on the Mahdi Army, composed of thousands of working class Shiites. Al-Maliki "may need Sadr down the road," Katzman said.

Iraq's ambassador to Washington, Samir Sumaidaie, said it might be possible to keep al-Sadr in the new coalition if he agreed to let U.S. and Iraqi forces rein in "the more wild parts of the Mahdi Army."

Iraq Coalition Plan Gains Urgency (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and top aides have made the effort to build a new governing coalition in Iraq a top priority in their search for a new strategy, one of the country's two vice presidents said Thursday.

Tariq Hashimi, who leads the Iraqi parliament's most important Sunni Arab group, said that Bush and other senior officials told him at a White House meeting this week that they believe "for the present time, the only solution we have" is to create a new ruling alliance in hopes of strengthening a frail central government.

Hashimi's comments, in an appearance at the U.S. Institute of Peace, offered new insight into the importance Bush is placing on the coalition-building effort at a time when the president and top aides are considering new strategies for Iraq.

U.S. and Iraqi advocates of the approach hope it would give Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki a new freedom to take risky actions, such as trying to suppress militia violence. Maliki's freedom to act is believed to be limited by his dependence on radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Al Mahdi army is blamed for sectarian attacks.

Creation of a new governing coalition also could provide a means for picking a new prime minister if Iraqi and American leaders decide Maliki must be replaced. Some Iraqi advocates of the approach insist that is not their intent.

Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, wrote a classified memo last month that said the United States should urge Sunni and Shiite Muslim leaders to support Maliki if he sought to build a new political base. The United States could help the process by offering cash support to moderate groups that take part, Hadley wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0106828

The Iraqi parliament is divided along sectarian lines and includes a large Shiite coalition, along with Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular parties. The new grouping would break up the current Shiite alliance and ally two Shiite parties — Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party and the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq — with the two Kurdish parties and possibly smaller religious and secular groupings.

Bush told reporters Wednesday that he had spoken by telephone to two senior Kurdish leaders about the coalition-building idea, "which we support."

Yet the plan faces obstacles.

Maliki has been wary. And it remains unclear whether the approach could win the support of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's top Shiite religious leader, who has urged Shiite leaders to stick together.

Allies of Sadr have condemned the plan, and there is a risk of a violent backlash if the coalition tries to exclude Sadr, who now has considerable influence within the Shiite coalition.

Hadley, in his memo, acknowledged the difficulties of forming a coalition and said the task would require the U.S. to "use our own political capital."

Hashimi acknowledged that forming the new grouping could ignite a violent backlash from Sadr's many supporters, who now control 30 of parliament's 275 seats and five Cabinet ministries and have the country's most active Shiite militia.

In comments after his speech, Hashimi said coalition members might devise a way to allow some elements of Sadr's group in the coalition while excluding violent portions.

Juan R. Cole, a Middle East specialist at the University of Michigan, said he doubted the coalition would have much cohesion because of the continuing splintering of Iraq's political landscape.

"I can't imagine a situation in which you'd get a stable parliamentary coalition that would vote for the prime minister's policies on every issue," he said.

Hashimi, who has been very critical of the Maliki government, promised that he and his group would support the effort but said it would not bring about the wholesale overhaul of the political system that Iraq needs.

He criticized plans under discussion in the U.S. government to shift the U.S. military from combat to an advisory role. That approach, he said, would risk creating a "security vacuum."

In Baker's Blunder, A Chance For Bush (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

As a result of the Iraq Study Group, President Bush has been given one last chance to alter course on Iraq. This did not, however, come about the way James Baker intended. It came about because the long-anticipated report turned out to be, as is widely agreed, a farce. From its wildly hyped, multiple magazine-cover rollout (Annie Leibovitz in Men's Vogue, no less) to its mishmash of 79 (no less) recommendations, the report has fallen so flat that the field is now clear for the president to recommend to a war-weary country something new and bold.

The study group has not just been attacked by left and right, Democrat and Republican. It has invited ridicule. Seventy-nine recommendations. Interdependent, insists Baker. They should be taken as a whole. "I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this but I don't like that.' " On the basis of what grand unifying vision? On the authority of what superior wisdom? A 10-person commission including such Middle East experts as Sandra Day O'Connor, Alan Simpson and Vernon Jordan?

This kind of bipartisan elder-statesmen commission is perfectly appropriate as a consensus-building exercise for, say, a long-range problem such as Social Security. It is a ludicrous mechanism for devising strategic changes in the middle of a war.

Its major recommendation of gradual retreat is unremarkable -- exactly what you'd expect from a committee whose objective is consensus. It reflects a certain conventional wisdom in Washington that the war is already lost. And if that were true, we should indeed be retreating. And the sooner the better, even more quickly than the ISG recommends.

But having told us that the price of leaving Iraq to chaos is unacceptably high, the commission never attempts to come up with a plan for succeeding. Its only new initiative is to go regional and involve neighboring Syria and Iran.

Syria should stop infiltration, declares the report. And Iran "should stem the flow of equipment, technology, and training to any group resorting to violence in Iraq." Yes, and obesity should be eradicated, bird flu cured and traffic fatalities, particularly the multi-car variety, abolished. Such fatuous King Canute pronouncements give the report its air of detachment from reality.

This holding back of the tides is to be accomplished by negotiations with the likes of Iran. Baker admits that Iranian representatives told the commission that they are unlikely to cooperate. But we must press on, Baker insists, because we will thus expose Iran as "a rejectionist nation" that is "not . . . willing to help try and stabilize Iraq."

Now, there's a diplomatic achievement: undermining our hard-earned agreement with the Europeans to make any future approach to Iran dependent on the suspension of uranium enrichment in order to . . . demonstrate to the world that a country providing sophisticated weapons, roadside bombs and financial support to both sides of the civil war does not support stability there. Is there a sentient adult outside this commission who did not know that?

DOJ_NMG_0106829

A major objective of the New Diplomatic Offensive (as if pompous capitalization makes for substance) is to bring Arab-Israeli peace. Baker thinks that if only the Israelis would surrender to Arab demands, all would be well in the Middle East.

Okay. Imagine that there is peace between Israel and the Arabs. No, imagine an even better solution from the Arab point of view -- an earthquake that tomorrow swallows Israel whole and sinks it (like Santorini, 1650 B.C.) into the Mediterranean. Does anyone imagine that the Shiites stop killing Sunnis? That al-Qaeda stops killing Americans? That Iran and Syria work any less assiduously to destabilize post-Saddam Hussein Iraq? It's these obvious absurdities that made the report so dismissible.

Now that these 10 establishment

sages have labored mightily to produce a mouse, the president has one last chance to come forward with a new strategy.

He must do two things. First, as I've been agitating for, establish a new governing coalition in Baghdad that excludes Moqtada al-Sadr, a cancer that undermines the ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government to work with us. It is encouraging that Bush has already begun such a maneuver by meeting with rival Shiite and Sunni parliamentary leaders. If we help produce a cross-sectarian government that would be an ally rather than a paralyzed semi-adversary of coalition forces, we should then undertake part two: "Double down" our military effort. This means a surge in American troops with a specific mission: to secure Baghdad and (with the support of the Baghdad government -- a sine qua non) suppress Sadr's Mahdi Army.

It is our last chance for success. Bush can thank the Iraq Study Group and its instant irrelevance for making it possible.

Panned In Baghdad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Iraq Study Group Chairmen Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton have spent the past week defending their report against withering criticism here in the U.S. But the more revealing reaction has been from Iraq itself: "Unrealistic," "inappropriate" and "very dangerous" are among the kinder words used by Iraq's leaders to describe the ISG's work.

Consider Jalal Talabani. A secular-minded Kurd who has probably done more than any other leader to reach out across the country's sectarian divides, Iraq's President is no doubt sympathetic to the report's calls for "national reconciliation." But he reacted strongly to the ISG's suggestion that American support for his democratically elected government be conditioned on its meeting U.S.-determined "milestones" toward that goal. That, he said, was an "insult to the people of Iraq."

Mr. Talabani was also critical of the ISG's specific ideas for achieving reconciliation. Having helped bring such Sunni leaders as Adnan Dulaimi into the political process, he clearly understands the importance of giving the Sunnis a fair deal. But he bristled at the report's idea that reconciliation should be achieved through concessions to members of Saddam's Baath Party and other Sunni rejectionists. Fellow Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani echoed that criticism, saying the ISG wanted to reward "those who are against the political process and have conducted acts of violence."

On the issue of improving Iraq's security forces, Mr. Talabani also objected to the idea of embedding more American advisers inside Iraqi units. Like a number of Iraqis to whom we've spoken, Mr. Talabani believes one key to better security is increasing the freedom of Iraqi Army units to carry out independent operations based on their own intelligence and judgment. "Many people ask why there is no security, and that's because our hands are tied. The Prime Minister cannot move 10 soldiers from one place to another" without U.S. authorization, he said.

We think embedding is a useful idea, though that isn't the same as U.S. control of those units. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki agrees with Mr. Talabani on this, and he argued for more control of the Iraqi Army during his recent meeting with President Bush. While the PM's public reaction to the ISG report was much more muted, Mr. Maliki's advisers have made it clear they are as troubled as Mr. Talabani. "We were told there would not be pressure as such," said one. "If they do not support the government it will look as if they do not do what they preach [about democracy]," said another.

Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who met with Mr. Bush last week, also said the ISG report "includes inaccurate information that's based on dishonest sources." Other Shiites objected to the ISG's suggestion that provisions of the Iraqi constitution, which was overwhelmingly ratified in a referendum last year, be reopened for debate. Iraq's Sunni leaders, meanwhile, were somewhat less critical of the ISG report. But they were hardly enthusiastic either.

We offer this roundup not because these Iraqis are infallible on how to move their country forward, and in fact they often disagree. But their reaction exposes the flawed conception of the ISG process, which is that a group of unelected American "wise men" were going to come up with policies that would somehow save Iraq's elected government from itself. "The report has a mentality that we are a colony where they impose their conditions and neglect our independence," the pro-American Talabani said pointedly.

This Iraqi criticism also underscores that the ISG report was less about winning in Baghdad than about splitting political differences in Washington. As Mr. Bush re-examines Iraq policy with an eye toward announcing significant changes early next year, we trust he understands better than the ISG that a partnership with the Iraqi government is essential to any successful outcome.

DOJ_NMG_0106830

Truman's Trials Resonate For Bush (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

He led the United States into war and saw his popularity plummet, yet some 60 years later his reputation has never been higher: It's small wonder Harry S. Truman seems to hold a special fascination for President Bush these days.

That interest came into focus recently after Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) went public with an account of a meeting last Friday in which he said the president seemed to be comparing his situation to that of Truman in the late 1940s. According to Durbin's account and another source familiar with the meeting, Bush told the gathering of congressional leaders that Truman's approach to dealing with the Cold War was not initially popular but that he was vindicated by history -- the implication being that Bush would be vindicated about Iraq as well.

White House aides later disputed this reading of Bush's comments, but the episode may offer a glimpse into the psychology of a president who, like Truman in his second term, seems beset by trouble and pressures on all sides and who is ready to look to history for some comfort and guidance.

"Everyone loves a winner, and history reflects Harry Truman was a winner," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), whose father was a longtime friend of the late president and who met Truman as a young man. "It is all familiar front-yard psychology -- associate yourself with a winner."

By many accounts, Bush is fascinated by history and biography -- he reads extensively and meets periodically with presidential scholars -- and Truman has certainly seemed to be on his mind in recent months. In his commencement address this year at West Point, Bush discussed Truman at some length, lauding his early role in structuring U.S. forces and institutions for the Cold War.

That speech was followed by repeated references to the Democratic 33rd president during the fall campaign, usually as part of cutting attacks on the party of Truman, which Bush said had become the "party of cut and run" in Iraq. In the 2004 presidential campaign, Bush also mentioned Truman repeatedly, often to praise his role in helping reconstruct Japan after World War II.

By coincidence, say White House aides, one of 10 recipients of the Presidential Medal of Freedom today will be David McCullough, whose 1992 biography of Truman did much to restore the luster of his presidency among the public. In a brief telephone interview this week from his home in Maine, McCullough described himself as "more honored" than he has ever been by the award, the highest civilian honor bestowed by the government, and he noted that the medal was created by Truman in 1945.

"I know that President Bush admires Harry Truman -- we have talked about that," McCullough said, though he was cautious about offering any snap assessments of the Bush presidency. "About 50 years has to go by before you can appraise a presidency -- the dust has to settle."

He did say he sees similarities between Truman and Bush, especially in their capacity to endure "merciless criticism and personal abuse" that he doubts "many of us could take."

Perhaps mindful that Bush-Truman comparisons would draw ridicule from Democrats -- the idea is already the subject of derision in the liberal blogosphere -- White House aides were careful to emphasize that the iconic liberal is only one of a number of inspirations for the president. "People do think about the Truman presidency -- but not only the Truman presidency," said one senior White House official, who was not authorized to speak publicly. "It is not as though it's a talisman or lighthouse for any of us."

The official and several other senior administration officials speak mainly about Truman's role in key events of the traumatic early days of the Cold War, including the Berlin Airlift, the passage of the Marshall Plan and defense of South Korea.

Bush has described the struggle against Islamic terrorism in generational terms, and the implication from his aides is that he is setting up structures and strategy to win this long war, even if, as with Truman, some of the particular actions are unpopular.

"By the actions he took, the institutions he built, the alliances he forged and the doctrines he set down, President Truman laid the foundations for America's victory in the Cold War," Bush told the graduating cadets at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in May.

Democrats at last week's meeting seemed surprised by Bush's comments about Truman, but White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush was making a point that as during Truman's presidency, the United States today faces an "ideological enemy with a global ambition . . . that we were going to have to figure out how to face over an extended period of time."

DOJ_NMG_0106831

"I think it's important to note that the president was really not trying to compare himself to Harry Truman so much as to talk about the duration and nature of the struggle," Snow said.

Historians are divided about this kind of assessment from the administration. Fred I. Greenstein, a Princeton scholar regarded as a preeminent authority on the presidency, alluded to one major difference between Bush and Truman, often cited by Democrats. "The Marshall Plan was part of a broad-based diplomatic effort, and it was enacted by Truman's bipartisan leadership of a Republican Congress," he said in an e-mail. "Bush's efforts have been heavily unilateral internationally and divisive internally, except those just after 9/11."

James G. Hershberg, a Cold War historian at George Washington University, said he doubts that history will judge Bush as kindly as it has Truman, saying Truman's roles in fostering European recovery and building the NATO alliance were seen as solid accomplishments at the time. "Bush, by contrast, lacks any successes of comparable magnitude to compensate for his mismanagement of the Iraq war and will be hard-pressed to produce any in his last two years," he said.

But Greenstein said he has been struck by parallels between the two presidents, including their feistiness, the fact that neither seemed up to the job in their early months in office, that both had responses to crises that made them seem more presidential and that both saw their approval levels drop after stalemated wars. "As one who remembers the Truman presidency," he said, "I often have a sense of deja vu."

Top Commanders Appear Set To Urge Larger U.S. Military (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The review of Iraq policy by senior commanders appears to be headed toward a recommendation to increase the size of the American military, both to sustain a long-term commitment in Iraq and to leave the United States better positioned to deal with potential adversaries, in particular Iran and North Korea, Pentagon and military officials said Thursday.

The latest indication came when the Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, called for expanding the force by adding more active-duty troops and by making more use of the National Guard and Reserve.

His statement, on Thursday, came a day after President Bush met with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the Pentagon's secure conference room to discuss reshaping strategy in Iraq. That session, officials said, included a detailed discussion of whether the armed services are large enough to sustain the mission in Iraq and meet other global security threats.

Officials who took part in the session or who were briefed on it would not give specific figures that were being discussed for growth goals. But their descriptions revealed a broad conclusion that has received increasing support in Washington: that regardless of the exact shape of President Bush's new strategy on Iraq, the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by their commitments around the globe, in particular in Iraq.

That conclusion is being punctuated by the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who officially leaves his post on Friday and who was long the champion of the idea that high technology and better intelligence could substitute for a bigger military.

Although expanding the Army's size would be too slow a process to provide immediate relief for the force in Iraq, several ideas are being considered to fill the short-term demand for troops there, especially in Baghdad.

One proposal being studied, according to Pentagon officials, is accelerating the arrival in Iraq of a handful of combat brigades already scheduled to deploy there in 2007. Sending troops in early or keeping soldiers in Iraq past their scheduled departure has been a way to temporarily increase American troop presence in Iraq without ordering in forces that had not been on the deployment roster.

A new study by the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research group in Washington, that was released on Thursday also called for a surge of forces to Baghdad over the near term on the grounds that the nascent Iraqi security force is not up to the task.

The report was written by the military historian Frederick W. Kagan and by Jack Keane, the retired general who served as vice chief of staff of the Army. It calls for adding four to five additional combat brigades to Baghdad and deploying them in neighborhoods that have mixed Sunni and Shiite populations and have been the scene of sectarian violence.

The report argues that this can be done without stretching the Army and Marines to the breaking point, but it also advocates increasing both forces by a total of at least 30,000 per year for the next two years.

At the Pentagon, even those not supporting the surge option argue that the Army needs to grow to sustain the force levels required in Afghanistan and Iraq and to meet other national security threats.

DOJ_NMG_0106832

Officials who were briefed on the president's discussion with the Joint Chiefs said there was a consensus that the review of administration strategy in Iraq must be broadened to include decisions on how to prepare the American military for the global counterterrorism mission beyond Iraq.

In particular, they said there was a need to show enough force strength to deter potential adversaries from aggressive moves based on an assumption that American power was bogged down in Iraq.

"A lot of it was discussed yesterday with President Bush," said a senior Pentagon official who was briefed on the discussions by one of those in attendance.

The nation faces three choices or "we will break the active component," General Schoomaker said in an appearance before the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves. He said the choices included reducing demand on the military, which seems unlikely; gaining the guaranteed ability to mobilize the National Guard and Reserve; and increasing the size of the active forces.

On the last point, said that "current demand on the force makes this a wise and prudent action." He gave no figure on his goal for the Army, but noted that even in an optimistic best case, the Army probably could grow by only 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year.

Congress authorized a 30,000-soldier increase in the active-duty Army after the Sept. 11 attacks in what was described as a temporary measure. Army officials say they hope to reach that authorized total troop strength of 512,000 by next year.

Gen. Gordon R. Sullivan, the former Army chief of staff who now heads the Association of the U.S. Army, a private support group, said in an interview that senior Army officers have told him in recent months that the service needs an active duty strength of some 535,000 to 540,000. General Sullivan said that figure assumed assured access to mobilize the National Guard and Reserves.

General Sullivan said his personal view was that the Army needed to have an active duty strength of more than 600,000 if such ability to mobilize the Guard and Reserves could not be guaranteed.

He noted that there has been a debate over the past few years as to whether the Army deployments were a "spike" or a "plateau."

"Surely, we know by now that it is a plateau," he said. "We are sending people back with 12 months dwell time. One reason we are doing it is that we don't have enough to spread this commitment out."

General Says Army Will Need To Grow (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Warning that the active-duty Army "will break" under the strain of today's war-zone rotations, the nation's top Army general yesterday called for expanding the force by 7,000 or more soldiers a year and lifting Pentagon restrictions on involuntary call-ups of Army National Guard and Army Reserve troops.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, issued his most dire assessment yet of the toll of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan on the nation's main ground force. At one point, he banged his hand on a House committee-room table, saying the continuation of today's Pentagon policies is "not right."

In particularly blunt testimony, Schoomaker said the Army began the Iraq war "flat-footed" with a $56 billion equipment shortage and 500,000 fewer soldiers than during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Echoing the warnings from the post-Vietnam War era, when Gen. Edward C. Meyer, then the Army chief of staff, decried the "hollow Army," Schoomaker said it is critical to make changes now to shore up the force for what he called a long and dangerous war.

"The Army is incapable of generating and sustaining the required forces to wage the global war on terror . . . without its components -- active, Guard and reserve -- surging together," Schoomaker said in testimony before the congressionally created Commission on the National Guard and Reserves.

The burden on the Army's 507,000 active-duty soldiers -- who now spend more time at war than at home -- is simply too great, he said. "At this pace, without recurrent access to the reserve components, through remobilization, we will break the active component," he said, drawing murmurs around the hearing room.

The Army, which had 482,000 soldiers in 2001, plans to grow temporarily to 512,000. But the Army now seeks to make that increase permanent and to continue increasing its ranks by 7,000 or more a year, Schoomaker said. He said the total increase is under discussion.

"I recommend we continue to grow the Army so that we have choices," Schoomaker said, cautioning that it is ill advised to assume demand for American troops overseas will decrease. "Our history is replete with examples where we have guessed wrong: 1941, 1950, 2001, to name a few," he said. "We don't know what's ahead."

DOJ_NMG_0106833

In light of such a sober assessment, Schoomaker voiced skepticism about the idea of an infusion of U.S. ground troops into Iraq, a message sources said he and the other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff delivered to President Bush at the Pentagon on Wednesday.

"We should not surge without a purpose, and that purpose should be measurable and get us something," he told reporters after the hearing.

Schoomaker's highly public appeal for more troops and reserve call-ups appeared to be part of an Army campaign to lobby incoming Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who is to be sworn in Monday, to approve the desired policy changes as well as a significant increase in the Army budget.

The Army estimates that every 10,000 additional soldiers will cost about $1.2 billion a year, up from $700 million in 2001 in part because of increased enlistment bonuses and other incentives. The Army will have to "gain additional resources to support that strategy," Schoomaker acknowledged.

Democrats, who will take charge of Congress next month, said yesterday that they plan to hold hearings on the "urgent" and "critical" readiness problems of the Army and Marine Corps. "Readiness levels for every unit must be raised and maintained at the highest possible level," Rep. Solomon P. Ortiz (D-Tex.), incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee's readiness panel, and Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii) said in an opinion article released yesterday. Two-thirds of Army units in the United States are now considered not ready to deploy.

The Army's manpower dilemma stems from current Pentagon policies: Although 55 percent of soldiers belong to the National Guard or the reserve, the Defense Department dictates that reservists can be mobilized involuntarily only once, and for no more than 24 months.

As a result, out of the total of 522,000 Army National Guard and reserve members, only about 90,000 are still available to be mobilized, according to Army data. "We're out of Schlitz," declared an Army chart depicting the shortage as a depleted barrel, saying this leaves "future missions in jeopardy."

Compounding the problem, the Pentagon has restricted repeated involuntary call-ups, leading to deeper and deeper holes in Army Guard and reserve units. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, hundreds of thousands of reserve soldiers have been mobilized for Iraq and Afghanistan. So when a unit is called to deploy, the only soldiers who can go are volunteers and new soldiers. The remainder are often drawn from dozens of units across the United States.

The result is systematically "broken" and "non-cohesive" units, said another Army chart titled "OSD-mandated Volunteer Policy Stresses the Force," referring to the office of the secretary of defense.

For example, Army Reserve units now must take an average of 62 percent of their soldiers for deployments from other units, compared with 6 percent in 2002 and 39 percent in 2003, according to the Army data. In one transportation company, only seven of 170 soldiers were eligible to deploy. The other 163 came from 65 other units in 49 locations, said the commission chairman, retired Marine Corps Maj. Gen. Arnold L. Punaro, who quoted a Marine Reserve officer as calling the policy "evil."

"Military necessity dictates that we deploy organized, trained, equipped cohesive units -- and you don't do that by pick-up teams," said Schoomaker, a decorated veteran of the Army's Delta Force who served in the ill-fated Desert One rescue mission in Iran in 1980.

"We must start this clock again . . . and field fully ready units. . . . We must change this policy," he said, banging his hand on the table for emphasis. He said later that he had detected "some movement" by Pentagon policymakers who have so far rejected a change on the politically sensitive issue.

In an interview yesterday on C-SPAN, Thomas F. Hall, assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs, said that under the current authority Bush can mobilize up to 1 million reservists for no more than two "continuous" years, but the Pentagon policy under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has been more restrictive, limiting the time to two "cumulative" years. "The law does say 'continuous,' so you could have a break and recall them," Hall said.

Lt. Gen. Clyde Vaughn, chief of the 346,000-strong Army National Guard, said yesterday that his force is "poised for remobilization."

Vaughn said he thinks state Guard leaders will accept fresh call-ups sooner than planned as long as the deployments are limited to 12 months and draw on units that have been home the longest. He said the Guard could tolerate having units deploy for one year out of every five, instead of out of every six.

"One year is absolutely critical," he said, explaining that the 18 months it currently takes for a Guard unit to mobilize, train and deploy means too much time away from jobs and families. Schoomaker indicated that the Army is working on reducing the duration of Guard and reserve deployments to one year.

Since 2001, the Army Guard has deployed 186,000 soldiers and the Army Reserve 164,000 soldiers for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan and in homeland-defense missions.

DOJ_NMG_0106834

Army Chief Seeks More Forces, Reserves (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 15, 2006

As President Bush weighs new strategies for Iraq, the Army's top general warned Thursday that his force "will break" without thousands more active duty troops and greater use of the reserves.

Noting the strain put on the force by operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere in the global war on terrorism, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said he wants to grow his half-million-member Army beyond the 30,000 troops already added in recent years.

Though he didn't give an exact number, he said it would take significant time and commitment by the nation, noting some 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers could be added per year.

Officials also need greater authority to tap into the National Guard and Reserve, long ago set up as a strategic reserve but now needed as an integral part of the nation's deployed forces, Schoomaker told a commission studying possible changes in those two forces.

"Over the last five years, the sustained strategic demand ... is placing a strain on the Army's all-volunteer force," Schoomaker told the commission in a Capitol Hill hearing.

"At this pace ... we will break the active component" unless reserves can be called up more to help, Schoomaker said in prepared remarks.

Schoomaker's comments come as Bush continues his assessment of the Iraq war. Bush held three days of urgent meetings with top generals and other advisers. Over that time, Bush gathered advice from former and current commanders, including those in Iraq, as well as chiefs of the military services and other top Pentagon leaders.

White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to characterize Bush's response to Schoomaker's suggestion, but said Bush "takes seriously any of the requests from the service branch chiefs."

Speaking to reporters afterward, Schoomaker said Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, is looking at several military options for the war, including shifting many troops from combat missions to training Iraqi units. However, Schoomaker said, the military is more interested in getting the Iraqi security forces up to speed than anything.

Above all else, the military is looking at "how we generate Iraqi output," he said.

The Army in recent days has been looking at how many additional troops could be sent to Iraq, if the president decides a surge in forces would be helpful. But, officials say, only about 10,000 to 15,000 troops could be sent and an end to the war would have to be in sight because it would drain the pool of available soldiers for combat.

Further, many experts warn, there is no guarantee a surge would work to settle the violence.

"We would not surge without a purpose," Schoomaker told reporters. "And that purpose should be measurable."

He even heard from outside advisers who suggested he remove Marine Gen. Peter Pace as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, according to an official familiar with the meeting who asked not to be named because the discussions were private.

A number of administration officials have suggested privately that — while Bush has considered the possibility of a short-term troop increase — there is no consensus from the military on the wisdom of injecting a large number of additional troops.

Another option under discussion is increasing the number of U.S. troops who are placed inside Iraqi army and police units as advisers, providing a kind of on-the-job training that the senior military spokesman in Baghdad, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, told reporters is already paying notable dividends.

The military has said that any adjustments in troop levels would be fruitless without accompanying improvements on the political and economic fronts, to reconcile the rival sectarian factions and to put young people to work.

Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, meanwhile, called on the Bush administration to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. At a news conference in Washington, al-Hashemi, a Sunni leader who met with Bush earlier this week, said the timetable should be "flexible" and depend on development of a capable Iraqi security force.

"You've done your job," he said at the United States Institute of Peace, a U.S.-financed think tank.

Currently, however, he said, "There is across-the-board chaos in my country," with roaming bands of murderers.

Army Is Stretched Too Thin (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Army's top general said Thursday that the mission in Iraq "will break" the Army without an expansion of the size of the active-duty force or the remobilization of the National Guard and reserves.

DOJ_NMG_0106835

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said the all-volunteer Army was being tested by a schedule that allowed less than a year at home for active-duty units between deployments to Iraq.

Boosting the size of the active-duty force would be expensive, and remobilizing the guard members and reservists who have already served in Iraq would be controversial and politically unpopular. But the high operational demand placed on the Army is unlikely to end soon, Schoomaker said. And without sending reservists to Iraq for additional tours or expanding the size of the active-duty Army, it would be difficult to meet the overseas demands.

The Army is officially allowed to have 482,000 soldiers, but Congress has temporarily authorized the service to grow by 30,000. So far, the Army has added 25,000 soldiers.

Testifying before the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves, which was created by Congress to examine challenges facing the reserve component, Schoomaker did not say precisely how much he wanted the Army to grow. But he said "current demand" made an increase "wise and prudent." His remarks left open the possibility that the Army would seek an increase beyond its current limit of 512,000.

"If the nation decides to further increase the size of the Army, it will take a significant amount of time and commitment from the nation," he said. "Optimistically, we could add 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year."

Last month, Marine Gen. James T. Conway said that an increase in his force was under consideration and that funding for a temporary boost in the size of the Corps could be included in next year's supplemental budget request.

Some outside experts — notably Frederick W. Kagan of the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank in Washington — have suggested that the Army should grow annually by one division, about 20,000 people, until it reaches 750,000 soldiers.

Kagan said that from 1979 to 1991, America had an all-volunteer active-duty force of 780,000. "I do not believe we cannot find a way to recruit to a higher level," he said. "The president is going to have to call on the young people of this nation to come out and support this effort."

Such growth is possible, other experts say, but during an unpopular war, it would require large bonuses and pay increases that would eat into the military budget.

Kagan has proposed building up the Army in part to allow the military to send additional forces to Iraq.

In a proposal outlined Thursday, Kagan said that by speeding up rotations and extending tours, the Army and Marine Corps could add some 30,000 combat troops in 2007.

Army officials' estimates of how many soldiers they could add are much lower.

Army officials have been talking privately for months about the need to send guard and reserve units for second tours. But Schoomaker's remarks were the most forceful public presentation yet about the need to tap the reserves further.

Typically reservists must be mobilized for at least 18 months in order to serve in Iraq: six months to train and a year to serve in the war zone. Under current practice, the National Guard and reserves can be mobilized for only a single tour in Iraq. But Schoomaker said almost all of the reserve units had been called once since Sept. 11, 2001.

In early 2005, about 40% of the force in Iraq was made up of Guard troops and reserves. But because numerous soldiers and units have been mobilized, the Army has had to fill out units with volunteers from across the country who are willing to serve a second tour.

The Army wants to be able to send units to Iraq that have trained together, even if some of their members have already served an overseas tour.

"In my view we must deploy our force in cohesive units, not as individual soldiers," Schoomaker said. "This will require us to remobilize units and reserve component soldiers."

Army officials believe under the law they are allowed to remobilize reservists for a second tour.

Top Pentagon officials have not yet allowed such involuntary remobilizations, but the policy is being examined by the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves.

General Says Army 'will Break' Without More Reserves (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army's top general warned Thursday that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan "will break" the active-duty Army unless the National Guard and Reserves are used more often and thousands of active-duty troops are added to the ranks.

With the all-volunteer force now in its fifth year of combat and facing unprecedented strains, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker noted that active-duty combat brigades spend less than one year at home.

DOJ_NMG_0106836

"At this pace, without recurrent access to the reserve components through remobilization, we will break the active component," Schoomaker told a panel appointed by Congress to recommend changes for the National Guard and Reserves.

Further, because nearly all part-time Army units have been called up to serve at least once in the war on terrorism and in Iraq, current mobilization policies mean that the Army must rely on individual volunteers to fill out units that are being deployed again.

"This runs counter to the military necessity of deploying trained, ready and cohesive units," Schoomaker said in testimony to the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves. "In my view, we must deploy our force in cohesive units, not as volunteers."

Schoomaker said the situation will require the Army to remobilize units and reserve component soldiers who already have served once in the war on terror and in Iraq. His recommendations were first reported on Tuesday by McClatchy Newspapers.

Commission chairman Arnold L. Punaro said there's broad agreement among military commanders who've testified in previous hearings that the Pentagon's policy for mobilizing reserve forces must change, but the frequency and duration of deployments remain in dispute.

"It's not sustainable," said Punaro, a retired Marine major general who's now an executive at defense contractor SAIC. "Whether it's feasible or not (to change the policy) remains to be seen."

Speaking to reporters after the hearing, Lt. Gen. Clyde Vaughn, the director of the Army National Guard, said he supports changing the policy so that citizen soldiers are called up to serve for no more than 12 months at a time. Under that model, the Army National Guard could provide as many as 60,000 combat troops for deployment "for a long time," Vaughn said.

"One year is absolutely critical," Vaughn said. "Eighteen months is too long."

Under current law, National Guard and Reserve forces can be called to active duty for up to two consecutive years under a partial mobilization, which is what President Bush declared after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But the practice under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has been to mobilize part-time troops for no more than 24 cumulative months. National Guard and Reserve troops called to service in Iraq and Afghanistan usually spend about six months training, then a year on the ground, leaving them only six months of eligibility to serve in other active-duty roles.

North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley, the National Governors Association's point man on National Guard issues, said the preparations take too long.

"Soldiers are spending way too much time at mobilization stations before they get to the fight," he said in a statement.

He also argued that thousands of active-duty soldiers have yet to serve in the war. "We should fully use all active-duty soldiers first before we ask the National Guard to do a second or even third round of deployments," Easley said.

More than 1 million American servicemen and women have served in Iraq and Afghanistan, many of them National Guard and Reserve troops.

Army officials say Schoomaker wants the 24-month restriction lifted so that units can go to war intact. Although that means that some part-time troops would have to serve again involuntarily in the short term, the goal by 2009 is for active-duty units to serve a year-long overseas deployment only once every three years, Army Reserve units to serve overseas only one out of every five years, and National Guard units to serve only one year overseas out of every six.

Unless current policies on reserve forces are changed, the country must either reduce the number of troops overseas or add troops to the active-duty Army, Schoomaker said.

Schoomaker said that current demands on the Army make it a "wise and prudent action" to add more troops than the 30,000 that Congress has approved in recent years. Schoomaker said the Army could "optimistically" add at least 6,000 to 7,000 more soldiers a year, or more with greater recruiting incentives.

The Army currently has about 500,000 active-duty troops. Reserve components make up 55 percent of the Army's total strength, with 196,000 troops in the Army Reserve and 345,000 in the National Guard.

Air Force Maj. Gen. Roger Lempke, president of the national Adjutants General Association, which represents the senior leadership of the Army and Air National Guard, said the National Guard already has called up about 75 percent of its soldiers.

Those soldiers aren't available now, he said, and he fears that the Army wants more rotations for troops to meet its needs overseas.

"If they get that access and do it the current way, I expect you're going to see more problems with recruitment and retention," said Lempke, the adjutant general for the Nebraska National Guard.

Lempke said Guard soldiers now are mobilized about two years out of every six or seven. He'd be willing to see troops deployed more often if they don't stay away as long.

"We could do one year in five," Lempke said. "We could support that, but we can't do 18 months every three years or less."

The commission is supposed to deliver a report to Congress by January 2008 that recommends changes to the National Guard and Reserve military forces.

DOJ_NMG_0106837

McClatchy Newspapers correspondent Barbara Barrett contributed to this report.

Rice Rejects Overture To Iran And Syria (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday rejected a bipartisan panel's recommendation that the United States seek the help of Syria and Iran in Iraq, saying the "compensation" required by any deal might be too high. She argued that neither country should need incentives to foster stability in Iraq.

"If they have an interest in a stable Iraq, they will do it anyway," Rice said in a wide-ranging interview with Washington Post reporters and editors. She said she did not want to trade away Lebanese sovereignty to Syria or allow Iran to obtain a nuclear weapon as a price for peace in Iraq.

Rice also said there would be no retreat from the administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East, a goal that was de-emphasized by the Iraq Study Group in its report last week but that Rice insisted was a "matter of strategic interest." She reiterated her commitment to pursuing peace between Palestinians and Israelis -- a new effort that President Bush announced in September but that has yielded little so far.

"Get ready. We are going to the Middle East a lot," Rice said.

In a separate interview with Post editors and reporters, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte provided an assessment of the situation in Iraq that did not deviate much from the Iraq Study Group's grim appraisal. He said the Iraqi insurgency could now finance itself from inside Iraq "through corruption, oil smuggling and kidnappings."

Rice's remarks indicated that, despite a maelstrom of criticism of Bush's policies by outside experts and Democrats, the administration's extensive review of policy in Iraq and the region will not yield major changes in its approach. Rice said that Bush could be "quite expansive" in terms of a policy review and that the new plan would be a "departure." But the president will not radically change any of his long-term goals or commitment to Iraq, she said.

Indeed, Rice argued that the Middle East is being rearranged in ways that provide the United States with new opportunities, what she repeatedly called a "new strategic context."

She said the range of struggles in the Middle East, such as the election of Hamas in the Palestinian territories, the conflict between Hezbollah and the Lebanese government, and strife in Iraq, represents a "clarifying moment" between extremists and what she called mainstream Arabs.

"This is a time for pushing and consulting and pressing and seeing what we can do to take advantage of this new strategic context," Rice said.

But she said democracy in the Middle East is "not going to be concluded on our watch" and acknowledged that "we've not always been able to pursue it in ways that have been effective."

"I take that criticism," she added.

Rice's comments on Iran and Syria were among her strongest on one of the key recommendations of the Iraq panel, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton. The report noted that Iran cooperated with the United States on Afghanistan and urged the administration to "explore whether this model could be replicated in the case of Iraq."

Bush called Iran part of an "axis of evil" shortly after the 2001 Bonn conference that led to the formation of the Afghan government, a label that Iranian diplomats have said soured Tehran's interest in cooperation.

In May, Rice offered to join talks on Iran's nuclear program if Tehran suspended its uranium-enrichment program, but Iran has rejected that condition. She said that Syrian officials have been unreceptive to previous entreaties by U.S. diplomats.

Negroponte noted that Iran was in a "defensive posture" three years ago when Iraq was invaded, wondering whether it would soon be a target. But now, flush with oil wealth, he said, it has become a major factor in the Middle East.

Rice said the administration's goal over the next two years is to give Iraqis the space to marginalize extremists and create a moderate middle that can hold the country together. The violence may not have ended before the administration leaves office, she acknowledged, but she said she hopes that Iraqis would "get to a place that is sustainable" by the end of 2008.

Although the administration is reviewing its troubled strategy in Iraq, Rice said the United States ultimately does not hold the key to solving the country's multifaceted military and political crises.

"The solutions to what is happening in Iraq lie in Baghdad, in their ability to deal with their own political differences," she said. The U.S. role is only in a support capacity, she said, reflecting the emerging undercurrent of the ongoing White House policy review to shift the mission from combat to support in both security and political reconciliation.

Rice said Iraqi officials have appealed to the administration to show greater flexibility and to hand over more responsibility to the new government, which was elected last December and took office in May.

DOJ_NMG_0106838

Rice voiced support for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki but said the full array of sectarian and ethnic leaders must be prepared to bring their diverse communities along in tackling the most sensitive issues, including political reconciliation and disarming militias.

The administration has been pressing this message in meetings with two of Iraq's most prominent leaders, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of Iraq's largest Shiite party, who was in Washington last week, and this week with Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, the highest-ranking Sunni in Iraq's government.

"You can't ask a prime minister in a democracy to take difficult steps that nobody will back that up," Rice said.

Although Shiite militias and death squads are behind much of the sectarian violence, Rice said she believes that most Iraqi Shiites are "firmly" on the side of democracy. The Shiite-dominated government is committed to Iraq's national identity and does not want Iraq to be dominated by Iran, Rice said.

Could Iran Help The US Stabilize Iraq? (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

TEHRAN, IRAN

The word "compromise" is rarely invoked when the leaders of archenemies Iran or the United States speak about each other.

But as the crisis in Iraq deepens, President Bush is being asked by a growing chorus, from the Iraq Study Group to Mideast experts, to appeal directly to Iran for help.

So far in public - as well as through diplomatic channels, sources here say - Iran and the US are laying down irreconcilable, maximalist positions that reflect very different worldviews about what such contact should achieve.

But even if Mr. Bush were to set aside his approach to Iran as part of an "axis of evil," the question remains of whether Iran is willing to help the US out in Iraq - and if so, at what price.

"Now is not the best time [for Iran to help], because [American] intent is only to solve the problems of the US in Iraq, and not those of Iran," says Amir Mohebian, an editor of the conservative Resalat newspaper.

"If the US wants to solve its problems in Iraq, it must see that as a package" of issues with Iran, says Mr. Mohebian, who has close links with power centers in the Islamic Republic. "The US should consider Iran's new position in the region; not just as one country, but as a regional power."

Earlier this year, both Washington and Tehran approved Iraq-specific talks between their officials in Baghdad, though none are known to have occurred. More recently, Bush has spoken disparagingly of bringing Iran into the Iraq equation.

"Fundamentally, the Bush administration refuses to have comprehensive talks with the Iranians," says a Western diplomat, noting that US officials continue to say that Iran is a top state sponsor of terrorism and that its nuclear-power program is a cover to build atomic weapons. Iran rejects those charges. "[But] even if you plan to get in some sort of contact, it makes sense to say 'never,' " as an initial bargaining stance, says the diplomat.

The White House has wanted to limit any dialogue with Iran to Iraq, or, in a separate offer last June, to the nuclear file. But as Iraq has deteriorated, and the demand for talks with Iran has intensified, Iran feels increasingly that it can demand much in exchange.

James Baker, co-chair of the Iraq Study Group, which met with Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the UN, has downplayed the likelihood of Iran's assistance.

"We're not naive enough to think that in this case [Iran] may want to help. They probably don't," Mr. Baker testified to Congress last week. "The president authorized me to approach the Iranian government. I did so. And they in effect said ... we would not be inclined to help you this time around."

Iran's price, analysts here say, could be a broader package that would, at the least, include ending action by the UN Security Council to draft a sanctions resolution over Iran's nuclear issue.

Iran may expect the US to accept its determination to continue enriching uranium, something the White House says must be suspended before talks. Recognition of the regime, after 27 years of estrangement, and a guarantee that Iran will not be a military target, are top priorities as well.

"I have no doubt, that if there is a serious attempt by the US administration for a comprehensive resolution of the problems between Iran and the US, Iran would be more than ready to help," says Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University. "But it is not going to be just about Iraq. Iran would be much more willing to do more, if it knew there is going to be a comprehensive [deal] with the US."

This calculus in Tehran represents a dramatic turnaround from the spring of 2003, when Iran's clerical leadership worried that they were "next" after Iraq on the target list for regime change.

DOJ_NMG_0106839

Feeling vulnerable, Iran sent an unprecedented secret letter to the White House, offering to talk about everything from its controversial nuclear program to support for Hizbullah and Hamas militants.

But the Bush team dismissed the offer, and even scolded the Swiss ambassador in Tehran at the time for passing the message on. Today, with the US bogged down in Iraq and looking for a facesaving way out, it is the Iranians who want to define the terms of any cooperation.

They often cite Afghanistan in 2001, when Iran helped the US defeat the Taliban and push out Al Qaeda with extensive intelligence and diplomatic aid, only to be labeled part of the "axis of evil" weeks later.

"It's a game. We think the US wants to use Iranian power to solve their problem in Iraq before the presidential election in 2008," says Mr. Mohebian. "After victory ... then it will be back to the old 'axis of evil.' "

A final Iranian decision will await more signals from the US, because "up to now, we hear only slogans," says Mohebian. "We don't want to look to the mouths of US leaders, but at their hands. After helping in Afghanistan, what was the result? It only helped the radicals in Iran."

Iran and the US share an interest in a stable Iraq that remains intact and is no longer a breeding ground for extremists, Iranian analysts say. But the Afghanistan case has made the regime uncertain.

"Now, if Iran helps the US contain the violence in Iraq, and [afterward the US] has a free hand, then 'OK, we're going to bomb you now. You are the next target,' " says Mr. Hadian-Jazy. "They should know which road they are putting a step in. They want to be sure."

Iran can't bring stability to Iraq, but it can use its influence - especially with fellow Shiites who run the embattled government - to ease the sectarian violence and help forge a unity government.

"The situation wouldn't be worse if Iran said it would help," says a European diplomat. "But the question is: How much better would it be?"

"[Iran] sees all this as pieces of a great big game, [and] the price will continue going up as the situation gets worse," says the diplomat. "The American request would include intelligence help - and this is very uncommon - [because Iranian] eyes and ears on the ground are the best in Iraq."

But such a request is far from certain. In a bid to talk over Iran's leaders, Bush has spoken kindly to the Iranian people, addressing their rich history and yearning for freedom, while accusing the government of supporting terrorism in Lebanon, the Palestinian territories, and Iraq, and secretly aiming for nuclear weapons.

Likewise, Iran's arch-conservative President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad - who has created friction with the West over comments about the destruction of Israel, and calling the Holocaust a "myth"- wrote a letter to the US public last week. Addressing "Noble Americans," Mr. Ahmadinejad said the American people were "God-fearing, truth-loving, and justice-seeking," according to an official translation, then blamed the administration for "blind and blanket support" of Israel, and for the "killing of hundreds of thousands of innocents" in Iraq that has not stopped terrorism.

"The sad experience of invading Iraq is before us all," he said, in an approach that contrasts sharply with that of his predecessor, President Mohamad Khatami, who touted a "dialogue of civilizations."

"As a counterpoint to George Bush and his irrational behavior, the right choice was not Mr. Khatami; the right choice was Mr. Ahmadinejad," says editor Mohebian. "If the US can calculate our behavior ... the US could attack us."

"Mr. Khatami showed all the pockets to [the US]," he adds. "But because the behavior of Ahmadinejad can't be forecast, [the US] can't calculate the reaction. So before any military action, they will think twice."

Rice Lying Low At The Middle East Crossroads (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Edward Luce And William Wallis

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

While US policy in the Middle East has stalled at multiple crossroads in the search for a "new way forward" in Iraq, Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has been notable only for her low visibility.

As one of President George W. Bush's closest confidantes, Ms Rice is likely to play a pivotal role in the outcome, however. Still, many are asking whether she will take the risk and seize the opportunity to direct a comprehensive change of course in the region in the two years they have left.

A new low was plumbed in the US's international standing when, on the 10th day of Lebanon's summer war, with civilian casualties mounting from Israeli attacks, Ms Rice declared the world was witnessing the "birth pangs of a new Middle East".

Since then, the pro-western Lebanese government has been seriously weakened, the conflict in Iraq has intensified, and the Palestinian territories are close to civil war. Meanwhile, Washington's adversaries – Iran, Syria and Sudan – have been emboldened.

DOJ_NMG_0106840

Ms Rice appears to be on the brink of ignoring the first of the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group – that she and Mr Bush launch a comprehensive "new diplomatic offensive" by December 31.

This would involve initiatives to support Iraq through an international support group, active engagement of Iran and Syria, and the launch of a "renewed and sustained commitment to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts". Her personal role in exploiting this remains in doubt.

"How long have American secretaries of state been shuttling back and forth trying to get a Palestinian state? Has it ever worked?" she asked in an interview with Agence France Presse.

She and Mr Bush have repeatedly rejected the notion of unconditional engagement with Iran and Syria. Containment is driving policy towards Iran, but some European diplomats still believe there is a chance the US will restart a dialogue with Syria.

Allies of Ms Rice say there would be no gain for her at this stage in sticking her head above the parapet.

"The smart thing to do would be to be working quietly behind the scenes with the Saudis and the Israelis to try to get the peace process on the road again," says Dov Zakheim, a former Pentagon official.

M.R. Rosenberg, director of policy analysis at the Israel Policy Forum, which advocates a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, said he was struck by the sense of urgency of Prince Turki al-Faisal, the Saudi ambassador, who abruptly terminated his mission to Washington on Monday. That day the ambassador stressed the importance of Israel and "moderate Arab states" working together to resolve their differences, as they faced what he called a common threat from Iran.

But Prince Turki did not seem optimistic that the Bush administration would launch such a serious initiative, Mr Rosenberg said.

Some see signs that Israel would be prepared to talk to Syria over the Golan Heights but that Washington is holding Tel Aviv back. "The Israelis are ready to talk to Syria – but it is being blocked in Washington," said Chas Freeman, a former US ambassador.

When Ms Rice has met her Middle Eastern counterparts in recent months, Arab officials tried to press the urgent need for momentum on the Arab-Israeli conflict to counter more radical agendas sweeping through the region.

"This has been the broad message every time she speaks to Arab foreign ministers. I think she gets it. But I think Washington is lost in its own dynamics and those dynamics still have a lot of ideology," said a senior Arab official.

So far, they say, she has lacked the entrepreneurial touch in the Middle East. "It's not easy trying to move the Palestinian-Israeli situation forward, especially if you have within your ranks people who believe Israel is always right whatever it does and the Palestinians are always evil," said an Arab diplomat. "Our problem with people like Condoleezza Rice is they take too long to understand the reality on the ground, which is a different reality than the one explained to them."

Others are even less generous. "They [Arab regimes] don't believe she can change the dynamics because they see her as part of the problem," says a well-connected Saudi commentator. "She is gung-ho on Iran and she doesn't believe there are two sides to the Palestinian problem." Since the Lebanon war Ms Rice has expressed regret that the US had not done more to stop the suffering of civilians. But she also sticks to blaming Hizbollah for their deaths and for triggering the conflict.

Emile El-Hokayem, analyst at the Stimson Center, a US-based think-tank, says others draw their own conclusions. "The lesson for many Arabs is that the US will always side with Israel no matter what, and that being America's ally does not necessarily bring substantive political benefits when most needed," he comments. "America emerged as unreliable in Lebanon and incompetent in Iraq. The consequences of this for America's image in the region are serious."

"Restarting the peace process might be a way for Secretary Rice to improve her record. But this is a long shot because none of the actors in the region seems ready to go down this road."

Saudi Ex-ambassador Urged No US Talks With Iran (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

The US State Department said Saudi Arabia's former ambassador here recently visited Washington, adding spice to reports he was involved in a power struggle which caused his successor to quit.

Prince Bandar bin Sultan, was the kingdom's top envoy to the United States for 22 years until 2004. The Washington Post reported Thursday he was in the US capital recently to counsel top officials against heeding mounting calls for talks with Iran or Syria.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack reluctantly confirmed Prince Bandar met Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, when pressed by reporters, but refused to divulge the substance of their conversation.

"I can't tell you the last time that he and the secretary met," McCormack said. "I'm sure that it's been within the past several weeks, but I can't tell you exactly when."

The Post quoted diplomats as saying many Saudis believed Syria had betrayed the Arab world by leaning closer to Iran in recent months.

DOJ_NMG_0106841

Saudi Arabia has shown increasing signs of concern over Tehran's growing influence with Iraqi Shiite leaders, and its nuclear showdown with the West.

Interestingly, the mission of Prince Bandar, current Saudi national security advisor, seems to directly conflict, on Iran, at least, with recent statements on Tehran by his successor as ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal.

Prince Turki set off a diplomatic mystery on Monday by suddenly resigning and leaving the United States for what were a Saudi official said were "personal reasons."

Among several theories about his departure, was a report that he was locked in a political feud with Bandar.

Signs of differences over Iran may hint at some of the reasons behind any clash, as Prince Turki has publicly urged the United States to enter into dialogue with Iran.

"Saudi Arabia talks to Iran frequently and frankly," Prince Turki said during an an appearance at the Center for Strategic and International Studies on October 4.

"I think for the United States not to talk to Iran is a mistake. We've found in our experience that when we did not talk to Iran -- our relations were broken for a period of a few years in the '90s -- we had more troubles with each other.

"But since then, our relationship has improved dramatically and beneficially for both our countries. So we think that negotiation and talking to people is more important than shutting the doors on them."

The United States is at loggerheads with the Islamic Republic over a series of issues, including Tehran's nuclear program, and also claims Tehran is deliberately fanning extremism in Iraq and the wider Middle East.

White House: Syrian Visits Hurt Progress (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 15, 2006

The White House said Thursday that trips to Syria by U.S. lawmakers are a public relations victory for a government that is thwarting democratic reform in the Middle East.

The Bush administration has tried to discourage lawmakers from going to Syria, White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We think it's inappropriate."

Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Fla., emerged from a meeting with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus on Wednesday, saying Assad was willing to help control the Iraq-Syrian border. Nelson said he viewed Assad's remarks as "a crack in the door for discussions to continue. I approach this with realism, not optimism."

Snow said the trip by Nelson, a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, and future visits to Syria expected by Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa., send an unhelpful, mixed message to the Syrians.

"We want to make sure that they understand that just because they have visitors does not mean that the position of the United States government has changed," Snow said.

Taking issue with the White House, Dodd said in a statement that members of Congress "need to go to hotspots not just garden spots. I can't think of a more critical part of the world than the Middle East and I can't think of a more critical player in affecting events in the region for good or for bad than Syria."

Kerry spokesman David Wade said the senators were engaged in fact finding, not negotiating. "If Ronald Reagan could talk to the 'evil empire,' surely United States senators with a responsibility to American troops can visit Syria," Wade said, referring to Reagan's description of the former Soviet Union.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended that the administration engage in direct talks with Syria, but President Bush has reacted coolly to that suggestion.

"The point is that even lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region," Snow said about Nelson's trip.

Nelson's spokesman Dan McLaughlin called the remarks a "baseless attack" and said the White House was producing the "same old tired, mean-spirited partisan politics" that were unhelpful to the situation in Iraq. McLaughlin defended Nelson's trip as par for the course for a senator who sits on three oversight committees: Armed Services, Foreign Relations and Intelligence.

"In Syria, he met with a man he's met with twice before — not to negotiate, which is the president's job, but to talk and gather facts and report back to Congress and the State Department," McLaughlin said. "Senators meet with heads of state all the time."

The United States has limited diplomatic ties with Syria because of its support of Hezbollah and Hamas, which the United States considers terrorist organizations. Bush expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrian government curbs that support and reduces its influence in Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0106842

"The Syrians should have absolutely no doubt that the position of the United States government is the same as it has been," Snow said.

Bush Administration Says Senator's Trip To Damascus Is A Mistake (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The White House on Thursday escalated its criticism of Florida Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson's defiant diplomacy to Syria as a parade of other senators prepared to meet with the president of the country.

At a press briefing, White House spokesman Tony Snow repeated his contention that the Nelson's trip was "not helpful" and "not appropriate." He charged that "lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region."

President Bush has accused Syria of backing the insurgents now fighting in Iraq.

Nelson, on what he described as a fact-finding tour of the Middle East, told reporters on a conference call Wednesday that he met for an hour with Bashar Assad, saying the Syrian president "clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate" with the U.S. or Iraqi army to secure the border between the two countries. Nelson said he viewed the talks as a "crack in the door" for discussions to continue, but cautioned that he viewed the meeting "with realism, not optimism."

A spokesman for Nelson noted Thursday that senators "meet with heads of states all the time" and called Snow's criticism "the same-old, tired, mean-spirited partisan politics.

"Instead of launching partisan attacks, they should be doing what they recently promised to do: conduct business in a bipartisan way," said Nelson spokesman Dan McLaughlin. "That's the only way we're going to find a solution in Iraq.

Though the Iraq Study Group is recommending a stepped-up diplomatic effort involving Syria and Iran to stem the violence in neighboring Iraq, the White House has expressed reluctance, pointing to Syria's backing of terrorist groups and its record of meddling in Lebanon.

Snow insisted the visits were not undermining the president's stance. But he said the meeting at the presidential palace, along with planned visits by Senators John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa., could send confusing messages about the U.S. stance toward the country.

"The United States has a clear position, and you want to make sure that you're sending a clear message, and not mixed messages, to the Syrians about the fact that they have obligations," Snow said, noting that the U.S. insists Syria "stop serving as headquarters" for terrorist groups. "They would love for us to talk with them. But they've got to do something. We want to make sure that they understand that just because they have visitors does not mean that the position of the United States government has changed."

Nelson acknowledged Wednesday that the State Department was not happy with his decision to meet with Assad, but said he had a "constitutional role as a member of Congress" to meet with the president.

McLaughlin noted that Nelson was not negotiating, "which is the president's job," but gathering facts to report back to Congress. Nelson was recently named to the Senate Intelligence Committee and is already a member of the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees.

White House Criticizes Senator's Syria Trip (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

The White House sharply criticized a US senator's trip to Syria as "not helpful" and "not appropriate" and warned Damascus not to see the visit as an indirect overture from Washington.

"Even lending a further specter of legitimacy to that government undermines the cause of democracy in the region," spokesman Tony Snow said after Democratic Senator Ben Nelson met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

"We do have diplomatic relations with the Syrians. And they do know what our position is. And that position is not going to change," he said. "The president is in charge of foreign policy. It may cost some people their credibility."

The Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James Baker recently urged US President George W. Bush to engage Tehran and Damascus in an effort to secure their help in quelling violence tearing Iraq apart.

On Thursday, Democratic Senator John Kerry, Bush's 2004 rival for the White House, lent qualified support to that suggestion, saying during a visit to Cairo: "I think it's important to begin a discussion."

"I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest," Kerry said after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

The White House, however, took a dim view of the suggestion.

DOJ_NMG_0106843

"The Syrians have been adventurous and meddlesome in Iraq, and in Lebanon, and working against the causes of democracy in both of those countries," Snow said. "It's absolutely vital that the democracies succeed in both places."

"And therefore, the Syrians should have absolutely no doubt that the position of the United States government is the same as it has been," he said.

"They need to stop harboring terrorists. They need to stop supporting terrorism in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere. They need to stop serving as headquarters for terrorist organizations. And they need to demonstrate goodwill," he said.

Nelson said Thursday he had had a "sharp disagreement" with Assad over UN-endorsed plans for an international tribunal into the February 2005 murder of Lebanese ex-premier Rafiq Hariri.

The senator from Florida, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is the first US lawmaker to visit Damascus since January 2005. Fellow Democrat Chris Dodd is to travel to Damascus later in the week.

In a statement, Dodd said US lawmakers "need to go to hotspots not just garden spots. I cant think of a more critical part of the world than the Middle East, and I cant think of a more critical player in effecting events in the region for good or for bad than Syria."

"That is why I have decided to include a stop in Syria during my seven day fact finding trip to the region," Dodd said.

Snow dismissed such arguments.

"A lot of times a member of Congress may think, 'Well, I'm going to go there, and I'm going to tell them. I'm going to tell them exactly the same thing. I'm going to take a tough line,'" said the spokesman.

"You can take a tough line all you want, but the Syrians have already won a PR (public relations) victory. And so it's important to realize that in this case, it is not that there is a want of communication," he added.

White House Upset By Senator's Trip To Syria (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The White House said Thursday that a Democratic senator's meeting with President Bashar al-Assad of Syria was inappropriate and undermined democracy in the region, while three more senators, including a Republican, made plans to visit Damascus in defiance of President Bush.

The visits are troublesome for the Bush administration because they come in the wake of the report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which has called for the United States to engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria. Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted such talks, and the visits by the senators could add to public pressure on the White House to change that policy.

Senator Bill Nelson, Democrat of Florida, was in Damascus on Wednesday to meet with Mr. Assad; he later told reporters that he saw a "crack in the door" for the United States to cooperate with Syria on Iraq. Senators Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut; John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts; and Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania; all plan to visit Syria in the coming weeks.

All have been discouraged by the Bush administration from going, though both Mr. Nelson and Mr. Kerry, who were traveling separately in the Middle East on Thursday, said in interviews that they had visited Syria before without any complaint from the White House.

"The bottom line is we have a very clear and distinct responsibility to ask questions," said Mr. Kerry, speaking by telephone from Cairo. "A lot of Americans wish a lot more questions, a lot tougher questions, had been asked before we got into the mess we're in over here."

Mr. Dodd said, "Members need to go to hot spots, not just garden spots."

Mr. Specter, a moderate Republican who has often been at odds with the White House on domestic issues, said in a statement on the Senate floor this month that he had long advocated negotiating with Syria. "We need to keep our friends close and our enemies closer," he said.

The back-and-forth over Syria appeared to be emerging as a proxy for the broader battle over American policy in the Middle East, which is unfolding even as Mr. Bush weighs a new strategy for the United States in Iraq.

With the Democrats about to take control of Congress after an election that was widely viewed as a referendum on the war, the visits reflect an increasing willingness to challenge the White House over foreign policy. The sharpness of the White House response, meanwhile, suggests an appetite to use the issue as a basis for a political fight.

"We think it's inappropriate," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said on Thursday, adding, "The concern here, among other things, is that this does not strengthen the hand of democracy in the region."

Mr. Snow said the visits "may cost some people their credibility." He singled out Mr. Nelson in particular, saying the Florida senator "came back empty-handed" after his last meeting with Mr. Assad. At the time, the senator reported that Mr. Assad had told him he was willing to restart negotiations with the Israelis — but that has never happened.

DOJ_NMG_0106844

The White House contends that Syria is helping to fuel the insurgency in Iraq, and it is particularly incensed at Syria for supporting Hezbollah, the militant group in Lebanon, and for trying to destabilize the Lebanese government. Mr. Nelson, who was in Lebanon on Thursday to meet with Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and other officials there, said in a telephone interview from Qatar, where he went after his stop in Lebanon, that he had "sharp exchanges" with Mr. Assad over that very issue — and that he reported those exchanges to Mr. Siniora.

"I told Prime Minister Siniora that I told Assad to keep his hands off Lebanon," the senator said. He said he approached his meetings in Syria with "realism, not optimism," and added of Mr. Assad, "I don't trust him at all."

Despite the harsh words from the White House, the Bush administration does have diplomatic ties with Syria, and Mr. Nelson said American Embassy officials have been "just ecstatic" to receive reports from his visits, "because so often they don't have access to a highly controversial leader in the country until somebody like a senator comes along."

Mr. Nelson said he had already briefed R. Nicholas Burns, the State Department's third ranking official, about his meeting with Mr. Assad.

While Mr. Nelson was in Damascus, the White House on Wednesday issued a statement under Mr. Bush's name in which the president called for the immediate release of Syrian political prisoners. "Syrians deserve a government whose legitimacy is grounded in the consent of the people, not brute force," the statement said.

Mr. Snow said Thursday that the statement was not timed to coincide with Mr. Nelson's visit.

Kerry Urges Bush To Engage Iran, Syria On Iraq (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

US Senator John Kerry urged his rival in the 2004 elections, President George W. Bush, to kindle a dialogue with Iran and Syria in a bid to stabilize Iraq.

"I think it's important to talk, to have dialogue, but you don't give up your principles and you don't make deals that are against your larger interest," Kerry told reporters after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo.

"Syria needs to understand that and Iran needs to understand that, but I think it's important to begin a discussion."

Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, said his talks with Mubarak also covered the Middle East peace process and the situation in Lebanon.

"Syria needs to respect Lebanon's sovereignty," he stressed.

Kerry, whose Democratic Party will dominate the next US Congress, is still in the running to vie for the presidency a second time.

A review of US policy in Iraq co-authored by former secretary of state James Baker and published earlier this month urged the current US administration to engage Iran and Syria to help achieve peace and security in Iraq.

But Bush has vowed not be rushed into changing strategy and has resisted mounting calls to open fully-fledged talks with Syria and Iran.

What Syria Would Say (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria -- What positions would Syria take if it entered a dialogue with the United States about Iraq and other Middle East issues? I put that question Thursday to Walid Moallem, Syria's foreign minister, and he offered surprisingly strong support for the recommendations made last week in the Baker-Hamilton report.

"We are not against the U.S.," Moallem said. "To the contrary, we want to be part of a regional dialogue that, in our opinion, serves American interests in the region." He described America and the region as being at a "crossroads" and said: "Either we go for stability, or the region will fall, and religious civil wars and the extremists behind them will take over."

Moallem's comments are the most detailed Syrian response to the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton. As we made a line-by-line review of the group's recommendations involving Syria, Moallem expressed support for nearly every item. When I asked if Syrian President Bashar al-Assad endorsed these positions, he answered: "He is the leader. I am expressing his ideas."

Moallem portrayed Syria as a potential partner in stabilizing the region. He referred at one point to "the noble cause of peace between Syria and Israel." Later, he said that while Syria favors a timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, a rapid American withdrawal before Iraqis are ready to take over security would be "an immoral step."

The Bush administration has shown little interest in dialogue with Damascus, and the administration has been sharply critical of Syria's campaign against Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a key U.S. ally. Administration officials have said in the past that although Syria speaks of a desire for cooperation and dialogue, its actions -- in Lebanon and elsewhere -- have not matched its words.

DOJ_NMG_0106845

A former Syrian ambassador to Washington, Moallem worked with Baker on diplomatic issues involving the 1991 Madrid peace conference, which opened the way for peace talks between Syria and Israel that were ultimately unsuccessful. The Syrian said that when they met again in September to discuss the Iraq Study Group, Baker asked him: " 'Walid, how can we return to the Syrian-American situation of the early 1990s, when we succeeded to build mutual trust?' I told him, 'This is our wish also in Syria.' "

Moallem argued that the Bush administration's efforts to isolate Syria have failed and that it's time for the administration to try another approach based on shared Syrian-American interests in three goals for the Mideast: peace, stability and prosperity. He said that although Syria hoped to recover the Golan Heights, it was not setting this as a condition for dialogue.

"A constructive dialogue has to start without preconditions," he said. He denied that Syria was seeking greater power in Lebanon as the price for its help in Iraq. "This is not a deal. This is not, 'We will do this if you give us Lebanon,' " he said. But he did note that if America wanted dialogue, "you need to reassure us about your good intentions concerning our stability."

Syria has already begun implementing some of the Baker-Hamilton recommendations for Iraq, Moallem said. With this month's restoration of Syrian-Iraqi diplomatic ties, he explained, the two countries are beginning joint efforts to control their border and increase political and economic cooperation, as called for by the Iraq Study Group. "We are not doing this to please the U.S. We are doing what is in the Syrian and Iraqi interest," he said.

Moallem said he supported the report's recommendation for an Iraq Support Group that would draw in Syria and other neighboring states, but only after the Iraqis themselves had agreed on plans for disarming militias and ending sectarian divisions. He said that the timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops "depends on Iraqi ability to take over security" and that America's military role there should focus on training rather than fighting.

On the specific Baker-Hamilton recommendations involving Lebanon, Moallem also expressed general support. He said Syria wasn't shipping arms to Hezbollah, that it would "continue our cooperation" with the U.N. investigation of the murder of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri and that it was "ready" to "achieve a deal on exchanging prisoners" with Israel. He also disclosed what he said was a previously unreported effort by Syria and Qatar to broker a compromise between the radical Palestinian group Hamas and the moderate Fatah faction of President Mahmoud Abbas.

Is this Syrian gambit for real? Is Moallem serious in his offer to talk with America about a comprehensive package of peace with Israel, stability for Iraq and compromise in Lebanon? The answer is that there's really only one way to find out, which is to explore further the ideas the Syrian foreign minister has put on the table.

Atranscriptof the writer's interview with Walid Moallem is available athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. David Ignatius co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

New General Takes The Reins As No. 2 U.S. Commander In Iraq (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

CAMP VICTORY, IRAQ — Army Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno assumed command of U.S. troops at a ceremony in the capital on Thursday, vowing to pursue more than just combat to resolve the conflict in Iraq.

"This is not just a military solution only," he said to the crowd assembled outside one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces near the U.S. military headquarters. "It is a combination of diplomatic, economic and military programs."

But those who know Odierno say the hard-charging general who plotted Hussein's capture as well as anti-insurgency operations may put more effort toward securing, rather than rebuilding, Iraq when he becomes the No. 2 U.S. commander here.

Odierno gained a reputation as an aggressive commander while leading the 4th Infantry Division in Sunni Arab-dominated parts of the country in 2003 and '04. Some military analysts have argued that the region's continued unrest can be traced to his heavy-handed methods.

Odierno's predecessor, Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, was seen as a champion of more comprehensive strategies aimed at winning over local populations, including large-scale public works programs and restrained firepower in the face of sectarian warfare.

Despite sporadic violent uprisings against his forces, Chiarelli, a former West Point professor, was able to stabilize the volatile Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Sadr City in Baghdad by putting locals to work on a large sewage system and assigning some of his top soldiers to work with nascent Iraqi security forces.

Chiarelli also is popular in Washington, where he is in contention to replace his commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who may leave before summer.

DOJ_NMG_0106846

At Thursday's ceremony, Casey praised Chiarelli's approach to securing Iraq.

"I will always remember your personal passion for building a better life for the Iraqi people," Casey told the crowd, which included U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and several regional U.S. military commanders.

Chiarelli spoke of working side by side with Iraqis in the last year to rebuild the country, in a speech sprinkled with quotes from President Theodore Roosevelt and economist John Stuart Mill.

Odierno sat nearby, surveying the crowd of about 300 soldiers, sailors and Marines. He cut an imposing figure, still looking like the tight end he was at West Point: head shaved, jaw squared, brown eyes piercing. Raised by a World War II Army sergeant, Odierno saw his son enter the military and lose an arm after being wounded by insurgents in Baghdad.

When Odierno spoke, he paraphrased Gen. Douglas MacArthur, the hawkish World War II commander who advocated the use of nuclear weapons against the Chinese during the Korean War: "No man is entitled to the blessings of freedom unless he is vigilant in their protections."

People close to Odierno say his characterization as an overly aggressive commander with a style antithetical to Chiarelli's is unwarranted. They say he has become more attuned to the importance of "soft" power during his last two years as an assistant to Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Chiarelli said Thursday that he believed Odierno shared his belief that it would take more than military force to bring peace to Iraq. Odierno suggested political solutions to the latest sectarian conflicts, such as setting a date for provincial elections and integrating sectarian militias into the army.

But he was at his most passionate when talking about counterinsurgency.

"We are going to go after any — any — individual who attacks the government, who attacks the security forces and who attacks coalition forces, no matter who they are and no matter who they are associated with," he said.

Odierno said his first task would be developing Iraqi security forces. His second: supporting Iraqi security forces "to defeat those extremists who do not want to conform to Iraq."

Odierno added that his style hadn't changed much since his days in the northern Iraqi city of Tikrit. "I'm aggressive in whatever I do," he said. "I'm an aggressive personality." Odierno's spokesman said the general planned to meet with commanders this week to discuss his strategy.

Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a spokeswoman at Baghdad coalition headquarters who worked with Odierno in Tikrit, said he was aggressive, "but never overly aggressive." Members of the 4th Infantry Division have a reputation for fighting hard, she said, but they had to, at least at first.

"It was always going to be about more than combat power. We knew that," she said.

Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow in foreign policy studies at the Washington-based Brookings Institution who visited Odierno in Tikrit in 2003, said he saw the general use only "proper counterinsurgency methods," such as spending military money to create jobs for locals. That was also the approach taken in the northern city of Mosul by Gen. David H. Petraeus, commander of the Army's 101st Airborne Division and another possible contender for Casey's job.

"I think Odierno's legacy is clearly complex," O'Hanlon said. "He does not enjoy the reputation for excellence in counterinsurgency that Gen. Petraeus and Gen. Chiarelli and certain other officers enjoy. But the jury is still out in my mind on whether he will do this new job well. Quite possibly he can."

'We're Seeing Positive Results' (USAT)

By William B. Caldwell IV

USA Today, December 15, 2006

The Iraqi people and the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) share a vision for Iraq: a secure, stable and self-governing nation in which Iraqis find solutions to Iraqi problems. To do this, the government of Iraq must achieve national reconciliation, rebuild Iraq's infrastructure to provide basic services and — in partnership with coalition forces — defeat the terrorists and extremists seeking to sow the seeds of discord and division among the Iraqi people.

The best way to achieve this last goal is to transition more authority and responsibility for Iraq's security to Iraqis. Iraqi forces have the best understanding of their culture, language and geography — all skills vital to defeating an insurgency. Once sufficiently trained, equipped and mentored, the Iraqi Security Force will be the most effective weapon against the foreign and extremist elements trying to tear apart Iraq.

For more than 30 years, the Iraqi army was a tool of oppression. Three years ago, there were virtually no security forces in Iraq. Today, Iraqis are protected by a trained and equipped military and police force, one that will soon number more than 350,000.

Quality is improving with quantity. Eighty percent of the Iraqi army is already operating with limited coalition support. Recent independent Iraqi operations in Baghdad, Baqubah and elsewhere have captured senior leaders of al-Qaeda in Iraq, freed dozens of kidnapping victims and uncovered massive weapons caches that would have been turned into car bombs capable of killing hundreds of innocent Iraqis.

DOJ_NMG_0106847

Challenges remain. Iraqi forces have deficiencies in logistics, leadership and, in some cases, loyalty. The best way for the Iraqi Security Force to enhance its capabilities and values is through partnership with coalition transition teams. So MNF-I has strengthened how we train and mentor Iraqi forces.

Transition teams combine the best kind of leadership: leadership by example, with the best kind of education: learning through experience. We are seeing positive results with the way these dedicated troops develop capable Iraqi forces that are loyal to the democratically elected, representative unity government and to all of Iraq's people. That is why we are creating more military, police and border transition teams, increasing their size and accelerating their use.

Exporting military professionalism and developing Iraqi forces are vital to our national interest. We win when they win.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV is spokesman for the Multi-National Force in Iraq.

White House Defends Enemy Body Count (AP)

AP, December 15, 2006

The White House expressed concern Thursday about what it believes is an impression that American forces in Iraq "aren't doing anything, they're just targets."

In fact, said presidential spokesman Tony Snow, U.S. troops are "fighting the bad guys" and killing and capturing them.

Snow raised the point when asked to explain why President Bush, a day earlier, had said that 5,900 enemy forces had been killed or captured in Iraq during October, November and the first week of December.

Typically, Bush and White House officials do not talk about enemy body counts, although the Pentagon keeps a running total on the number of American losses. More than 2,930 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003.

"There is quite often the impression ... that our people aren't doing anything, they're just targets," Snow said at his daily press briefing. "And I think there's a certain amount of unease in the American public because they hear about deaths but they don't hear about what's going on."

Snow said the government has been loath to do body counts since the practice was discredited during the Vietnam War. "But it probably is worth at least giving a general impression of relative battlefield success of what's going on."

Troops In Iraq To Get Fire-resistant Uniforms (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Flame-resistant uniforms will be standard issue for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan by early 2007, Pentagon officials say.

More than 160,000 suits made of the flame-retardant fabric NOMEX will be sent to combat zones, said Thomas Edwards, assistant deputy chief of staff for Army logistics.

The Pentagon moved quickly, Edwards said, because Iraqi insurgents are using homemade bombs and targeting the fuel tanks of vehicles. The bombs, called improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, are the top killer of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"Guys in the area of operations said, 'Give us all the fireproof uniforms you can find and then kick up production,' " Edwards said.

After receiving the Army's request Sept. 21, the Pentagon shipped 70,000 suits by Oct. 13 to outfit troops who patrol outside U.S. bases, Edwards said. It will cost about $70 million for the uniforms, hoods and gloves.

NOMEX, a DuPont-manufactured fiber, resists burning for about 9 seconds, long enough to allow troops to escape from a burning vehicle, Edwards said.

Troops are urged to drink extra liquids to keep from overheating because of the suits' added layer of protection, said Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman.

Margo Hughey, a 68-year-old grandmother from Columbus, Ind., said she has raised $2,000 to buy the suits for troops after learning of attacks with diesel-soaked explosives from relatives serving in Iraq. She and friend April Johnson, 41, also contacted Indiana's two senators — Republican Richard Lugar and Democrat Evan Bayh — because they did not believe the Pentagon had acted quickly enough.

"When I learned our own family members were in extreme danger, and it did not look like they would be supplied by the DOD (Department of Defense) or the Army I knew I must do something," Hughey said.

Lugar contacted the Pentagon but had not received a response, spokesman Andy Fisher said.

DOJ_NMG_0106848

Edwards said the Pentagon moved quickly: "I don't know how long it took Granny to raise that two thousand bucks, but it couldn't have been a helluva lot faster than we did in getting these uniforms."

Sectarian And Ethnic Lines In Sand Stall Provision Of Iraqi Oil Law (NYT)

By Edward Wong

New York Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 — Iraqi politicians and ministers are divided along ethnic and sectarian lines over a critical provision in a proposed national oil law, according to the country's oil minister. If the differences can be bridged, the draft could be unveiled soon, the minister, Hussain al-Shahristani, said this week.

The oil law, along with security, is considered a prerequisite for attracting the foreign investment that Iraq's oil sector desperately needs. The law would set guidelines for development contracts for as many as 60 oil fields in the country, Mr. Shahristani said in an interview.

The law is also a crucial step in the process of national reconciliation, American and Iraqi officials said, because it sets out rules for the equitable distribution of the country's oil wealth. That, in turn, could ease tensions over granting greater autonomy to Iraq's regions.

Sunni Arabs, who dominate the oil-poor areas of western Iraq, have opposed regional autonomy because they believe they would not get a fair share of the country's oil wealth, which is concentrated in the Shiite south and the Kurdish north. Although agreement has been reached on the sharing of oil revenues, representatives of the main Sunni Arab, Shiite and Kurdish political blocs remain at odds over the issue of control over contracts to develop oil fields, Mr. Shahristani said. The representatives sit on a committee that is reviewing a draft of the law written by the Oil Ministry.

The sticking point is regional versus central government control over the contracts. The Sunni Arabs want the central government's Oil Ministry to negotiate and approve development contracts, while the Kurds want the regional governments to have those powers, said Mr. Shahristani, a conservative Shiite. The Shiites fall in between; they say the law should permit each region to negotiate its own contracts, but they want the contracts to be subject to the approval of a proposed Federal Oil and Gas Council, Mr. Shahristani said.

American officials here have been increasing pressure on the Iraqis to present a draft of the law, and perhaps even approve it, by the end of the year. In its report, the Iraq Study Group said that an equitable distribution of oil wealth was necessary for national reconciliation, and recommended that the central government keep control of revenues and oil fields, to the chagrin of the Kurds, who insist on maximum autonomy.

Once the oil law is in place, the federal council will announce a round of bids for the development of fields that have been identified but are not producing, Mr. Shahristani said. Iraq has 80 known fields, 20 of which are producing oil and will be developed by the Iraq National Oil Company, he said. Development of the others would be offered up for bids.

Oil contracts signed with foreign companies by Saddam Hussein's government would be reviewed by the federal council to see whether they should be honored or scrapped, Mr. Shahristani said. The various parties have agreed that oil revenues will be allotted to the regions through the central government's budget process, he said. That means the central government would be able to use money to finance its needs before giving the rest to the regions. Earlier in the negotiations over the oil law, the Kurds had insisted that the revenues be automatically divided and distributed to the regions first.

Gunmen Kidnap Shopkeepers, Bystanders In Baghdad (MCT)

By Mohamed Al Dulaimy And Hannah Allam

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Kadhim Mahdi ran a lucrative carpentry business in west Baghdad, but he closed his shop when clashes and car bombs shut down his neighborhood.

Next, he became a grocer - until three other grocers in the area were assassinated. Then he fled without even daring to retrieve his expensive shopping carts and his electrical generator.

Mahdi moved across the Tigris River to east Baghdad six months ago, thinking that his new job selling spare parts for water pumps was so safe that he could even take his 4-year-old son to work with him.

On Thursday morning, however, Mahdi was feeding his son cake at his shop when gunmen dressed in Iraqi police and army uniforms descended on the Sinak district and kidnapped dozens of shopkeepers and bystanders in the latest of a string of mass abductions in Baghdad.

"They were shooting in the air and chasing after the crowds running away," Mahdi said. "My son asked me, 'Dad, are we going to die?'"

DOJ_NMG_0106849

The brazen attack took place barely a mile from the heavily guarded government compound known as the Green Zone, where Iraqi officials were preparing for a weekend conference on national reconciliation.

The Sinak attack was the most notable incident on a day packed with other violence that reflects the lawlessness that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's beleaguered government appears unable to curb. Police reported the discoveries of 45 bodies in the capital Thursday, 42 in the mainly Sunni Muslim western side and three in the predominantly Shiite Muslim eastern side.

A leading Shiite politician, Adil Abdul Mahdi, escaped an apparent assassination attempt Thursday when gunmen fired on his motorcade in a majority-Sunni neighborhood, police said. Abdul Mahdi, of the Iranian-backed Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, is considered a moderate Islamist and a favorite of Washington officials, who've tried unsuccessfully to maneuver him into the prime minister's seat.

At the scene of the mass kidnapping in Sinak, a small industrial area where Iraqis shop for refrigerator motors and power tools, Kadhim Mahdi and three other witnesses said that police at a checkpoint watched as the abductors rounded up 30 to 70 men and stuffed them into 10 or more paddy wagons and other vehicles that Iraqi security forces typically used.

The attack was especially confounding, the witnesses said, because the kidnappers didn't appear to follow a sectarian agenda, seizing Sunnis, Shiites and Christians alike.

"First, they came to a Sunni-owned shop ... they took him and I thought it was because he was a Sunni, but then they turned to the others," said Qahtan, 23, who escaped by hiding in the mud underneath a truck and was too scared to divulge his full name. "The second one was Christian, and he was telling him, 'I'm a Christian! I'm a Christian!' One of them answered, 'Christian, Shiite, Sunni, you're going to come with us.'"

Qahtan, who sells tools in Sinak, said he saw the gunmen load 30 men into the enclosed police-style vans and other vehicles bearing the camouflage markings of the Iraqi army, then return for others. He said the captives shouted for police to help them but that no one responded.

Another witness, Haider Jassim, 22, said a sniper had shot at passers-by earlier this week from a position near a bridge that leads to the area, so at first he was relieved that the security forces finally had responded. He said he quickly grew dismayed when the forces targeted merchants and began shooting randomly into crowds of people attempting to flee.

"There were two police vehicles, but they did nothing to help people," Jassim said. "On the contrary, they were positioned in a way that blocked the path after the (attackers) fled. ... We don't know who they were, but for sure they'll ask for ransom for some of (those seized), kill some and so on. Like the usual daily incidents."

Iraqi Interior Ministry officials said that as many as 29 of the abductees - all Shiites - were released unharmed Thursday evening. Police gave no information as to how many were kidnapped or who was behind the attack.

"On Saturday, when people come back to their shops, we'll count who is missing and find out the real number taken," Qahtan said. "They'll kill the Sunnis and throw them in a Shiite neighborhood and they'll kill the Shiites and throw them in a Sunni neighborhood after checking their IDs."

Kadhim Mahdi, a Shiite, said he escaped by grabbing his son and running across the street to an apartment building, where residents offered them shelter. He said he cradled his trembling son in his arms and decided that it was time to look for yet another line of work.

Al Dulaimy is a McClatchy Newspapers special correspondent. Special correspondents Zained Obeid and Laith Hammoudi contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Panic, Then Quiet, As Kidnappers Strike (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- "They're here! They're here!"

The panicked cry rose from the crowd of shoppers and businessmen, sending them into a stampede past storefronts and shocked onlookers. Men, women and children fell over handcarts and folding chairs, knocking each other down, hiding behind buildings and seeking shelter in shops.

None knew who "they" were: uniformed men firing weapons in the air and herding people into trucks, just a few hundred yards from the edge of the U.S.-guarded "Green Zone."

But most had suspected such a day might come to the Sinak market of downtown Baghdad. All knew to run at first sight of the uniformed gunmen who have become signature elements of the all-too-common mass kidnappings in the capital.

"We weren't really surprised," said Hossein Abu Marwa, an employee of an air conditioner shop in the sprawling market. "We face such threats on a daily basis. Sometimes we hear they're coming from this side or that side. We don't know who is shooting. We don't know who is coming. Are they the resistance? Are they armed criminals? You don't know if they're Sunni. You don't know if they're Shiite."

DOJ_NMG_0106850

This time, at least 60 people disappeared within minutes, stuffed into four delivery trucks and hauled away toward eastern Baghdad.

An Interior Ministry official reported later that at least 23 of the shopkeepers had been released unharmed in northern Baghdad, after showing their captors identity cards bearing names associated with Shiite Muslims.

The fate of previous victims of mass kidnappings has been brutal: most show up dead within days, often with signs of torture, such as drill holes.

Thursday's abduction took place in and around the auto-supply section of the open-air Sinak wholesale market, a few hundred yards from the headquarters of Iraq's Ministry of Defense.

It began around 10 a.m. when a convoy of between 10 and 13 sport-utility vehicles of the type often used by official security forces screeched into the market and sealed off the main roads, said witnesses.

Heavy gunfire ensued almost immediately.

"I saw the four-wheel drive cars arrive, about 10 of them, as well as trucks for transporting prisoners," he said. "I immediately realized something grave was going on." The shopkeepers said they clutched their guns as the drama began, fearful of criminals. When they realized the invaders came heavily armed and in official guise, they put their weapons away. "They were men in uniform," said Ahmad Jassem Saadi, the 39-year-old owner of a leather jacket shop. "What could I do?"

Saadi, along with a group of other shopkeepers, stood at the doors of their shops and watched. "They detained a group of people, and then they started taking other sellers and even passers-by," he said. "The people struggled. They were taken by force and put into trucks."

Some described the trucks as the type used to transport milk and meat products. Others said they were like armored vehicles used to take money.

They began to fill up.

The gunfire continued. The panic mounted.

Hassan Khafaji, shopping for a part to repair his broken-down 1990 Oldsmobile sedan, lay on the ground as the shooting continued. He crawled to an alley, stood up and fled.

"I just kept running and running until I got somewhere safe," he said.

Yassin Hashim, who works at a refrigerator motor shop within the market's labyrinth of alleyways, helped an elderly man to his feet after the jittery mob knocked him to the ground. "He was too weak to get away," said Hashim.

"Some people were running and screaming," Saadi recalled. "Others were frozen in their place, watching."

"They were just looking for a place to hide," said Hashim. "Some people thought there were snipers."

The ordeal was over within 15 minutes, witnesses said. A detachment of Iraqi soldiers arrived and sealed off the area. Some witnesses described the kidnappers as police commandos, but a spokesman for the Ministry of Interior said the suspects wore army uniforms.

Afterward Saadi gathered around a group of shopkeepers consoling a local Christian restaurant owner, a middle-age man with salt-and-pepper hair, who was weeping. His son had been taken. "It was painful and I felt very sad," he said.

By then, around 11:30, the streets already had emptied. There were no customers and no shopkeepers. "I couldn't work," Saadi said. "We closed up the shop and went home."

Special correspondents in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Gunmen Kidnap Baghdad Shopkeepers, Bystanders (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 -- Hardly a soul stirred on Thursday afternoon inside the warren of narrow dark alleys and side streets in Sanak, one of the Iraqi capital's busiest commercial districts. Shop after shop remained closed, their steel doors sealed with thick padlocks. Empty stalls, flanked by apartments filled with cowering residents, served as a silent coda to what had unfolded two hours earlier.

Gunmen in camouflage uniforms drove up in 11 cars at about 10 a.m. and surrounded the area, just around the corner from an Iraqi police checkpoint, witnesses said. Some wore black ski masks, others black bandannas. They casually went from business to business, spending 30 minutes rounding up at least 25 shopkeepers, witnesses said. The men hustled their captives past the stalls and stunned customers, grabbing a few bystanders along the way.

"They took Sunnis, Shiites and Christians," said Ziad Ali, one of the shopkeepers. "They did not differentiate. They even grabbed six boys."

The mass abductions, brazen even by Baghdad standards, were the latest sign of worsening insecurity in the capital. Two days ago, 70 day laborers were killed in a car bomb attack in another busy district. A month ago, gunmen who claimed to be from the Shiite-run Interior Ministry seized as many as 150 people from an agency of the Ministry of Higher Education, which is controlled by a Sunni Arab party.

DOJ_NMG_0106851

Thursday's well-orchestrated kidnappings did not appear to be sectarian in nature or a reprisal attack, shopkeepers and officials said.

"This is very serious. This happened in the heart of Baghdad," said Mohammed al-Askari, a Defense Ministry spokesman. "This is to create a state of chaos, so they can say the government has failed, the political process has failed. This is aimed at stopping life in the city."

The assault occurred on a day when a U.S. congressional delegation, led by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), visited Baghdad. McCain repeated his call to deploy more U.S. troops to Iraq, saying 15,000 to 30,000 more were needed to stem the sectarian violence and bring stability.

"The American people are confused, they're frustrated, they're disappointed by the Iraq war, but they also want us to succeed if there's any way to do that," McCain told reporters inside the U.S. Embassy.

Meanwhile, Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno began his duties as the number two U.S. general in Iraq, replacing Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli. Odierno told reporters that sectarian strife and car bombs were the main challenges to security in the capital. He reiterated views stated earlier by Chiarelli that a multi-pronged effort that includes economic, political and military measures was needed to contain the violence.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) described the changes he saw in Baghdad in stark terms. "The first time I came here with Senator McCain, we went rug shopping," he said. "Yesterday, we moved around in a tank. It's one of the most dangerous places on the planet."

By Thursday evening, it was unclear how many people had been abducted in Sanak, with estimates ranging from 25 to as many as 70. Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said that several victims were later released and that the investigation was continuing.

Khalaf said the kidnappers in Sanak, a bustling market for automotive spare parts, wore army uniforms. There is growing evidence that Shiite militias fomenting sectarian violence have infiltrated the police and to a lesser extent the army.

But Askari, the Defense Ministry spokesman, said investigators from the army also conducted interviews in Sanak and arrived at a different conclusion.

"Some of the police battalions wear the same camouflage uniforms as the army," Askari said. "And some of the people we interviewed said the vehicles they used were not the type used by the army."

He said Thursday's incident demonstrated how easy it still is to buy official police uniforms. "In the center of Baghdad, you can find people selling them. This is the responsibility of the Ministry of Interior, not the Ministry of Defense."

In addition to the uniforms, witnesses said, the gunmen wore official bulletproof vests and carried shields. They appeared to be targeting certain shops. Robbery did not appear to be a motive, witnesses said.

"It was not a matter of money," said Baha Hamdani, a store owner who was one of the few people orbiting the empty stalls and shuttered shops. "I had plenty of money, but they didn't come after me."

When asked why the gunmen targeted Sanak's merchants, he replied: "They took them in order to kill them. This is the only reason."

Ali, the shopkeeper, said the gunmen stopped rounding people up when they heard sharp claps from one of their leaders. Then they took the men and pushed them into their vehicles before driving off. The attack emptied the market. "Everyone ran upstairs," he said.

Hamdani said he and some other shopkeepers ran to the police checkpoint and asked for help. "They told us it was not their duty," he said.

Askari said the area fell under the responsibility of the police. Khalaf said there was no police checkpoint in the area, and that by the time officers responded to the incident, the kidnappers had fled.

Hamdani, who wore gray pants with oil stains, held up a small piece of metal from his shop. "Life has become as cheap as these spare parts," he said.

Bitter Detour For Expatriate Back In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 14 — Of all the Iraqi expatriates who returned to rule, rebuild and profit from their country after the invasion, none have fallen as far as Aiham Alsammarae, who was once the minister of electricity but now spends his days consumed with bitterness in a Baghdad jail as his lawyers fight multiple charges of corruption against him.

DOJ_NMG_0106852

Mr. Alsammarae, an American citizen who lived in the Chicago area and built a thriving engineering firm there, is the only cabinet-level Iraqi official to be convicted and jailed for misusing money during his time in office. Four months ago, hearing that he was being accused of corruption, he walked into a Baghdad courthouse to find out if there were charges against him and was astonished to find himself placed under arrest pending trial. He has been in jail ever since.

During an interview in that jail on Thursday, Mr. Alsammarae still had the swept-back, perfectly arranged hair and obsessively polished shoes of his days in power, but he wore a shapeless zippered jacket over a beige shirt and pants rather than one of his elegant suits. Possibly in deference to his former rank, his "cell" was a converted office with a computer, a refrigerator, a potted plant, a thin mattress and other amenities — far better than what is provided to other prisoners in the jail.

But Mr. Alsammarae is bitter because, he said, the United States has left him in his hour of need to the vagaries of an Iraqi court system that in many ways is still the opaque and frightening apparatus it was before the invasion. "When somebody is giving his life to service as an American here, he should be dealt with in a different way," he said, complaining of what he called a lack of action by the American Embassy. "If they did anything for me, I am not aware of it."

As if to help make his point, the Iraqi justice system still had Mr. Alsammarae in jail on Thursday, several days after an appeals court overturned his conviction, on Oct. 11, on the first of the counts against him, involving payments for a single electricity generator in the southern Iraq.

An employee at the Central Criminal Court of Iraq confirmed that the 23-member appeals court had unanimously overturned the conviction but said that under Iraqi law, Mr. Alsammarae might have to remain in jail until the other charges against him were resolved.

Mr. Alsammarae's case is caught in an extraordinarily complex web of events that include American-sponsored efforts to fight official corruption and to improve the Iraqi court system while at the same time allowing the courts to operate independently of American influence. Mr. Alsammarae also faces the burden of having long been suspected of corruption by Iraqi and American officials, and he has been the target of lashing criticism for years in the Iraqi news media.

An American official in Baghdad familiar with the case said the embassy was in fact monitoring Mr. Alsammarae's situation closely.

"They have done everything they can to ensure his safety and fair treatment, but at the same time cannot interfere in a legitimate Iraqi court process," the official said.

Iraqi officials were generally less restrained. Saadi Mehdi Ali, who currently serves as inspector general in the Electricity Ministry, said he had reviewed the papers on Mr. Alsammarae's cases.

"Believe me, all the cases in which Aiham is accused, they are correct," he said. "He is accused with facts."

The cases involving Mr. Alsammarae began with investigations by the Commission on Public Integrity, an Iraqi organization independent of the government that was created by the United States. The commission has been praised by some officials as a much-needed breath of reform in a country long riddled by corruption, and derided by others as overzealous and politically motivated.

"It's politics," said Mr. Alsammarae, a secular Sunni Arab who was what he described as a midlevel member of Saddam Hussein's governing Baath Party as a student in the 1970s. The commission and the court system have both been accused of falling under the influence of Shiite politicians and Shiite-run militias.

Mr. Alsammarae arrived in Iraq just after the American invasion in 2003, looking for business opportunities. He was originally appointed electricity minister by L. Paul Bremer III, the leader of the American occupation authority, in August 2003. He stayed on until May 2005 in the Iraqi government that followed, run by Prime Minister Ayad Allawi.

Mr. Allawi, who has previously suggested publicly that the Commission on Public Integrity may have a political agenda, said through a colleague on Thursday that he stood by those remarks.

Ali Shbot, a spokesman for the commission, which is run by Rathi al-Rathi, said that those charges were ludicrous and that the commission was investigating politicians of all stripes. He said that of roughly 90 cabinet-level officials in previous Iraqi governments since the invasion, 18 have received either arrest warrants or subpoenas.

All but a few of those officials remain at large, having fled the country or gone into hiding. Mr. Shbot said there were also active corruption cases against about 80 former officials — deputy ministers, directors general or senior ministry advisers — at least some of whom are still in Iraq. In the same jail in Baghdad's protected Green Zone, a former deputy finance minister, Kareem Hmeed Faraj, is serving a three-year sentence.

But despite the general view that Iraqi governments have been corrupt, it is the sheer number of those cases that disturbs some officials who say they believe that politics is indeed coming into play.

"I applaud the notion of public integrity," said a senior Iraqi official who has followed the case and who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of prejudicing the cases. "But the problem with these guys, they are highly politicized. My view is that Judge Rathi is way out of his place."

DOJ_NMG_0106853

But in a sign of the difficulties the former electricity minister faces, the official added, "I suspect that Aiham Alsammarae is a crook."

From Head Scarf To Army Cap, Making A New Life (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

LACKLAND AIR FORCE BASE, Tex. — Stomping her boots and swinging her bony arms, Fadwa Hamdan led a column of troops through this bleak Texas base.

Only six months earlier, she wore the head scarf of a pious Muslim woman and dropped her eyes in the presence of men. Now she was marching them to dinner.

"I'm gonna be a shooting man, a shooting man!" she cried, her Jordanian accent lost in the chanting voices. "The best I can for Uncle Sam, for Uncle Sam!"

The United States military has long prided itself on molding raw recruits into hardened soldiers. Perhaps none have undergone a transformation quite like that of Ms. Hamdan.

Forbidden by her husband to work, she raised five children behind the drawn curtains of their home in Saudi Arabia. She was not allowed to drive. On the rare occasions when she set foot outside, she wore a full-face veil.

Then her world unraveled. Separated from her husband, who had taken a second wife, and torn from her children, she moved to Queens to start over. Struggling to survive on her own, she answered a recruiting advertisement for the Army and enlisted in May.

Ms. Hamdan's passage through the military is a remarkable act of reinvention. It required courage and sacrifice. She had to remove her hijab, a sacred symbol of the faith she holds deeply. She had to embrace, at the age of 39, an arduous and unfamiliar life.

In return, she sought what the military has always promised new soldiers: a stable home, an adoptive family, a remade identity. She left one male-dominated culture for another, she said, in the hope of finding new strength along the way.

"Always, I dream I have power on the inside, and one day it's going to come out," said Ms. Hamdan, a small woman with delicate hands and sad, almond eyes.

She belongs to the rare class of Muslim women who have signed up to become soldiers trained in Arabic translation. Such female linguists play a crucial role for the American armed forces in Iraq, where civilian women often feel uncomfortable interacting with male troops.

Finding Arabic-speaking women willing to serve in the military has proved daunting. Of the 317 soldiers who have completed training in the Army linguist program since 2003, just 23 are women, 13 of them Muslim.

Ms. Hamdan wrestled with the decision for two years. Only in the Army, she decided, would she be able to save money to hire a lawyer and finally divorce her husband. She yearned to regain custody of her children and support them on her own. She thought of going to graduate school one day.

But when Ms. Hamdan finally enlisted, she was filled with as much fear as determination. There was no guarantee, with her broken English and frail physique, that she could meet the military's standards or survive its rigors.

"This is different world for me," she said at the time.

'This Is the Army'

It was around midnight on May 31 when a yellow school bus brought Ms. Hamdan and 16 other new soldiers to Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio, a spread of parched grass and drab, low-lying buildings.

Ms. Hamdan had not scored high enough on the required English examination to go directly to basic training, so she was sent here for intensive language instruction.

At Lackland, soldiers enlisted in the Army linguist program known as 09-Lima have 24 weeks to improve their English and pass the exam. In that time, they follow a strict military regimen. They rise at 5 a.m. for physical training. They march to class. They drop to the ground for punitive push-ups.

When the bus arrived at the barracks that evening, Ms. Hamdan said, she hopped out first, her camouflage cap pulled low on her head.

Standing by the metal stairs was Sgt. First Class Willie Brannon, an imposing 48-year-old man with a stern jaw and a leveling stare. He ordered the soldiers to change into shorts. Ms. Hamdan explained softly that she was Muslim and could not do this.

"This is the Army," he replied. "Everybody's the same."

Ms. Hamdan burst into tears.

DOJ_NMG_0106854

The issue had arisen at the base before, and some of the Muslim women had been permitted to wear sweat pants instead of shorts. Officially, it would be Ms. Hamdan's choice.

But from the sidelines came two opposing directives, one in English and the other in Arabic. The drill sergeants wanted Ms. Hamdan to get used to wearing shorts, while several of the male Muslim soldiers tried to shame her into refusing.

"You're not supposed to show your legs," they told her.

For three weeks, she wore the blue nylon shorts, hitching up her white socks. Then she switched to sweat pants, even as the summer heat surpassed 100 degrees.

It helped, Ms. Hamdan thought, that there were so many similarities between Islam and the Army.

The command "Attention!" reminded her of the first step in the daily Muslim prayer, when one must stand completely still.

Soldiers, like Muslims, were instructed to eat with one hand. The women ate by themselves, and always walked with an escort, as Muslim women traditionally traveled.

The Army taught soldiers to live with order. They folded their fatigues as women folded their hijabs, and woke before sunrise as Ms. Hamdan had done all her life. They always marched behind a flag, as Muslims did in the days of the Prophet.

Nothing felt more familiar than the military's emphasis on respect. Soldiers learned to tuck their hands behind their backs when speaking to superiors.

When Ms. Hamdan tried this with Sergeant Brannon, she thought of her father. Her eyes automatically dropped to the floor, with customary Muslim modesty.

"Look me in the eye," the sergeant said. It was a command he had learned to deliver with care.

Sergeant Brannon, an African-American Baptist from North Carolina, had never met a Muslim before coming to Lackland. He soon concluded that the Muslim women in his charge had survived greater struggles outside the military than anything they would face inside it.

"They've been through a lot," he said.

Life Before the Service

Fadwa Hamdan was always a touch rebellious.

One of seven children, she was raised by her Palestinian parents in Amman, Jordan. Her father worked as a government irrigation official while her mother stayed at home with the children. They expected the same of their daughters.

But as a teenager, Ms. Hamdan rejected her many suitors. She wanted to see the world. At 19, she said, she secretly volunteered as a nurse with the Jordanian police, infuriating her parents. That same year, a visiting Palestinian doctor who lived in New York spotted her in the street.

He tracked down her home address, and spoke to her father. The next day, Ms. Hamdan learned she was engaged.

"Your dream has come true," Ms. Hamdan recalls her mother saying. "You're leaving Jordan."

Ms. Hamdan joined her husband in Staten Island in 1987. She felt nothing for him. He was 10 years her senior, and she found him stiff and dictatorial. He only let her leave the house with him, she said. If she upset him, he refused to speak to her for months.

She had children to fill the void. She became more religious, and began wearing the face veil known as a niqab. Eventually, the family moved to Saudi Arabia.

Weeks after Ms. Hamdan delivered her fifth child in 2000, she learned from her mother-in-law that her husband was taking a second wife in the West Bank city of Ramallah. Ms. Hamdan was shocked.

"I couldn't talk," she said.

The next summer, on a family vacation in Amman, her husband disappeared one evening with three of their children, she said. Days later she located two of her boys in Saudi Arabia, and learned that the new wife would be joining them.

Ms. Hamdan's 8-year-old girl had been left with her grandparents in Ramallah. She tried to get the girl back, but her husband had kept the child's passport, she said.

When reached by telephone in Saudi Arabia, a man answering to her husband's name said, "This is her choice and I don't have anything to do with it," apparently referring to her decision to join the Army. Then he hung up.

It never occurred to Ms. Hamdan to seek a divorce. She feared that it would bring shame to her family. From Jordan, she fought for legal custody of the children. In 2002, a judge ruled that she could keep the three youngest children, but allotted her a meager alimony, not enough to cover their schooling. Reluctantly, she returned them to their father.

Alone in Amman, she felt like an outcast.

"The neighbors, they look at me," she said.

In September 2002, she moved to Queens to live with her brother and his wife. She returned to wearing a regular head scarf, or hijab, and started classes at a local community college. One night she came home late, she said, and her brother told her to leave. "She did not follow the rules of the house," the brother, Sam Saeed, said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0106855

Ms. Hamdan did not know where to turn. Her father had refused to speak to her since she left Jordan. Over the next 10 days, she rode the subway at night and slept on a park bench in Queens. Finally, she walked into a hair salon in Brooklyn and approached a Lebanese Muslim woman.

"She was hysterical crying," said the woman, Helena Buiduon.

Ms. Hamdan stayed with Ms. Buiduon until she found her own apartment. She taught the Koran to children and worked in a doctor's office while earning an associate's degree in medical assistance.

Her life remained a struggle. She lived in a small, drafty apartment in the Bronx. Other Muslim immigrants found her puzzling.

Some people suggested that she was a "loose woman," she recalled, a notion that amused her given how little she wanted another relationship.

"I can't feel anything for anybody," she said. "I lived like jail. Just imagine you have a bird and the door is open. You think he will go back to this jail again? Never. He's just flying."

In 2003, she spotted an ad for the Army in an Arabic-language magazine. She met with a recruiter but cut the conversation short after learning she would have to remove her head scarf before enlisting.

Secretly, though, she kept imagining a new, military life. In March, she made up her mind.

"I broke the law with God," she said of her decision to remove her hijab. "I had to."

She put her belongings in storage. She began lifting 20-pound weights. She slipped off her veil in public a few times. She felt naked.

Two days before she left, she stopped by her brother's video shop in Queens to say goodbye.

Mr. Saeed was kneeling in prayer, as a Spanish rap video blasted from a television set. He stiffened at the sight of Ms. Hamdan, then kissed her on the cheek. They had not seen each other all year. Within minutes, an argument began.

"She'll never make it," Mr. Saeed said, looking away from his sister.

"Oh yeah?" she replied, her eyes widening.

"A Muslim woman is not allowed to travel alone," he said.

"What about working?" she said, her voice quivering. "Look at your wife, she works!"

"She likes to spend time here," he said.

Ms. Hamdan ran from the store crying.

"She won't make it," Mr. Saeed told a reporter after she left. "Woman always weak. She need a man to protect her."

Later, when Ms. Hamdan heard what her brother had said, she was silent.

"Why didn't he protect me?" she said.

What Happens Next

Life at Lackland — where soldiers cannot chew gum, wear makeup or leave the base — reminded Ms. Hamdan of her marriage.

"Sometimes, when I'm by myself, I wonder how I have stayed here for six months," she said as she sat outside her barracks one recent evening. "But I did it."

She was among 39 men and women in the Army linguist program, in a company of 119 soldiers. The rest were immigrants from around the globe, there to improve their English in the hopes of entering boot camp.

Everyone, it seemed, had a sad story.

The women talked quietly after the lights went out. A Sudanese woman had come to the United States after most of her family died in a bombing in Khartoum. A 23-year-old woman had lost her Iranian mother in an honor killing.

A teenage Iraqi girl cried herself to sleep every night. She, like many other soldiers, began referring to Ms. Hamdan as "Mom."

"They come into my arms," said Ms. Hamdan, who was older than most of the others.

She missed being a mother, yet she rarely talked about her own children. She was learning not to cry, and that was a subject that broke her down. Privately, she called them in Saudi Arabia twice a week with 20-minute phone cards, four minutes per child.

As the summer wore on, it became clear that Ms. Hamdan was floundering in her English studies. She failed the exam repeatedly.

Physically, though, she was growing stronger. Push-ups and sit-ups no longer scared her. She found she was a fast runner.

On Aug. 10, she won the one-mile race for female soldiers in seven minutes flat, in sweat pants. The next week, she became a squad leader and bay commander, directing a column of soldiers during marches and keeping order in the female barracks.

DOJ_NMG_0106856

Days later, she decided to wear the shorts again.

"What, we have a new soldier here?" Sergeant Brannon called out as she walked deliberately down the stairs.

"I am going to show the men I'm like them," she told him later. "I'm a man now."

"No, you're not a man" he said.

"Yes, I'm a man."

"No," he said. "You're a strong-willed woman."

That became his nickname for her: strong-willed woman.

As Ms. Hamdan's status rose with the drill sergeants, so did her standing among the soldiers.

"Sometimes I'm tough on them," she said one recent weekday as she patrolled her floor. The women smiled from their bunk beds. "I like everything clean."

Another morning, she sat in the mess hall, eating her daily breakfast of Froot Loops followed by nacho-cheese Doritos. A drill sergeant called out that the group had three minutes to finish, just as a clean-shaven soldier walked past Ms. Hamdan with a tray full of food. She shot him a hard look.

"Three minutes," she repeated. "You hear that?"

The greatest shift for Ms. Hamdan came in her relationship with the male soldiers. They stopped taunting her about wearing shorts. When she gave orders, they listened.

"It seems like a heavy burden has been lifted from her," Sergeant Brannon said.

Yet even as she felt herself changing, she remained steady in her faith. She never stopped praying five times a day. She attended the base's mosque each Friday and fasted through the holy month of Ramadan.

On a recent Friday, she sat with her eyes closed on the mosque's embroidered carpet, wearing a white veil and skirt over her Army fatigues.

"Staying on the straight path is not an easy matter, except for those who Allah helps to do so," the Egyptian imam said in Arabic over a loudspeaker.

In November, Ms. Hamdan's English score was still too low, by 11 points, even though she was performing better on the weekly quizzes. She was given a one-month extension, and one more chance.

She took her last exam in December, and failed again. She ran from her classroom.

"Don't come looking for me," she recalled telling a startled drill sergeant.

By herself, Ms. Hamdan began walking across the base. Tears streamed down her face as she reached the two-story, concrete building that had long been her refuge.

She climbed the stairs of the mosque. Alone, she knelt on the carpet and prayed. Finally, she sat in silence. She felt at peace.

Ms. Hamdan will be discharged on Dec. 15. She is unsure of what the future holds. She may stay in Texas and look for a job. She may no longer wear a hijab in public. All she knows is that she is different now, and no less a Muslim for it.

"I can face men," she said. "I can fight. I can talk. I don't keep it inside."

She thought for a moment.

"I changed myself," she said. "I'm a new Fadwa. Strong female. I like this."

4 Are Killed And 22 Hurt In Bomb Attack In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 14 — A suicide bomber detonated his explosives in the center of a busy shopping street in the town of Qalat in southern Afghanistan on Thursday, killing four civilians and wounding 22 people, the provincial police chief said.

"The attack occurred around noon today, when a highway police car was driving by in the bazaar," said the police chief, Gen. Noor Mohammad Paktin. He said that four children and two policemen were among the wounded.

Also on Thursday, President Hamid Karzai wound up a visit to southern Afghanistan with a speech at a boys' high school in Kandahar in which he blamed neighboring Pakistan for supporting Taliban insurgents and suicide bombers.

"Pakistan hopes to make slaves out of us, but we will not surrender," Mr. Karzai said.

Pakistan denies supporting the Taliban, but officials have admitted that some insurgents are infiltrating Afghanistan from Pakistan and that suicide bombers are being trained in Pakistan's tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

A large number of tribesmen demonstrated Thursday in the eastern town of Khost against NATO's bombing on Tuesday of a compound in which five people were killed, including a 13-year-old girl, and four more people were wounded.

"The demonstration was peaceful today, but the demonstrators promised to continue their protest unless the government finds who gave the wrong information to NATO," said the provincial police chief, Muhammad Ayub.

DOJ_NMG_0106857

An investigation is under way to find out exactly what happened. A private bank administrator and an Afghan intelligence officer were among the four people wounded in the bombing, Mr. Ayub said.

NATO expressed regret in a statement on Wednesday about the killing of the 13-year-old girl, but said its soldiers came under fire after surrounding the compound and calling on the people to surrender.

NATO planes bombed what the Atlantic alliance said was a Taliban command compound in the Panjwai district in Kandahar Province, killing some insurgents, Agence France-Presse reported, quoting a NATO spokesman.

Pakistan Will Have To Reckon With Tribal Leaders, Negroponte Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

With new fighting expected to break out next spring in Afghanistan, the Pakistani government will soon have to decide what it can do about the tribal authorities who have not been living up to their agreement to prevent Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters from moving back and forth across the border, according to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

"Sooner or later, the government will have to reckon with it," Negroponte said yesterday at a lunch with Washington Post editors and reporters. But with elections in Pakistan coming, the United States understands that President Pervez Musharraf "has a domestic political balancing act to perform," he added.

In September, representatives of the Pakistani government signed accords with tribal elders in North Waziristan in which those leaders agreed that they would not allow border crossings "for any kind of militancy." In return, Pakistani army units withdrew from that area. Negroponte said yesterday that the "tribal authorities are not living up to the deal" and that back-and-forth travel by the Taliban and others "causes serious problems."

Although Negroponte said that the growing Afghan insurgency is "no threat to the central government in Kabul," he noted that it is not clear whether the NATO forces there are large enough to handle the renewed fighting expected in the spring when the weather clears.

His downbeat assessment was supported by a recent report by Anthony H. Cordesman, a former Pentagon official who has just returned from Afghanistan where he received briefings from a U.S. Embassy team, including U.S. military commanders.

The Afghan insurgency grew in the past year because of financial and military aid from a sanctuary in Pakistan, while the weak Kabul government has not received enough military and economic support from NATO and the United States, according to Cordesman.

"Patience, a long-war strategy and adequate resources can make all the difference," said Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh A. Burke Chair in Strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He said in his report that he came away from Afghanistan believing that the effort could be successful, but that the "development of effective government and economy will take at least 5-10 years; no instant success is possible."

He told reporters on Wednesday that a plan, approved by both the State and Defense departments, is now before the Office of Management and Budget. The proposal from the U.S. Embassy team in Kabul calls for a twofold to threefold increase in aid, to nearly $6 billion. But he added that even if the expanded aid is included in a supplemental budget that will go to Congress in January, "it won't make a difference for at least a year."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed yesterday that a "big commitment" to Afghanistan is under consideration, with emphasis on "the reconstruction side." After 75 years of warfare, she told Post reporters and editors, the country has no infrastructure and no basis for an economy other than the poppy production financed by the drug trade.

"A major al-Qaeda and Taliban presence is building up in both Afghanistan and Pakistan" for a new offensive next year, Cordesman said. "These groups have de facto sanctuary in Pakistan, a major presence in the east and south, and a growing presence in western Afghanistan."

Judging from the declassified intelligence briefing he received, Cordesman said, the U.S. and NATO forces there are "insufficient" to secure the south and the west. He said more special forces are needed in the east where the troops "are spread very thin."

From sanctuaries in western and southern Pakistan, where the government has ceded control over border areas, al-Qaeda and Taliban cadres provide both financial and manpower support to the insurgent groups, Cordesman said. "This is a two-country war," he said, and the problems "are ultimately as dangerous to Pakistan as to Afghanistan and the U.S."

From a military standpoint, Cordesman said, "we are winning tactically but losing strategically." He noted that, during the Taliban offensives this fall, it was air power that led to success in the killing of many insurgents but that afterward there was no follow-up on the ground. The air war was more intense than most people realized, he said, noting that the U.S. military flew "as many sorties in Afghanistan as in Iraq" during that period.

DOJ_NMG_0106858

He said what is needed is a U.S. and NATO commitment "that will extend to 2013 or longer and provide the necessary support and resources." In addition, at least five or more years will be necessary to create an effective Afghan government that can provide security and services to the country. "Political legitimacy in Afghanistan, as in most of the world," he said, "does not consist of how a government is chosen, but how well it is perceived to govern."

"We cannot afford to lose two wars -- in Iraq and Afghanistan," Cordesman said.

Gift Of Wreaths Touches Nation (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, December 15, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. — The rows of gravestones stretched out before him like time itself. But when John Lechler saw the date on one particular tombstone, he knew where to lay his wreath. And for a moment, Army Air Corps 2nd Lt. Gordon H. Sterling Jr., who died on Dec. 7, 1941, lived again.

The balsam fir wreath was from Maine — made by hand, decorated by hand, wrapped, boxed and loaded on a truck by hand, then driven 750 miles to Arlington National Cemetery.

This is the miracle of Arlington. "When you first look at that sea of stones, you don't get the impression of individuality," says Tom Sherlock, the cemetery historian. "But if you stop for just a moment and look at the name on the stone, in that moment they're thought of again, and they live again."

Lechler was one of about 600 volunteers at the cemetery Thursday for what has become a new holiday tradition: placing Christmas wreaths — supplied by a Maine businessman who never got over his first sight of the cemetery — on more than 5,000 veterans' graves.

"It's great that we came together to show our gratitude, considering how tough it is for everybody with this war going on," says Lechler, 42, an Ashburn, Va., resident who runs a sports training business and who never served in the military.

Every December for the past 15 years, Morrill Worcester, owner of one of the world's largest holiday wreath companies, has taken time in the midst of his busiest season to haul a truckload of wreaths to Arlington from his small Downeast Maine town of Harrington.

For years, he and a small band of volunteers laid the wreaths in virtual obscurity. But in the last 12 months that has changed, thanks to a dusting of snow last year at the cemetery, an evocative photograph, a sentimental poem and a chain e-mail. And this year, Worcester went national. A new program, "Wreaths Across America," shipped a total of about 1,300 wreaths to more than 200 national cemeteries and vets' memorials in all 50 states.

Worcester, 56, says he wants to help Americans remember and honor deceased military veterans, particularly at Christmas, when they're missed most. On the Wreaths Across America website, he makes this comment: "When people hear about what we're doing, they want to know if I'm a veteran. I'm not. But I make it my business never to forget."

On Thursday he looked at the crowd of volunteers — five times as many as last year's — and said, "I didn't realize there were this many people that felt like I do."

This year, Worcester's wreaths got to Arlington in a red, white and blue semi-trailer that followed U.S. Highway 1, escorted by a military veterans motorcycle group. In some towns, flag-waving crowds turned out to welcome the convoy as it passed through.

The wreaths were placed in a hilly, wooded section of the cemetery that has the graves of forgotten doughboys and GIs, as well as those of astronaut moonwalkers, Dr. Walter Reed and the general at Bastogne during the Battle of the Bulge who told the Nazi commander demanding his surrender "Nuts."

"We want to honor the veterans, and we do it with the products we make ourselves," says Worcester's wife, Karen. "We're like the Little Drummer Boy. He had his drum. We have our wreaths."

Morrill Worcester's road to Arlington began in 1962 when he won a trip to Washington for selling new subscriptions to the Bangor Daily News on his newspaper route.

He was 12, an impressionable age to visit a city filled with unforgettable sites. What struck him most was the national cemetery — now the final resting place of more than 300,000 — and its endless lines of perfectly aligned stones:

"That stuck with me all these years, the enormity of the cemetery," Worcester says. "And the fact that everyone buried there had a personal story, and aspirations and plans for the future, like we all do."

Years later, as a sophomore at the University of Maine, he realized there was money to be made in Christmas wreaths. He could buy wreaths that local people made at home and take them to Boston to sell to a wholesaler. That first year he sold 500.

It was the beginning of the Worcester Wreath Co., which in 1982 became a supplier for Maine's mail order giant, L.L. Bean.

In 1992, during one of his company's periodic expansions, Worcester got a call in December from one of his warehouses. "We're up to our knees in wreaths," his foreman announced — they'd overproduced several thousand.

DOJ_NMG_0106859

"I said, 'Well, I'm not just gonna throw them away,' " he recalls. "That's when I thought of Arlington." He called Washington for permission to lay his wreaths. To his surprise, he got it.

But when he arrived at Arlington, Worcester was stunned by the size of the area to be covered. It was just Worcester, his son and about a dozen others. It was raining. It took six hours. Afterward he was wet, tired — and exhilarated. There, buried in the Virginia soil, he had found the cost of freedom.

Every December after that, Worcester, his family, his employees and his friends gathered on a Sunday to decorate wreaths and load them on a truck provided by a local company. Worcester and a few others drove to Arlington, laid 5,000 wreaths and were back at work within a few days.

Each year, Worcester was assigned a different part of the cemetery, usually an older section whose graves received less attention. Every stone got the same simple 20-inch wreath, adorned only with a red bow. Before leaving, the volunteers laid wreaths at the graves of John F. Kennedy and Robert F. Kennedy, the USS Maine memorial and the Tomb of the Unknowns.

When Worcester started his business in 1971, he was 21 — the average age, he would point out, of U.S. servicemen killed in World War II. He had a college draft deferment, but he never forgot the sacrifices of those who did serve.

"I'd been lucky," he says, "and I wanted to give back."

Christmas wreaths had made him rich. Now, he felt he was reclaiming the true meaning of a wreath, showing it as something more than a glitzy holiday ornament: "We wanted to get back to the simple idea of what a wreath represents — respect, honor, victory."

This was a different kind of victory, though — a victory of remembrance, a victory over death itself.

But, he is asked, what was the point of their sacrifice? Did the doughboys make the world safe for democracy in World War I? Did the Spanish-American War keep America free? And what about Iraq, a war which has steadily lost public support?

"This is non-political," Worcester replies. "These people died for us. If they died in vain, I don't know. But they all deserve our respect."

The tradition grew slowly. Every year there were a few more volunteers in Harrington to load the truck and a few more in Arlington to lay the wreaths. Every January there'd be a few more calls, e-mails or letters. Worcester says that apart from a newspaper story here and a broadcast report there, "it was almost a private thing."

Until December 2005.

When the day was almost over and all the wreaths had been laid, it started to snow. Around the same time, an Air Force news photographer covering the event went back for a final picture before heading back to the Pentagon.

Master Sgt. James Varhegyi had shot hundred of images that morning. In accordance with photojournalistic convention, almost all had people in them.

But this time Varhegyi took a picture that had no people, just rows of graves, decorated with bowed wreaths, on snowy ground. White, green, red — the colors of Christmas. He didn't think it was anything special.

When the Worcesters returned to Harrington, things quieted down as usual after Christmas. Except that instead of declining in January, the appreciative calls and e-mails began to increase.

Varhegyi's photo had been posted on an Air Force website, from which someone — the Worcesters don't know who — had lifted it, put it in an e-mail, and added a poem:

Rest easy, sleep well my brothers.
Know the line has held, your job is done.
Rest easy, sleep well.
Others have taken up where you fell, the line has held.
Peace, peace, and farewell …

"Please share this with everyone on your address list," the e-mail read. "You hear too much about the bad things people do. Everyone should hear about this."

The e-mail became an Internet sensation. It spread like a virus, so far and so fast that Snopes.com, a website devoted to exploring myths and rumors, investigated and confirmed its existence.

More and more people contacted Worcester Wreath Co. with questions, thanks and requests. By February, the company was getting 30 to 40 e-mails a day. People sent checks, which were returned. Company staffers found themselves devoting more and more time to phone calls about the Arlington effort.

One night, Sherry Scott, the office manager, was working late, trying to get caught up, when the phone rang:

"It was an elderly woman from Texas. She says, 'Tell me you're the company that lays the wreaths at Arlington.' When I said we were, there was silence. Then she started crying. She says, 'My Dad's buried at Arlington.' Then I started crying."

DOJ_NMG_0106860

Karen Worcester says that many people seemed to appreciate that even though they couldn't go to Arlington to visit a loved one's gravesite, "it's like we go for 'em." She'd print the e-mails out and read them to her husband at night. Sometimes they'd wind up crying.

She rose before dawn to read e-mails and write replies. She did not consider herself eloquent: "What do you say when someone tells you, 'I just buried my son.' ?"

By summer, hundreds of e-mails were coming in each day. Karen began to notice a refrain: "They said, 'Can you do that here where we are? Can't I get a wreath?' I thought, 'We can't do every grave. But we can do every cemetery.' "

Fine, said her husband: How?

By August, they knew.

Worcester Wreath would send six wreaths to veterans' cemeteries in every state. Members of the Civil Air Patrol, a national organization that has chapters in every state, would see that they were distributed.

UPS offered to ship the wreaths at no charge. A company in New Jersey provided 3,000 small flags. A Worcester Wreath employee was delegated to work solely on coordinating the program.

"And to think," Karen Worcester says, "it all started with, 'We made too many wreaths!' "

A final word about Lt. Sterling, courtesy of military historian David Aiken. When Japanese planes attacked Wheeler Field in central Oahu during their assault on Pearl Harbor, Sterling was on the ground. He was an assistant flight engineer; he'd passed his flight tests but had not progressed as rapidly as the other pilots. He saw that a group of P-36 fighters was beginning to taxi out, but the formation was short one plane. It sat empty on the tarmac, its engine idling.

Sterling climbed into the cockpit, handed his watch to the crew chief, and said, "Give this to my mother! I'm not coming back!"

He didn't. His plane was shot down off Oahu's eastern shore in a fight with a Japanese Zero and was never recovered. He is the only Air Force pilot still counted as missing in the battle.

Sterling was one of those who had, as Morrill Worcester puts it, "aspirations and plans for the future." His fiancée was a nurse at nearby Schofield Barracks. They had a date that afternoon.

In The 83rd Congress, A Senate In Constant Turmoil (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson's sudden illness has consumed the political class the past two days. Everyone is talking about what happens if the South Dakota Democrat leaves the Senate and is replaced by a Republican to create a 50-50 split. Democrats and Republicans alike are rushing out statements saying the standard "our thoughts and prayers are with him." That is, at a minimum, half true.

But the unsettled situation pales when compared with the bizarre 83rd Congress in 1953 and 1954, during which nine of the then-96 senators died, including one who committed suicide, and one resigned.

When the Senate convened on Jan. 3, 1953, the GOP was in charge 48 to 47, plus one former Republican, Sen. Wayne L. Morse-- an independent so independent that he moved his seat to the Senate aisle and would not vote with the Democrats to organize.

By Aug. 3 of that year, when the first session adjourned, three members -- including Majority Leader Robert A. Taft (R-Ohio) -- had died. When the next session began in January 1954, the Democrats had become the majority, 48-47-1, but they did not assume control. At one point during that session, as various members died, the D's even had a two-vote lead, but they never challenged Republican control of the body. The Senate adjourned Aug. 20 back where it had started, with the GOP holding a one-vote majority.

So why didn't the Democrats take over? For one thing, seems the "minority" leader, Sen. Lyndon Baines Johnson (D-Tex.), didn't particularly want to. He preferred to have the Republicans deal with Sen. Joseph McCarthy (R-Wis.), according to Senate associate historian Donald A. Ritchie.

It was an ugly time at the Senate. Sen. Lester Hunt (D-Wyo.) committed suicide, shooting himself in his office in the Old Senate Office Building on June 19, 1954. McCarthyites were after Hunt, who strongly opposed McCarthy, and they threatened to reveal that Hunt's son had been arrested the year before, accused of soliciting a male undercover police officer in Lafayette Square. The McCarthyites wanted Hunt to announce he would not run again. He did so, then killed himself.

More important, there was "no way the Democrats could have claimed a majority," Ritchie said, "because the Republicans could have blocked them" with a filibuster, and in the Senate, most everything can be filibustered -- even by the minority.The Democrats' Five-Figure Fete

DOJ_NMG_0106861

Mark your calendars! The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's first invite of the new year is to a "Swearing In Brunch and Celebration Concert" honoring Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi on Jan. 4. The brunch is at 10:30 in the Members of Congress Room of the Library of Congress. "Please RSVP by December 20th."

The concert at the National Building Museum features Tony Bennett, Carole King and Wyclef Jean. Should be a most excellent show, though perhaps not worth each PAC's $15,000 "requested contribution" for two tickets. Make checks payable to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Checkbook a little depleted these days? Not to worry. They give you till the end of next month to pay up.

Hmmm . . . 15 large? Tom DeLay would be proud.A Diplomat and a Scholar

For those of you keeping score, another name has emerged as a strong contender to become the next Saudi ambassador here. He's Mishal bin Abdullah, son of the Saudi king and now at the United Nations in New York. He's minister-in-charge at the Saudi ministry of foreign affairs.

Meanwhile, Loop Fans, after checking their yearbooks and memories, have been writing to say that although outgoing ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal attended Georgetown University, he never graduated. Indeed, the Saudi Embassy bio does not say that he did. Turki "pursued an undergraduate degree at Georgetown University," the bio says, but it doesn't say whether he ever caught one.From Foreign to Domestic Musical chairs . . . Douglas Holtz-Eakin, the former director of the Congressional Budget Office who now sits in the Paul A. Volcker Chair for International Economics at the Maurice R. Greenberg Center for Geoeconomic Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations here, will be sitting next month in the Economic Policy Chair, John McCain2008, the Exploratory Committee, which is in Arlington.

In his new job, Holtz-Eakin will be lining up against advisers to another potential presidential candidate, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney: R. Glenn Hubbard and N. Greg Mankiw, both former White House Council of Economic Advisers chairs for President Bush. (Okay, maybe they don't have hyphenated last names, but their names each begin with an initial.) So the early indications are that Romney will be the tax cutter and McCain will be the spending cutter? And we know what the voters have always preferred.A One-Sided Conversation

Noted Bush observation. At his news conference last week, President Bush said: "I talk to families who die."

DOJ:

FEDERAL DIARY: Nearing Takeoff: Compensation For Justice Lawyers' Travel Time (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

After a long flight through Congress, legislation that would permit Justice Department lawyers to claim time off for travel during off-duty hours has been sent to the president for his signature.

Congress approved legislation in 2004 creating compensatory time off for federal employees, but the Justice Department decided it did not apply to the department's 9,000 lawyers because of a 1999 congressional restriction that limits their overtime pay.

The law permits federal employees to receive time off when they travel on official business during off-duty hours, such as flying on a Sunday to attend a Monday morning meeting. Previous rules made it difficult for employees to qualify for compensation while traveling outside normal business hours.

Justice's interpretation of the law triggered complaints inside the department. The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents about 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, worked with Congress and the department on a legislative solution.

"It took us nearly two years of persistent effort," said Richard Delonis, president of the association.

After House members and senators introduced the comp-time bill to extend eligibility to Justice lawyers, Democratic and Republican senators kept it grounded to use as a bargaining chip on other issues. As Congress neared adjournment, the lame-duck Senate cleared the bill for takeoff to the White House.

Key supporters of the legislation included Sens. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), Susan Collins (R-Maine), Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) and Reps. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), Danny K. Davis (D-Ill.), Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

Delonis said assistant U.S. attorneys and other Justice lawyers sometimes must travel on nights or weekends for court appearances and other duties, losing time that could be spent with their families. "This comp-time legislation passed by Congress sends an important message to these dedicated public servants, assuring that they do not bear an extra burden that Congress did not intend to impose," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106862

Congressional aides said they expected the president to sign the bill.Nader's View on the Post Office

A nonprofit group founded by consumer advocate Ralph Nader has released a new book on the U.S. Postal Service that calls for giving the public a greater role in setting postal priorities.

"The lack of citizen-consumers' involvement in the recently passed postal reform legislation has highlighted the need for a public dialogue about the future of our postal system," Nader said. "The book provides a starting point for that conversation."

The book, "Preserving the People's Post Office," is sponsored by Nader's Center for Study of Responsive Law and written by Christopher W. Shaw, a project director at the center.

Shaw and Nader call for creation of an independent Post Office Consumer Action Group as a way to give the public an organized voice to help counter the influence of large corporate mailers and private-sector parcel and express-mail companies.

Congress recently approved a measure that would overhaul Postal Service business operations for the first time since 1970, in part to provide magazines, credit card companies and banks with more predictable increases in postal rates.Talk Shows

Kathryn K. Troutman, founder of the Resume Place Inc., will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Vice Adm. John C. Harvey Jr., chief of naval personnel and deputy chief of naval operations for manpower, personnel, training and education, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

U.S. Attorney John McKay Announces Resignation (AP)

By Gene Johnson

AP, December 14, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- U.S. Attorney John McKay, the Justice Department's top lawyer in Western Washington, said Thursday he will resign next month to return to the private sector.

The announcement came the same day McKay was notified that he would not be nominated to be a federal judge in Seattle, but the timing was purely coincidental, he said. McKay had hoped to fill the position created by U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour's elevation to senior status.

"I'm disappointed I didn't get the judgeship, but I'm excited about the new opportunities," he said.

McKay was nominated to the job by President Bush on Sept. 19, 2001, and confirmed by the U.S. Senate on Oct. 24 of that year. During his tenure, his office handled the sentencing of terrorist Ahmed Ressam, the indictment of an alleged eco-terrorism ring responsible for the firebombing of the University of Washington's horticulture center, and the prosecution of those responsible for building the first tunnel discovered under the U.S.-Canada border.

McKay said his resignation would take effect Jan. 26. He said he has no immediate plans for the future, but would begin speaking with law firms after he steps down and would probably take time off before starting a new job.

"I have been privileged to serve President Bush, and the people of Western Washington as United States attorney. Our work in the United States attorneys office has increased the safety and security of our community, while carefully safeguarding civil rights," McKay said in a news release.

Before his appointment, McKay was president of Legal Services Corp., in Washington, D.C., a private nonprofit corporation that provides legal representation for low-income Americans.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez has the authority to appoint an interim U.S. attorney whose term lasts until a permanent replacement can be nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

In an interview Thursday, McKay said his greatest regret was that the assassination of 18-year Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Crane Wales, who was shot to death less than a month after McKay was nominated, remains unsolved.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sycamore: Ex-exec Thwarts Options Probe (BZJRNL)

Boston Business Journal, December 14, 2006

Sycamore Networks Inc.'s stock options problems have taken a new twist.

The Chelmsford, Mass.-based communications equipment company says it hasn't been able to comply fully with subpoenas from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission because a former employee won't cooperate.

DOJ_NMG_0106863

In a suit filed in Suffolk Superior Court last month, Sycamore says Katherine B. Galli, who helped manage the company's stock option program for several years, has refused to return crucial documents Sycamore needs to respond to the federal investigators.

Dell Delays Filing Quarterly Report, Cites SEC Probe (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Dell Inc., the world's second-largest personal-computer maker, delayed filing its quarterly report for the second time this year, citing an accounting probe by government regulators.

A report for the quarter ended Nov. 3 will be filed as soon as possible, Round Rock, Texas-based Dell said today in a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission filing. The company also hasn't submitted a report for the second quarter ended Aug. 4.

Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins said in August the SEC has been reviewing the company's revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. Dell disclosed last month the SEC had stepped up the probe into a formal investigation. The U.S. Justice Department is also reviewing the company's accounting.

"No determination has been made as to whether restatements of prior period financial statements will be required," Dell said in today's filing. "The company is not currently able to predict the extent or significance of any such changes, and those changes could materially affect previously announced results."

Dell reported third-quarter profit that beat analysts' estimates, according to preliminary figures released Nov. 21. Net income was $677 million, or 30 cents a share, on sales of $14.4 billion.

Federal scrutiny comes as Rollins works to boost sales and profit after losing U.S. customers alienated by Dell's poor customer service. Hewlett-Packard Co. recaptured the PC market lead last quarter after trailing Dell for three years.

Shares of Dell rose 80 cents, or 3.1 percent, to $26.87 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They've lost 10 percent this year.

Coherent Faces Informal SEC Probe (CFO)

By Stephen Taub

CFO.com, December 14, 2006

Another company's options granting practices are being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Coherent Inc., which makes lasers for commercial and scientific uses, said it received an informal inquiry from the San Francisco office of the SEC relating to the company's past granting of stock options.

The company, whose market capitalization is slightly less than $1 billion, assured investors that it intends to cooperate with the inquiry. As a result of the probe, however, Coherent said it will delay the filing of its annual report due to its internal review into its option practices and related accounting. Coherent also noted that it will not be able to file its annual report prior to the end of the 15-day extension provided by SEC rules. Coherent also said that it has not determined whether it needs to restate any previous financial statements or if it needs to record any non-cash adjustments. advertisement

The Associated Press said that a little more than 100 companies are currently under investigation by the SEC and/or the Justice Department for possible options backdating.

Apollo Finds Issues With Option Grants (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

PHOENIX — For-profit education provider Apollo Group Inc. said Thursday a special committee found that certain former officers took steps "that may have been intended to mask failures" in the company's process for approving the grant dates for stock options.

In its final findings from its review of past stock option grants, the special panel confirmed preliminary findings that recorded grant dates may not have matched the actual day stock options were granted, but instead coincided with dates on which the company's stock traded at low levels.

Such a practice, known as backdating, increases the potential windfall from exercising the options. The practice itself is not illegal, but failure to disclose it can have legal and tax ramifications.

Apollo said the findings do not apply to any members of Apollo's current executive team. The company didn't name the former officers in a statement Thursday. Former chief financial officer Kendra B. Gonzales and former Controller Daniel E. Bachus left the company last month.

Apollo also said it will need to restate certain financials and file necessary amendments with the Securities and Exchange Commission, but has not yet determined when the filings will be made nor the magnitude of additional past liabilities.

DOJ_NMG_0106864

Apollo also said it is unable to file its quarterly report for the period ending May 31, and its annual report for the fiscal year ending Aug. 31 on time and has requested an extension.

Apollo expects to take a charge of about $34 million related to bad-debt expensing.

Meanwhile, Apollo named 49-year-old K. Sue Redman, senior vice president and chief financial officer of Texas A&M University, to its board of directors.

There are currently 104 companies being reviewed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and/or the Department of Justice as of Dec. 14, according to an AP review. There are at least 90 other companies that have launched or completed internal reviews of their stock options practices that aren't currently facing a SEC or Department of Justice probe.

Shares of Apollo rose 9 cents to $40.13 in aftermarket electronic trading following a rise of 96 cents, or 2 percent, to $40.04 in the regular trading session on the Nasdaq.

S.E.C. Eases Regulations On Business (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals, the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday issued a flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection.

In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that has come under attack from many companies.

It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. A number of companies have asked to withdraw, and officials said the current rules discouraged companies from listing on United States exchanges if they did not have the option of withdrawing later.

"We hope these proposals, when combined, will make the U.S. markets more attractive and we will get more companies here," said John W. White, director of the commission's division of corporation finance.

Among other noteworthy proposals the S.E.C. issued was one that would increase the financial qualifications for investors in hedge funds, to a net worth of $2.5 million from the current standard of $1 million. Officials said the proposal had the effect of adjusting the original rule for inflation, just as hedge funds are becoming more popular among some less wealthy people. The agency also proposed a new provision on fraud to protect hedge fund investors.

Some officials said the two proposals could blunt attempts to impose other tougher regulations or disclosure requirements on hedge funds. Six months ago, a federal appeals court said the commission exceeded its authority when it tried to force hedge fund managers to register with it.

The S.E.C. also adopted a rule that would save corporations the expense of mailing financial reports and proxy statements by enabling them to communicate with the vast majority of their investors through the Internet. (Investors can continue to receive paper copies of proxies and other material through the mail if they request them.)

And it proposed rules that would make it easier and less costly for banks to offer brokerage services.

Taken together, the proposals and rules are expected to provide enormous savings for public companies and Wall Street investment houses. Senior officials at the commission said the proposals and rules would not reduce the regulatory protections already afforded to investors.

The S.E.C.'s deregulatory push came a day after the Justice Department, in response to similar complaints, imposed new limits on federal prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. Under those new guidelines, prosecutors in the field will now have to obtain permission from senior officials before trying to get companies that are under investigation to waive their attorney-client privilege.

In weighing whether to seek the indictment of a company, the prosecutors will also no longer be permitted to consider whether the company is paying the legal fees of an employee involved in the inquiry.

In recent weeks, Bush administration officials and business groups have criticized some of the changes in corporate law, securities rules and criminal procedures that were enacted in the wake of accounting frauds five years ago at Enron, WorldCom and other highflying companies.

It remains to be seen whether the decisions by the commission and the Justice Department will take political pressure off Congress to go further, or whether the business groups that have been critical of the S.E.C. rules and the Justice Department's approach will be able to persuade lawmakers to retrench further.

The commission's votes on all the measures Wednesday were unanimous, testimony to both the changed regulatory climate and the political skills of the agency's chairman, Christopher Cox, a former Republican member of Congress. He tailored the changes to avoid the divisiveness that had troubled the tenure of his predecessor.

DOJ_NMG_0106865

Mr. Cox said the unifying theme of the proposals and the new rules was to increase the competitiveness and transparency of companies and markets.

"If America's markets aren't competitive, investors lose," he said. "If America's markets are not transparent and open, investors lose."

Like the decision at the Justice Department, the changes announced by the commission on Wednesday fell short of what some companies and groups had sought. In the case of the auditing rules, for instance, many businesses had sought an exemption from the requirements of Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. That provision requires public companies to assess the controls they have put in place to ensure that their financial reports are reliable.

Instead of a blanket exemption, officials said, the proposed guidance would give many small companies a powerful new tool in restricting their auditors from engaging in what the executives viewed as expensive and unnecessary audits of financial controls that had minimum impact on financial statements. A companion new auditing standard is to be proposed next week by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Under the guidance proposed by the S.E.C., executives would evaluate the design of only those financial controls that might carry the risk of having a material impact on financial statements. Commission officials emphasized that the guidance is being drafted to be less onerous on smaller or less intricate companies.

"Companies of all sizes and complexities will be able to conduct their evaluations more effectively and efficiently by following the proposed guidance," Mr. Cox said. "As smaller companies have less complex internal control systems than larger companies, this approach enables smaller companies, in particular, to scale and tailor their evaluation methods and procedures to fit their own facts and circumstances."

Auditing Reform: Mission Accomplished! (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Wonderful news!

The tough new federal regulators who were deputized to clean up the accounting industry after Enron, WorldCom and the other scandals have been busy reviewing the work and procedures of the Big Four accounting firms.

And guess what?

Everything is now hunky-dory. There's no need to worry any longer about channel stuffing, accounting for derivatives or backdating of stock options. The auditors have it covered.

We know this because not a single member of any Big Four accounting firm has been sanctioned or censured since the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board opened its doors in 2003. In fact, from what has been made public -- not much -- one might surmise that shoddy auditing has been found exclusively at a handful of small accounting firms.

Just as encouraging, the PCAOB -- "Peekaboo" to its friends in the industry -- has declared that the Big Four accounting firms have made "substantial, good-faith progress" toward fixing the systematic problems board investigators found with their internal quality controls. In fact, there's been so much progress that, under the agency's authorizing statute, no investor or corporate audit committee will know those deficiencies ever existed.

What we have here is yet another success for what is called "supervisory" or "prudential" regulation -- a concept that is all the rage these days. Rather than an antagonistic, enforcement-oriented regulatory regime that makes examples of wrongdoers and requires detailed rules, prudential regulation rests on behind-the-scenes collaboration between regulator and regulated.

Everyone's favorite model is Britain's Financial Services Authority, whose "light touch" approach to regulation is alleged to be one reason London has pulled ahead of New York as the place to list and trade stocks. In the United States, prudentialists want to bring the industry-friendly approach used by regulators at the Federal Reserve, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the PCAOB to the heavy-handed lawmen of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

There's only one thing wrong. It's a terrible idea.

First, as former SEC chairman Arthur Levitt and others wisely point out, there's a big difference between bank regulators, who care only about maintaining the "safety and soundness" of the financial system, and securities regulators, whose aim is to provide full disclosure, fairness and a level playing field for investors. If regulators like those at the Fed had been in charge of securities regulation, they would have lent Enron whatever it needed to avoid collapse, hushed up the investigation into financial chicanery and sent Ken Lay into a luxurious retirement.

Second, as current SEC Chairman Chris Cox explains, principles-based regulation doesn't work so well in the context of the U.S. legal system.

DOJ_NMG_0106866

The theory is that regulators would set down general principles and leave it to each company to decide how to implement them, without all the thou-shalt-nots. The regulator, however, reserves the last word in deciding whether a company's actions or policies pass muster. That's the way it works in Britain, where nobody dares defy the FSA.

But in this country, as soon as some company disagreed with the regulator, it would head straight to federal court to complain about "arbitrary" and "capricious" government oversight. In truth, the business community doesn't want to get lawyers out of the regulatory process -- just the government's lawyers.

Perhaps the biggest problem with "prudential" regulation is that, by its nature, it overlooks the worst kind of abuses -- those that become so commonplace that everyone thinks they're acceptable. Recent examples range from "managing" quarterly earnings to doling out hot stock offerings to favored customers. At some level, the lawyers, the auditors and the regulators understood that they violated basic principles of fair dealing. And yet few thought to question these practices.

In the end, it took whistle-blowers and outsiders like journalists and state attorneys general to expose these abuses and force new rules. But in the closed loop of a prudential regulator system, none of that would have happened. The whole idea is to keep the heathens out and work things out behind the scenes, without lawsuits, public sanctions or disclosure of embarrassing details.

And that brings us back to the good folks at Peekaboo.

Pardon my skepticism, but I have trouble believing that, as the PCAOB asks us to believe, the Big Four have miraculously transformed their corporate cultures, pushed out the bad apples and fixed all their quality-control problems.

Could it be true? Perhaps. But as long as the PCAOB shrouds its every action involving the Big Four under a cloak of prudential secrecy, we'll never know, will we?

Street Chiefs In For Big Paydays (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig, Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Record profits at Wall Street's big brokerage firms are already translating into big paychecks for the Street's chief executives, with the first out of the gate, John Mack of Morgan Stanley, hauling in an estimated $41 million.

But Mr. Mack's mark, disclosed yesterday evening, is likely to be eclipsed soon by one or more of his rivals. Compensation for Lloyd Blankfein, chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., will exceed $50 million, believed to be a record for big-firm CEOs, according to a person familiar with the matter. Last year, as president of Goldman, Mr. Blankfein made $38 million.

Analysts say they expect a handful of other CEOs could hit $40 million to $50 million or higher, including James Cayne of Bear Stearns Cos., Stan O'Neal of Merrill Lynch & Co. and Richard Fuld of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. The three made $30.3 million, $35.5 million and $34.5 million, respectively, last year.

Morgan Stanley yesterday said Mr. Mack received 461,821 shares valued at $36.2 million when awarded Tuesday, as well as options on an additional 178,945 shares valued at $4 million. The firm said the stock and options amounted to 100% of his 2006 compensation above his base pay, which was $337,534 last year. Mr. Mack took over the Wall Street firm in mid-2005 in the wake of a civil war in the executive suite. He received a signing bonus of $26.2 million when he landed, and the firm awarded him $13 million for his five months on the job last year, less than his peers.

During his first full year at the helm, Morgan Stanley reported nine-month profit more than doubled to $5.27 billion as net revenue rose 27% to $25.2 billion. Since the start of the year, its stock price is up 40%, second only to Goldman shares, which have surged 57% in the period.

It is bonus week on Wall Street, which is coming off a record year thanks to outsize trading and investment-banking returns across the board. "This has been another excellent year on Wall Street with earnings and stock up significantly, and CEOs will be paid accordingly," says Glenn Schorr, a stock analyst at UBS AG.

Goldman kicked things off with a bang Tuesday when it weighed in with record profits and plans to pay its employees $16.5 billion in compensation, the most ever for a Wall Street firm. Yesterday, Lehman and Bear disclosed their annual compensation payouts will be $8.67 billion and $4.34 billion, respectively. This translates into $334,000 per employee at Lehman and $320,000 at Bear. At Goldman, if the money were distributed equally, each employee would make $622,000.

Morgan Stanley is expected to report its annual compensation payout numbers Tuesday when it releases its fourth-quarter earnings. Merrill's numbers are due out in January.

All the money has Wall Street abuzz about who will make what this year. Bonuses are everything on Wall Street, a place where about half of all revenue is allocated to compensation and firms often pay out multimillion-dollar bonuses to make sure their best talent stays put. Top traders and bankers on Wall Street typically make a base salary of $100,000 to $250,000 -- the rest comes in a bonus. Employees tend to get their bonus numbers in the first two weeks of December -- with the cash coming early in the new year. Overall, bonuses are expected to be up 15% to 20% over 2005, with those at Goldman seeing increases as high as 30%.

DOJ_NMG_0106867

"Goldman's revenues are up about 50% and the rest of the peer group is up 25% so when your employees are delivering that sort of revenue growth you would expect their compensation would rise accordingly," said Jeff Harte, analyst in Chicago with Sandler O'Neill.

Lehman was the first to give investors a glimpse of its CEO pay when it filed notice with the SEC this week that it had awarded Mr. Fuld, its top executive, nearly $11 million of restricted shares. This 141,543-share grant was down from last year's $14.9 million, but Lehman has yet to disclose other parts of Mr. Fuld's compensation package, including his cash bonus and options.

In 2005 Mr. Fuld made $34.5 million, including a cash bonus of $13.8 million and 450,000 stock options with an estimated value of about $5 million. Like most other firms, his total package is expected to be disclosed in February. He got more good news earlier this month when the firm disclosed plans to award him stock valued at $186 million over the next 10 years, by changing terms of grants dating back a decade.

These are heady numbers even in financial-services circles. Jim Weddle, senior partner at St. Louis brokerage firm Edward Jones, the country's fourth-largest brokerage based on number of financial advisers and the largest based on number of brokerage offices, made $6.8 million in 2005.

Executive Compensation Comes Into The Clear (WP)

By Terence O'Hara

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Shareholders can expect a clearer picture of how much top executives are paid as new rules go into effect today, requiring companies to clearly explain their compensation practices.

The new regulations mark the biggest change to corporate pay disclosure in 25 years. They will force companies to release more information about different kinds of compensation and to more clearly justify those payments.

The Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the changes this year in response to a rising backlash against annual double-digit percentage increases in executive pay. The Corporate Library said this year that pay for chief executives at more than 1,700 public companies grew 16 percent in 2005, down from 30 percent in 2004.

Executive compensation practices have played a key role in several high-profile corporate accounting scandals, including those at Fannie Mae and Enron. More recently, the SEC has launched investigations into allegations that more than 100 companies improperly backdated stock-option grants.

Rising compensation has been fueled by the growing use of incentive pay, such as cash bonuses, stock options and other awards. Those incentives have made it hard for investors to get a total pay number on top executives.

Starting today, companies must add a section to the annual proxy statement sent to shareholders that analyzes compensation. In this section, company directors and managers must describe in detail how they determined compensation for the chief executive and other top officials.

The rules also mandate the inclusion of a compensation table laying out the pay for the top five executives. The table includes items that previously were not considered part of a current year's compensation, such as stock-option awards and the change in pension value in the event of an executive's retirement. The SEC has also tightened rules for valuing and disclosing perks, including use of the company jet, club memberships and personal trainers.

"The new disclosure will allow not only shareholders but directors and management to compare themselves with other companies," said Andrew Gibson, a partner at accounting firm BDO Seidman, who has helped about 100 companies prepare for the new rules. "We'll get the numbers, see what other people are doing and go from there."

Some of the changes were driven by recent instances of hefty retirement pay and perks made available to prominent executives after their retirement, including former General Electric chief executive Jack Welch, that weren't clearly disclosed to shareholders.

The new regulations do not include a provision commonly known as the "Katie Couric rule," which would require companies to disclose the pay of up to three non-executive employees whose compensation exceeds that of the top five executives. Business groups have resisted this proposal because of fear of poaching of highly valued and highly paid employees, such as celebrities and salespeople.

The SEC is working on a more limited version of that rule. Companies may be required to disclose the pay of employees who aren't necessarily among a company's top five officers, but only if they have significant authority or control over important parts of the business. Under that scenario, Couric wouldn't qualify for inclusion in CBS's proxy.

DOJ_NMG_0106868

While the new rules promise to reveal more about how executives are paid, many compensation experts doubt they will curb the double-digit growth in pay for chief executives.

"It's a data-collection issue for most companies," Gibson said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Criminal Inquiries Look At U.S. Oil-Gas Unit (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property.

The new investigations are still in the early stages, said Congressional officials who were briefed this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator.

The investigations are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters.

One Justice inquiry involves Interior Department officials in Denver who manage the government's fast-growing program to collect "royalties in kind," which are royalties in the form of oil and gas rather than in financial payments, people briefed on the investigation said.

That investigation is being run by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which examines suspected criminal violations by federal employees. The focus of the second investigation is unclear, but it is being conducted by the inspector general with help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Devaney, the department's inspector general, is already conducting two other investigations into suspected mismanagement of the minerals agency. And just last week, he issued a scathing criticism of the agency's system for auditing oil and gas royalty payments.

Mr. Devaney is also finishing up an investigation into how the Interior Department signed 1,100 oil and gas leases in the late 1990s that inadvertently permitted companies to avoid up to $10 billion in royalties over the next five years. The errors were made during the Clinton administration, but people briefed on Mr. Devaney's investigation said he had concluded that high-ranking agency officials either knew or should have known about the problem at least two years ago.

Representative Ed Markey, a Democrat from Massachusetts, said Thursday in a statement that Mr. Devaney had briefed his staff.

"The two criminal referrals by the Department of Interior's inspector general to the F.B.I. and Justice Department are proof positive that the conflicts of interest between Bush administration regulators and those they regulate in the oil and gas industry are costing the American taxpayers billions in royalty revenues," Mr. Markey said.

Word of the criminal investigations surfaced just as the Interior Department announced Thursday that five big oil producers had voluntarily renegotiated leases and agreed to not exploit a loophole that could save them hundreds of millions of dollars each.

The leases gave companies an incentive to drill in deepwater in the Gulf of Mexico by letting them skip royalties on millions of barrels of oil and gas. But the leases omitted a standard escape clause that would have required the companies to pay in full if oil prices rose above about $34 a barrel. Interior officials have said the mistake, if left unchanged, could cost the government as much as $10 billion.

The Interior Department said Thursday that it had concluded new deals with BP, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil, Royal Dutch Shell and Walter Oil and Gas. Those companies hold about 17 percent of the flawed leases, according to Interior data.

But about 50 other companies have not yet agreed to change their leases. Among them is Chevron, one of the biggest potential beneficiaries of the error. Chevron and several partners could save more than $1 billion in royalties in years to come if the lease language is not changed.

Don Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron, said company executives had met several times with government officials to resolve the matter. Mr. Campbell said his company "put a reasonable offer forward" and would "look forward to further discussions."

The new agreements did little to mollify the Interior Department's Republican and Democratic critics in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0106869

The incoming Democratic chairman and the retiring Republican chairman of the House Government Reform Committee sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, suggesting that the leases might never have been valid and that the government might be able to force the companies to pay up.

Officials have provided few details about the new criminal investigations, except to say they are "related" to previous inquiries of the royalty-management program.

Started about six years ago, the royalty-in-kind program has become a multibillion trading program run from Denver. Since President Bush took office, Interior officials and many of the industry's biggest producers have argued that the government should collect as much of its royalties as possible through "in kind" payments because, they say, the accounting is much simpler.

In 2005, the Interior Department collected about $3 billion worth of royalties in oil and gas — about a third of the total. The government funnels much of the oil it receives to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, but it sells virtually all its natural gas and sends the cash to the Treasury.

Congressional officials briefed this week by Mr. Devaney said he had cautioned that both of the criminal investigations would last several more months. Mr. Devaney said it was possible the investigations would not lead to criminal charges, though he suggested that they should at least lead to disciplinary actions.

5 Oil And Gas Companies To Pay Royalties (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Five oil and gas companies, including Shell, ConocoPhillips and BP, have agreed to pay royalties on future production under flawed drilling leases in the Gulf of Mexico, the government said Thursday.

The companies are among 59 energy producers that hold the leases at issue from 1998 and 1999. Because of a government mistake, the leaseholders have avoided royalty payments on oil and gas taken from federal waters. The leases omitted language requiring royalties when prices reached a certain level.

The agreements with the five companies are "a step in the right direction" and may lead others to find a way to rework the flawed leases, said the Interior Department's assistant secretary, Stephen Allred.

Some members of Congress have estimated that the royalty exemptions have cost the government $2 billion. Allred put the amount at "somewhat less than $900 million."

Congressional auditors have put the total government loss for past and potential future production under the leases as high as $10 billion.

The companies that reached agreement to begin paying royalties as of this past Oct. 1 are Shell Oil Co., BP PLC, ConocoPhillips Co., Marathon Oil Co. and Walter Oil & Gas Corp.

More than 1,040 of the leases were issued and about 570 are actively held by 59 companies, according to the Minerals Management Service, the agency that manages the leasing program. The companies that settled hold all or parts of 131 of the flawed leases.

"They're significant players," Allred told reporters.

He said other major leaseholders have refused to rework the deals and that some have refused even to discuss them.

Allred also acknowledged that the agreements Thursday deal only with royalties from future production and not oil and gas already taken.

"We do not believe that we have any ability to unilaterally change a contract," he said, explaining why the department is not seeking to recover royalties already lost from production.

The refusal of most of the companies to even discuss ways to correct the error in the 1998-99 leases has produced a political firestorm in Congress.

Both Democrats and Republicans have threatened to bar companies from future Gulf of Mexico drilling leases unless they agree to renegotiate the flawed leases.

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said on Thursday that resolving the matter will be a priority in the House's first 100 legislative hours after Democrats take control in January.

Allred, however, said banning companies from future leases if they do not rework the flawed ones would lead to legal fights and significantly could reduce domestic oil and gas production.

"Our fear is that our program would shut down" if companies were banned from future lease sales, Allred said.

Reps. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, and GOP Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, the current chairman, asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday to review the Interior Department's claim it cannot legally recover past royalty losses.

DOJ_NMG_0106870

They cited a private law firm's analysis that argued the government has "legal recourse to immediately seek recovery of lost taxpayer revenue" from past production under the defective leases.

"It appears that the assertions by MMS that there are no available remedies may be incorrect," Waxman and Davis said.

Interior Strikes Deal On Owed Fees With Oil Companies; Foregoes Collecting $900 Million In Back Royalties (FEDT)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, December 15, 2006

The Interior Department today announced that six oil companies will begin paying the government its due for off-shore oil drilling under federal leases that lacked price thresholds with which to calculate the royalties.

But the deal with BP, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil Co., Shell, and Walter Oil and Gas Corp. is not retroactive. The companies began paying royalties on the leases as of Oct. 1, 2006, meaning that an estimated $900 million already lost will not be recovered.

The agreement applies to 131 of the 570 leases still active today that were signed in 1998 and 1999. A total of 1,040 leases were signed in those two years without price thresholds, said Gary Strasburg a spokesman for the Minerals Management Service, which oversees the program.

Price thresholds are typically included in federal drilling leases that Interior signs with oil companies and they determine when and how much companies must pay the government for the oil it extracts from federal properties. Price thresholds were not included in the drilling leases Interior inked with companies in 1998 and 1999, resulting in those companies not paying any royalties. At Congress' request, the department's inspector general is investigating why they were not included in those leases. A spokesman for the department said the investigation will continue and the report is still expected out in the coming weeks.

The Minerals Management Service is working on agreements with the other companies that are still not paying royalties, Strasburg said.

The news of Interior's deal came just hours after leaders of the House Government Reform Committee sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to re-evaluate whether lost payments from the off-shore drilling leases can be recovered.

The Minerals Management Service has said nothing can be done to recover this revenue retroactively.

However, the House committee leaders told Gonzales that one expert analysis found that the government has legal recourse to collect the lost revenues. The analysis was done by Stephen Lowey, of New York law firm Lowey Dannenberg Bemporad & Selinger P.C.

"If you disagree with his analysis, we would like you to provide the committee with a legal analysis explaining why the department takes a different position," said the letter, dated Dec. 14 and signed by Reps. Tom Davis, R-Va., Henry Waxman, D-Calif., Darrell Issa, R-Calif. and Diane Watson, D-Calif.

Complicating matters, according to the letter, is the fact that MMS has reportedly offered to forgo any federal claim to lost revenues in the past if oil companies begin to pay royalties in the future.

"Nearly two months ago, the director of MMS announced that the agency and oil companies were very close to agreement. If these agreements were premised on an erroneous assumption that MMS has no legal remedies, they may not adequately protect the interests of the taxpayer," the letter said.

Duke Athletes Ask Judge To Bar Use Of Photo Lineup (WP/AP)

By David Scott

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C., Dec. 14 -- The woman who said she was raped at a party thrown by Duke's lacrosse team misidentified her alleged attackers in a photo lineup that was "an incoherent mass of contradiction and error," defense lawyers argued in court papers filed Thursday.

Attorneys for the three indicted players filed a motion asking a judge to bar prosecutors from using the photo lineup at their clients' trial and prevent the accuser from identifying the players from the witness stand.

Duke University law professor James E. Coleman Jr. said the case would be "effectively dismissed" if the court finds the lineup inadmissible "and rules that it is so suggestive that there can't be an in-court identification."

Within Thursday's motion, the defense highlights what it considers numerous holes in the accuser's story.

Among the details cited are examples of how the accuser's story changed in the hours and days after the party, that she has a history of bipolar disorder, that she identified two people as having attended the party who were not there, and that she identified four attackers during the April photo lineup.

DOJ_NMG_0106871

An earlier defense motion argued the lineup was "unnecessarily suggestive" because the accuser was shown only photos of lacrosse players.

Thursday's motion adds details about efforts by police investigators and District Attorney Mike Nifong to assist the accuser in identifying the three men she said gang-raped her in a bathroom at a March 13 team party where she had been hired to perform as a stripper.

Based in part on those identifications, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans were indicted on charges of rape, kidnapping and sexual offense. All three players have insisted they are innocent.

"There is quite simply no evidence that any of the accuser's identifications or descriptions of her alleged attackers are in any way reliable," the defense motion says. "Rather the state is left with an incoherent mass of contradiction and error, one which not only raises the issue of a 'substantial likelihood of misidentification,' but which establishes that the accuser has in fact misidentified the defendants."

Nifong, who has generally refused to comment about the facts of the case, did not return a message seeking comment.

A hearing is scheduled for Friday, but it is unclear whether the defense might argue their motions filed Wednesday and Thursday. The hearing had been expected mostly to deal with scheduling.

Polygamist Leader Ordered To Stand Trial (USAT/AP)

By Jennifer Dobner And Paul Foy, Associated Press

USA Today, December 15, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah — A polygamist church leader accused of forcing a 14-year-old girl to marry and have sex with an older cousin in 2001 was ordered Thursday to stand trial.

Warren Jeffs, 51, pleaded not guilty Thursday in state district court to two counts of rape by accomplice. The leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints could face up to life in prison if convicted. A trial was set for April 23.

Prosecutors said the girl had no choice but to obey Jeffs, whose influence over his followers has been described as extraordinary, dictating everything from where they live to whom they should marry.

The girl "expressed her disdain, reluctance, opposition and total dislike of sexual relations," Judge James Shumate said.

Jeffs was charged with two counts because prosecutors have said they believe they can prove at least two instances of sex.

"The state has overcharged Mr. Jeffs. And shame on the state," said defense lawyer Wally Bugden, who argued that Jeffs had acted no differently than a priest, rabbi or marriage counselor.

Bugden said Jeffs is being prosecuted for his faith, which holds that polygamy will bring men and their wives glory in heaven.

Washington County prosecutor Brock Belnap said: "People are entitled to whatever religious beliefs they want. But religion is no excuse for child abuse."

The woman, now 20, was not in the courtroom to hear Shumate's decision. She testified last month that she felt "completely trapped and defeated" during a ceremony at a Nevada motel — the "darkest time of my entire life."

The woman, identified as Jane Doe No. 4, left the sect after 3 1/2 years, remarried and had a baby last week.

Outside court, her attorney Roger Hoole said she was pleased with and relieved by the ruling.

In closing arguments, Bugden told Shumate he would be making a "factual leap" to find probable cause for a trial.

"Saying I don't want to get married is not the same as saying I don't want to have intercourse," Bugden said.

Prosecutors said Jeffs, who performed the wedding ceremony, was responsible for any trauma because he counseled her to submit to her husband, "mind, body and soul."

The girl and her cousin united in an FLDS religious ceremony but never held a valid marriage license. The cousin has not been charged.

Jeffs also faces felony charges in Arizona, accused there of arranging a marriage between a 16-year-old-girl and a 28-year-old man who was already married.

Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list when he was arrested Aug. 28 in a traffic stop north of Las Vegas. He is being held without bail.

Jeffs' sect traces its roots to early Mormon theology, which promoted plural marriage. The modern Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints disavows polygamy and renounced the practice in 1890 as a condition of Utah statehood.

FLDS members consider themselves "fundamentalist Mormons," although the mainstream church disavows any connection. They also consider Jeffs a prophet of God with dominion over their salvation.

The church has 10,000 members mostly living in Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah, on the Utah-Arizona border.

DOJ_NMG_0106872

Authorities Launch Crackdown On L.A. Schemes (LAT)

By Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

L.A.'s skid row has become a magnet for fraud schemes that use the area's homeless population to rip off the federal government, authorities said this week as they launched a crackdown on the activities.

In just the last few months, state and federal investigators have busted two food stamp scams, one of which involved a merchant who allegedly gave homeless people 50 cents on the dollar for their stamps, then charged the entire value — $6 million — to the government.

In November, officials filed charges against a MacArthur Park-area clinic for allegedly rounding up homeless people with Medi-Cal or Medicare cards and giving them a battery of medical tests charged to government programs. Authorities allege the bogus tests cost taxpayers at least $1.6 million and perhaps much more.

Another hospital in South Los Angeles is under investigation to determine whether it recruited homeless people for short stays at federal expense, according to law enforcement sources.

The incidents are the latest crime problem in skid row, a long-troubled area of downtown that is home to an estimated 10,000 homeless people and the largest drug-dealing bazaar in Los Angeles. The city is in the midst of a major effort to clean up the district.

But police worry that these latest scams are helping fuel skid row's drug trade by allowing homeless people to get cash to buy drugs.

"We have taxpayer money meant for food being converted to cash that goes to buy drugs from dealers and gang members," said LAPD Capt. Andrew Smith, who oversees policing on skid row.

Smith and other LAPD officials said there is also evidence that some drug dealers themselves are using food stamps as a form of currency.

In May, officers arrested eight people for allegedly running a crack cocaine ring in skid row. They found numerous food stamp debit cards in the hotel room where the ring operated. Detectives concluded the suspects were holding the cards as collateral for drug purchases.

Homeless advocates said skid row is a particularly easy target for scam artists because many of the transients receive government assistance. Though the government places strict limits on the kinds of items that can be purchased with food stamps, they said unscrupulous merchants with food-stamp card readers can cheat the system.

Stores that accept food stamp cards use an ATM-like machine in which people swipe their cards to purchase items. The machines, which require a personal identification number, were designed to reduce fraud.

But prosecutors alleged that in both of the skid row cases, the defendants used the machines to charge homeless people for items. Instead of food, the transients received a fraction of the dollar value credited to their cards, and the suspects recouped the full amount from the federal government, they said.

"It makes you sad and cynical the way some people take advantage of people here," said Andrew Bales, president of the Union Rescue Mission.

The mission's vice president of operations, Scott Johnson, said his team earlier this year began noticing vans soliciting homeless people several times a day with Medi-Cal or Medicare cards. He soon learned the people were being taken to an East Los Angeles clinic for medical tests.

"They'd pay $30 a day," he said.

The three owners of Workplace Industrial Management Clinic — Rudik Avakyan, Gayane Abramyan and Lusine Khatchatryan — were arrested in November on 37 felony counts and accused of fraudulently billing $1.6 million during the last two years. They have pleaded not guilty.

Court documents show that homeless people were brought by vans to the clinic two or three times a week. They were treated by the clinic's medical director, who prosecutors said was the late Mother Teresa's onetime personal physician. The state attorney general's office stressed in court documents that the doctor was not a part of the fraud and is considered an unwitting victim.

Prosecutors claim the clinic submitted bills for hundreds of "patients" — including 35 who were in fact deceased. In addition, the investigation revealed that the defendants billed the federal government for treatments when the physician was out of the country helping tsunami victims in Sri Lanka.

Last month, the U.S. attorney's office filed an even larger skid row case, this one involving mini-mart chain owner Tigran Malkhasyan and his assistant.

DOJ_NMG_0106873

Assistant U.S. Atty. Doug Axel said that by government estimates, Malkhasyan used his corner markets throughout skid row to defraud the federal food stamp program of more than $6 million.

Much of the activity allegedly occurred at Malkhasyan's Hollyfood Marts, at the southeast corner of 5th and San Pedro streets. That one store took in $5.2 million in food stamps during the last four years — a staggering amount considering the business reported $380,000 a year in total sales.

He was arrested in an undercover sting by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

According to court records, Malkhasyan asked undercover agents for their food-stamp cards and their personal identification numbers and told them to come back later to collect 50 cents on the dollar.

Malkhasyan, a Pasadena resident, wrote $1.4 million in checks to himself from the markets' bank accounts, and an assistant received $784,000, authorities allege. Malkhasyan and employee Karine Atikyan last week pleaded not guilty to 22 counts of fraud and conspiracy and were freed on bond.

The alleged scam is one of several that prompted the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors on Tuesday to order an investigation into the trafficking of food stamps. The county wants to know how much the scams are costing the county, which administers the stamps. Police officers said they have their work cut out for them on skid row.

Days after Malkhasyan was arrested, another man appeared at 5th and San Pedro streets, police said.

With transients lined up on the sidewalk, Willie Andrew Bassett allegedly swiped their food stamp debit cards through an electronic reader and gave the cardholders a fraction of the sum in cash.

When officers arrested him earlier this month, Bassett had $3,900 in his pockets.

Anti-Piracy Program Halting Cash Payouts To Employee Tipsters (IBD)

By J. Bonasia

Investor's Business Daily, December 15, 2006

Anyone who sees pirated software in the workplace may want to file a report by New Year's Eve, when the Business Software Alliance plans to suspend a year-old bounty program for whistle-blowers.

Under the program, the BSA offers rewards of up to $200,000 for workers who provide details about pirated software being used at their company. Payouts are based on reports that lead to a settlement.

The rewards program is being put on hold on New Year's Day as a way to motivate workers "to go from thought to action" in reporting cases before the year ends, said Jenny Blank, chief of enforcement at the BSA. Blank says the program will resume; she didn't say when.

"Our job is to educate those who do not take copyright laws seriously," she said. "Our view is that software piracy is primarily an ethical issue, and it can be hard to find a technology solution."

The program seems to work.

Tuesday, Burlington Coat Factory paid $300,000 to settle claims it used unlicensed software from Microsoft and McAfee.

The BSA also says Payless ShoeSource paid $124,057 to settle claims for unlicensed copies of software from Adobe, Borland, Internet Security Systems, McAfee and Symantec.

Payless agreed to delete any unlicensed software and buy replacements. The case was reported through the BSA's online form.

Symantec on Wednesday said it is suing a network of distributors the company claims sold counterfeit versions of its products. Named in the suit are ANYI, SILI, GT Micro, ASP Solutions, Mark Ma, Mike Lee, John Zhang and other affiliates.

Using illegal software can result in fines of up to $150,000 for each infraction. Since the BSA launched the program, the trade group has received 3,000 leads in the U.S. alone.

The BSA recently paid out $15,500 total to three people whose tips led to settlements. Ten others have also received various awards.

All money raised by the program through settlements helps fund efforts piracy education efforts.

In 2005, worldwide losses from such theft rose 5% from 2004, reaching $34.3 billion. Of personal computer software in the U.S., 21% was unlicensed, resulting in $6.9 billion in losses, says research firm IDC.

Pirating hurts software makers through lost sales, the BSA says. That translates to fewer industry jobs and less tax revenue for local economies.

The Justice Department has begun to crack down on the most egregious cases. In November, a three-person ring in California and Oregon was found guilty of a software piracy scheme that cost Microsoft more than $60 million.

Mirza Ali, 59, Sameena Ali, 52, and Keith Griffen, 55, were convicted of a conspiracy to sell discounted software for full price to dealers.

DOJ_NMG_0106874

In August, Danny Ferrer, 37, of Lakeland, Fla., received a six-year prison sentence and a $4.1 million fine for copyright infringement.

Ferrer pirated and sold bogus products from Adobe, Macromedia (now a unit of Adobe) and Autodesk, says the Software & Information Industry Association.

"This is not just a slap on the wrist anymore," Blank said. "The federal government takes this matter very seriously."

Ironically, the software development field itself is one of the leading culprits for piracy. Other industries most involved include sales and distribution, engineering, manufacturing, telecom and advertising.

Central and eastern Europe represented the biggest problem with a 69% piracy rate. Latin America was right behind at 68%. North America had the lowest rate, just 22%.

Vietnam and Zimbabwe topped the list of problem nations last year, both with a piracy rate of 90%.

"Piracy is so common in some of these countries that you almost have to wonder if they have more than one disk of software in the whole country," Blank said.

But because of the size of the U.S. market, it was responsible for the largest dollar-value losses last year.

Engineer Indicted For Alleged Espionage (NSDY/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- A Chinese engineer was charged Thursday with stealing trade secrets from a Silicon Valley company that made military training software and attempting to sell them to Asian governments.

Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, a Chinese national with Canadian citizenship, was indicted on 36 felony counts, including the rare charge of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government and various violations of military technology export laws.

In an unrelated but similar economic espionage case, two other engineers pleaded guilty Thursday to stealing proprietary computer chip designs from four technology companies and attempting to smuggle them to China.

Prosecutors say Meng stole the code for software made by his former employer, Quantum3D Inc., that's used to train military fighter pilots, and tried to sell it to the Royal Thai Air Force, the Royal Malaysian Air Force and a company with ties to China's military.

Under U.S. law, anyone attempting to sell such information overseas must first obtain a license from the State Department and is subject to strict regulations. Meng never applied for such a license.

No foreign government or agent was named as a conspirator in the case, and prosecutors declined to discuss whether any of the secrets were sold or whether any foreign officials or agents knew about the alleged scheme.

In economic espionage cases, the law does not require proof of complicity by a foreign government, and investigators often don't know the extent of foreign involvement.

Meng's case marks only the third time in a decade prosecutors have charged someone with economic espionage to benefit a foreign government, the most serious crime under the Economic Espionage Act of 1996. A conviction carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison.

Meng's defense lawyer, Angela Hansen, called the charges "baseless" and said in a statement the government has "misinterpreted innocent acts."

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the case highlights the threat U.S. businesses face from thieves looking to sell hard-won intellectual property overseas. Few cases allege intent to benefit a foreign government because it's difficult to prove, but he said U.S. companies are frequently targeted by overseas concerns.

"Silicon Valley understands full well the threat they are faced with here," he told The Associated Press. "It's not only a threat to the economic value of the products being produced, but in some cases it's a threat to our national security and military infrastructure."

In the second case, Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China, pleaded guilty in San Jose federal court to two counts each of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government as part of a deal with prosecutors. Ye and Zhong initially faced 10 counts each, and had been scheduled to go to trial in January.

They were charged with stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from their employers and attempting to smuggle them to China. The indictment alleges they planned to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies.

Ye and Zhong were arrested in 2001 at San Francisco International Airport, attempting to board a flight to China. Their luggage was allegedly crammed with thousands of pages of trade secrets stolen from four Silicon Valley companies -- NEC Electronics Corp., Sun Microsystems Inc., Transmeta Corp. and Trident Microsystems Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0106875

The indictment alleges the men, former employees of those companies, stole schematic drawings of computer chips under development, internal instructions for the design and layout of circuits and components, and other confidential information from the companies.

Documents seized from their homes included a corporate charter and a fundraising application touting the project's ability to raise China's stature in the field of integrated circuit design, according to the indictment.

Other documents allegedly show a panel of Chinese government officials had reviewed the company's business plan, deemed it feasible and encouraged agencies to provide financial support.

A business partner who tipped off the FBI told investigators the startup, called Supervision Inc., had received $2 million in funding from two Chinese cities, Hangzhou and Guangzhou, to develop the new microprocessor, according to an affidavit.

Both said little during Thursday's 40-minute hearing, and afterward declined to comment through their defense lawyers.

Ye and Zhong, who remain free on bail following their pleas, are scheduled to be sentenced April 23. Each face a maximum of 30 years in prison.

James Pooley, an intellectual property litigator and adjunct law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said the conviction -- the first of its kind -- was a much-needed victory for the Justice Department.

"You're finding people who aren't just trying to take something opportunistically from their employer. They're going places, planning to take trade secrets, and combining secrets from many different places," Pooley said. "This shows the problem is real and it's big."

The only other case to allege economic espionage involved two researchers indicted in Ohio in 2001 for allegedly stealing genetic materials used for Alzheimer's disease research and funneling it to a Japanese government-funded corporation.

But the case fizzled after Japan refused to extradite one defendant, Takashi Okamoto, because a Japanese judge ruled he had not violated U.S. laws. The other defendant, Hiroaki Serizawa, pleaded guilty in the U.S. to a much lesser charge of making false statements to investigators.

California Man Charged In Theft Of Military Secrets (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

A former Chinese national has been charged in a 36-count indictment in the theft of military trade secrets that authorities said he sought to sell to China, Malaysia and Thailand.

U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan in California said Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, of Cupertino, Calif., is charged with stealing military combat and commercial simulation software and other materials from his San Jose, Calif.-based former employer, Quantum3D Inc.

"This case highlights the vital importance of protecting the intellectual property and trade secrets not only in Silicon Valley but also for our country's businesses," Mr. Ryan said in announcing the indictment, which was handed up Wednesday.

"The alleged economic espionage and theft and export of trade secrets such as these -- visual simulation training software that has military application, no less -- has real consequences that could jeopardize our country's military advantages in the world, in addition to creating substantial financial losses for our businesses, which legitimately developed and owned this information," he said.

Mr. Ryan said the economic espionage charges accuse Mr. Meng, a former resident of Beijing of stealing trade secrets from Quantum3D with the intent they would be used to benefit the governments of China, Thailand and Malaysia.

The indictment said Mr. Meng stole numerous Quantum3D products, including "viXsen" and "nVSensor," which were used exclusively in military applications, and designed for precision training of military fighter pilots in night-vision scenarios among other applications. Both products are classified as defense articles on the U.S. Munitions List and cannot be sent outside the United States without an export license.

Many of Quantum3D's products were designed primarily for military purposes, including combat training in simulated real-time conditions and the use of advanced infrared, electro-optical and night-vision goggles.

According to the indictment, Mr. Meng took up employment with a competing company, Orad, to "pursue other career development opportunities in China." At one point, it said, Mr. Meng altered the Quantum3D's Mantis program to reflect the name of a program, which belonged to Orad, and used that program as part of a demonstration project in China.

The indictment includes three conspiracy counts, three counts of economic espionage and attempted economic espionage, two counts of violations of the Arms Export Control Act, 12 counts of theft of trade secrets and attempted theft of trade secrets, 15 counts of foreign and interstate transportation of stolen property, and three counts of making false statements to a government agency.

DOJ_NMG_0106876

"The FBI is committed to aggressively pursue those attempting to illegally obtain and export trade secrets vital to maintaining the United States' position as a world leader in innovation," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Charlene B. Thornton, who heads the bureau's San Francisco field office.

"Today's indictment highlights the value of cooperation between law enforcement and private industry in effectively conducting these investigations," she said.

Mr. Ryan said Quantum3D cooperated fully in the government's investigation.

Mr. Meng is scheduled to be appear before U.S. Magistrate Judge Howard R. Lloyd in San Jose on Monday. He initially was charged by criminal complaint on Dec. 9, 2004, and the original indictment remains under seal. He currently is free on $500,000 bond. If convicted, he faces 55 years in prison and fines totaling $2.5 million.

Paper Company Denies Misconduct (MJS)

By Joel Dresang

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 15, 2006

The Finnish parent of Wisconsin-based Stora Enso North America denied Thursday that it conspired to fix the prices it charged for coated papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs in the United States.

"Stora Enso denies any wrongdoing and will enter a plea of not guilty when it appears before the court at the arraignment to respond to the indictment," the company said in a statement issued Thursday. The indictment came Wednesday from a federal grand jury in Connecticut.

The indictment alleges that Wisconsin Rapids-based Stora Enso North America illegally set prices through an agreement with competitors from about August 2002 to June 2003.

About the time U.S. antitrust authorities from the Justice Department began investigating Stora Enso in May 2004, their counterparts in the European Commission started similar probes in Europe.

Last month, the European Commission notified Stora Enso that it had dropped its investigation of a suspected publication paper cartel in Europe. In August, European Commission investigators told Stora Enso they had stopped looking into allegations of anti-competitive pricing on fine writing paper in Europe.

"Both of these major European Union cases, the investigations have been stopped," Kari Vainio, executive vice president for corporate communications at Stora Enso, said in an interview from London.

"They are not related," Vainio said of the cases. "They just happened to start about the same time."

Vainio expressed confidence that, like the other cases, Stora Enso will prevail in the U.S. case.

"It's time for the legal process to decide what is the outcome, which we feel will be positive from our point of view," Vainio said.

If found guilty, the company could be fined up to $10 million, U.S. Justice officials said. But the fine could be increased to twice the gain derived from the alleged crime or twice the loss suffered by alleged victims if either of those is higher.

Stora Enso North America has about 2,700 employees at six mills in Wisconsin. The Finnish company acquired the company six years ago through a $4.4 billion buyout of Consolidated Papers Inc.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Dallas Jail Violates Rights Of Inmates, U.S. Report Says (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, December 15, 2006

DALLAS - The Dallas County Jail, one of the largest in the country, violates the constitutional rights of inmates by failing to provide adequate medical and mental healthcare, according to a federal report.

Page after page of violations are detailed in a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice, which also found that prisoners are not kept in safe or sanitary conditions at the detention complex, the seventh largest in the United States.

Among the more egregious examples were an HIV-positive prisoner who died in October 2005 from an infection after his antibiotic was withheld for 11 days and a woman who hanged herself in January 2003. Her records included an inmate request form she filled out two days earlier.

"I need to see the doctor to get my medicine straightened out. I am not getting my meds that my doctor faxed prior orders for me, and I brought in the medication myself and paid for it," it said. "I cannot afford to be treated this way! Please help me! I need my medicine."

There is no indication that the woman, identified only as M.K., received the medicine.

DOJ_NMG_0106877

The 47-page letter, dated Dec. 8 and signed by Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, was addressed to County Judge Margaret Keliher, who was defeated in the November election and leaves office at the end of the month. She did not immediately return a phone call from The Associated Press.

Dallas Sheriff Lupe Valdez has not seen the report, said spokesman Raul Reyna, who referred questions to Keliher.

The letter indicates that federal authorities expect to resolve the problems by working with county officials. If they are unable to, they warn that a lawsuit could be filed.

In February 2005, a separate report found that lapses in medical care in the Dallas County jail system resulted in undetected illnesses, excess costs and risks to the public. That report was produced at Keliher's request by Health Management Associates, partly as a response to the near death of James Mims. The mentally ill inmate's psychiatric medications were withheld for two months.

"If you listen to the local leaders, everything's fine. 'Problem? What problem?'" said Dallas lawyer David Finn, who represents Mims in a federal lawsuit.

In November 2005, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division notified the county that it would investigate conditions at the jail.

L.A. County Hate Crimes Jump 26% (LAT)

By Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

Reported incidents of hate crimes in Los Angeles County increased for the first time in four years, while such incidents in schools have more than doubled from last year, according to a report released Thursday.

The 26% spike in reported countywide hate crimes last year was fueled primarily by a nearly 50% jump in racially motivated offenses, especially toward immigrants and between African Americans and Latinos, according to an annual analysis by the county Commission on Human Relations.

The report tracked hate crimes reported to law enforcement or other agencies, but did not address which ones led to criminal charges or arrests.

Conflicts between blacks and Latinos erupted on the streets, in jails and at schools, with school-based hate crimes soaring by 111%. Many of these incidents on or near campus occurred in South Los Angeles, the report said. The figure does not include 11 of 14 large student scuffles last year. The commission did not receive reports on those incidents because it was difficult to determine if they were racially motivated.

"All it takes is one incident," Supervisor Yvonne Brathwaite Burke said.

The rise in hate crimes reported across the county bucks state and national downward trends, the commission found. The city of Los Angeles also measured a roughly 10% dip in hate crimes, said Assistant Chief Earl Paysinger of the Los Angeles Police Department.

Yet the number of reported hate crimes recorded last year — 633 — is still the second-lowest number since 1990. The 2004 tally was 502 incidents.

Violent acts of prejudice are "a virus in the petri dish of our society," Paysinger said. "It remains a significant challenge. The first step in inoculating us from this disease is awareness."

Nearly two-thirds of incidents last year were racially motivated, with 15% caused by religious intolerance and 15% related to sexual orientation. Attacks related to sexual orientation dropped by about a quarter from last year.

Blacks were the most common victims of hate crimes in 2005, followed by Latinos; gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender individuals; and Jews. Violence and vandalism were the most widespread offenses.

"The first step to solving this problem is identifying it," said Amanda Susskind, regional director of the Anti-Defamation League. "This is not a problem that's going away soon."

The commission's report highlighted simmering tensions between blacks and Latinos: the majority of suspects in anti-black crimes were Latino and vice versa, according to the organization's data. Hostilities sparked by heated debate regarding immigration could account in part for the increase in anti-Latino incidents, said Robin S. Toma, executive director of the commission.

The commission analyzed white supremacist crime for the first time and found 17% of hate crimes were perpetrated by such groups locally, compared with just 5% nationwide.

Commission members stressed that hate crimes still are widely underreported, and true statistics could be far greater than the numbers presented Thursday, especially in schools, jails and juvenile detention halls. Language barriers, distrust of law enforcement and fear of retaliation discourage people from reporting hate crimes, Toma said.

DOJ_NMG_0106878

Toma also attributed gang-related hate crimes — 11% of the racially motivated attacks from last year — to a lack of opportunities for youth, struggling schools and scarce jobs. He said the bulk of these crimes occur in low socioeconomic groups.

"The lack of resources creates an environment of violence," said the Rev. Eric P. Lee, executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Los Angeles.

The county commission defines hate crimes as offenses involving bias, hatred or prejudice based on a victim's "real or perceived" race, religion, national origin, disability, gender or sexual orientation.

Two-thirds of the data came from the Los Angeles Police Department and the county Sheriff's Department, with the rest provided by local police forces, school districts, community organizations and victims.

NJ Lawmakers Approve Civil Unions (AP)

By Geoff Mulvihill

AP, December 15, 2006

Ordered by New Jersey's highest court to offer marriage or its equivalent to gay couples, the Legislature voted Thursday to make New Jersey the third state to allow civil unions.

Democratic Gov. Jon Corzine said he would sign the measure, which would extend to same-sex couples all the rights and privileges available under state law to married people. The bill passed the Assembly 56-19 and the Senate 23-12.

"Love counts," Democratic Assemblyman Wilfredo Caraballo, a chief sponsor of the bill, said as the debate opened. "The gender of whom one loves should not matter to the state."

But Republican Assemblyman Ronald S. Dancer said: "It's my personal belief, faith and religious practice that marriage has been defined in the Bible. And this is one time that I cannot compromise my personal beliefs and faiths."

Massachusetts is the only state to allow gay marriage. Vermont and Connecticut have civil unions, and California has domestic partnerships that work similarly. Since 2004 New Jersey has had a more limited version of domestic partnerships.

Among the benefits gay couples would get under New Jersey's civil unions bill are adoption rights, hospital visitation rights and inheritance rights. Officials could begin granting civil unions 60 days after the governor signs the legislation; Corzine did not say when he would do so.

The bill was drafted in response to a New Jersey Supreme Court ruling in October that required the state to extend the rights and benefits of marriage to gay couples within 180 days. The court, in its 4-3 ruling, left it up to the Legislature to decide whether to call such unions "marriages" or something else.

Gay rights groups have argued that not calling such unions "marriage" creates a different, and inferior, institution. But they welcomed Thursday's legislation as a step toward gaining the right to marry.

Some lawmakers also considered Thursday's action to be an interim step on the way to full marriage rights.

"This should be called what it is — marriage." said Democratic Sen. Loretta Weinberg, a sponsor of the bill. She said the title should be changed after there has been some time to study how the civil unions bill works.

Steven Goldstein, director of the gay rights advocacy organization Garden State Equality, said he expects gay couples to be able to get married in New Jersey within two years.

Legislators Vote For Gay Unions In New Jersey (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

TRENTON, Dec. 14 — The Legislature voted on Thursday to make New Jersey the third state in the nation to recognize civil unions for same-sex couples. In doing so, it moved quickly to fulfill a court mandate to provide equal rights to gay couples but frustrated people on both sides of the emotional issue.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine, who is expected to sign the measure into law, said, "I think we're doing the right thing."

In joining Vermont and Connecticut in establishing the parallel institution of civil unions, New Jersey shunned the option of opening marriage to same-sex couples. Massachusetts is the only state that allows gay marriage, and it has a residency requirement; some same-sex couples have married in Canada.

New Jersey's new unions, which would take effect 60 days after the governor gives the nod, would expand on the domestic partnership arrangements the state has had since 2004. Gay couples would gain benefits like adoption privileges, inheritance rights and the ability to take a partner's surname without going to court.

But gay-rights advocates continued to contend Thursday that the separate institutions were inherently unequal and promised to keep pushing for nothing short of marriage itself.

"We're planning a massive rally the day the civil union law takes effect, to pre-empt the idea that this is a day for celebration," said Steven Goldstein, the chairman of Garden State Equality, a gay-rights group.

DOJ_NMG_0106879

Still, about 20 supporters of gay rights who had gathered in the gallery for the hourlong floor debate cheered when the Assembly voted 56 to 19 in midafternoon to approve the measure. They also applauded when Assemblyman Reed Gusciora, a Princeton Democrat, said, "The distance between nothing and civil unions is greater than the distance between civil unions and marriage."

But Assemblyman Ronald S. Dancer, a Republican from Ocean County, said that the bill was an affront to the Bible, and that "this is one time that I cannot compromise my personal beliefs and faiths."

The Senate passed the bill 23 to 12.

The civil union law was written under pressure, in response to a directive by the New Jersey Supreme Court seven weeks ago that the state grant gay and lesbian couples exactly the same financial benefits and legal rights as married heterosexual couples.

The Supreme Court gave the Legislature 180 days to decide whether gay couples should be allowed to marry or placed on a separate, parallel track. Both houses quickly settled on the civil union route, sending it through in just 10 days from introduction to final votes.

While the Legislature was instructed not to fall short of equality in the benefits it extended, conservatives lobbied to reserve the word "marriage" for heterosexuals, and on Thursday Republicans tried unsuccessfully to amend the bill to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

"I believe the foundation of our state is families, marriage, one man, one woman," said Senator Robert W. Singer, the Republican from Jackson who sponsored the amendment proposal. "Why do you want to crumble that? We're not taking away anyone's rights, just sanctifying what marriage is."

Without the amendment, the legislation leaves open the possibility of allowing same-sex marriage.

"Give us two to five years," said Assemblyman Wilfredo Caraballo, the Newark Democrat who introduced the civil unions measure. "In a year and a half or two years we'll see that the world hasn't collapsed, heterosexuals are still getting married and God hasn't thrown fire and brimstone on us."

Mr. Caraballo said proponents of gay marriage could not have pushed through a full marriage bill by the court's deadline in April.

He noted that just three years ago, it was a struggle to enact the limited package of rights and benefits that characterize domestic partnerships. "We had to twist arms to get 41 votes," he said.

But Mr. Goldstein pointed to the legislators, including some Republicans, who had said the civil union bill did not go far enough. "Today's debate for civil unions could be summed up in two words: buyer's remorse, for legislators who wish they were voting for full marriage equality," he said.

David Buckel, of the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, said after the Senate vote, "This law hit with a dull thud."

Mr. Buckel represents the couples whose lawsuit led to the Oct. 25 Supreme Court decision, in which the justices held unanimously that to deny them the full rights accorded married heterosexual couples violated their equal protection rights. He said he would consult his clients about going to the court again to argue that the new law does not meet its mandate.

Few legislators have said explicitly that they oppose civil unions. In the floor debate Thursday, several Republicans raised other objections (no Democrat voted against the measure).

Assemblyman Richard A. Merkt of Morris County contended that the Supreme Court had overreached, saying, "I expect once again this Legislature will surrender its authority as it has many times in the last 40 years."

Social conservatives had focused their efforts on retaining the traditional definition of marriage. Len Deo, the president of the New Jersey Family Policy Council, said at a news conference Thursday with Senator Singer that the civil union bill "moves us toward same-sex marriage."

"People have a right to rights," Mr. Deo said, "but they don't have a right to redefine an institution that's served us well for 2,000 years."

New Jersey Lawmakers Approve Gay Civil Unions (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

NEW YORK — Ordered by the state Supreme Court to allow gay marriage or create a legal equivalent, New Jersey lawmakers on Thursday chose to allow civil unions, making New Jersey the third state to do so.

Vermont and Connecticut allow civil unions, which include all the legal rights of marriage. Massachusetts is the only state that allows gay couples to marry.

DOJ_NMG_0106880

Seven weeks ago, New Jersey's Supreme Court ruled by a 4 to 3 margin that gay couples are constitutionally guaranteed the benefits of marriage. But the majority ruling left it to legislators to resolve the thorny question of whether to call their unions "marriage," reasoning that "the great engine for social change in this country has always been the democratic process."

The ruling gave legislators six months to resolve the matter.

New Jersey's elected officials -- among them Democratic Gov. Jon S. Corzine -- made it clear immediately that they preferred civil unions. The bill was hurried through the process in 10 days, giving marriage advocates little ability to argue their case, said Lambda Legal Defense Fund attorney David Buckel, who represented seven couples who sued the state for the right to marry. "The irony is that the court referred this matter to the legislature because it did not want to short-circuit the democratic process," he said. "The legislature is doing just that."

Others saw Thursday's vote as a victory for gay rights. By guaranteeing same-sex couples rights equivalent to marriage, lawmakers "have told the world that marriage no longer matters," said Robert Knight of the Media Research Center, who opposes gay marriage. "This is a social wrecking ball."

Steven Goldstein, chair of Garden State Equality, said he was "jubilant for the future," because so many elected officials had committed to press for marriage rights later. A marriage equality law would expand the legal definition of marriage to include same-sex couples.

"Mark my words, New Jersey will see the marriage equality law passed by this legislature within the next year or two," he said.

In the days after the New Jersey Supreme Court's long-awaited ruling, one thing became clear: Voters in New Jersey were at ease with the notion of civil unions. A Quinnipiac University poll taken in early December found that 60 percent of respondents supported civil unions, and 35 percent opposed them. Asked whether gays should be able to marry, 50 percent said no, while 44 percent said yes.

There was little backing for a constitutional ban on gay marriage. Fifty-eight percent of voters opposed that idea; 37 percent supported it.

"We need to take a deep breath and a hard look at political reality at this point in time in New Jersey," wrote Democratic state Sen. Loretta Weinberg, who sponsored the civil union bill, in an editorial last week in the Record in Bergen County.

"I have no doubt personally that we eventually will have gay marriages in New Jersey without any word symbols to diminish the beauty of two committed people of the same sex who love each other," she continued. "It would be wrong to delay providing the needed rights of marriage that will come with enactment of this legislation because of a dispute over words."

Matt Foreman, executive director of the Washington, D.C.-based National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, said he was greatly encouraged by New Jersey's embrace of civil unions. Six years ago, when Vermont legislators passed a similar bill, it was only after a debate "that took months and nearly tore the state apart," he said.

"What I think is remarkable is that civil unions isnow widely seen by almost everyone as a fallback position, not a huge leap forward," he said.

The civil unions bill passed the state Assembly by 59-19 and the state Senate by a vote of 23-12. Corzine has said he will sign it. The law will create a 13-member Civil Union Review Commission, which will study how well the unions work, evaluate similar statutes in other states, and make changes to improve the law.

Legal challenges by gay couples seeking to marry are still pending in Maryland, Connecticut and California. Twenty-six states have sought to pre-empt rulings by explicitly banning the practice in their constitutions. Supreme Courts in Washington and New York last July upheld state laws limiting marriage to one man and one woman.

Death Sentences Decline, And Experts Offer Reasons (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — The number of death sentences in the United States has dropped to its lowest level in decades, according to recent studies, including one released Thursday that predicts the trend will continue because of publicity about cases in which people are wrongly accused of crimes.

The Death Penalty Information Center, a group based in Washington, reported that the number of death sentences, which had remained at about 300 a year in the 1990s, began to drop steadily in 1999 and has declined almost 60 percent since then.

At the Justice Department, the Bureau of Statistics reported last week that there were 128 death sentences in 2005, down from 138 the year before. While the department study does not include an estimate for 2006, the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes the death penalty and tracks cases closely, says the number for this year will be about 114.

Defense lawyers, prosecutors, and groups that study the application of the death penalty all say there are several reasons for the trend. Among them are increased publicity about cases other than murder in which DNA testing resulted in freeing people who had wrongly been convicted of crimes, producing skepticism about the reliability of verdicts; recent Supreme Court decisions requiring that juries be told when life in prison without possibility of parole is an option, and improved legal representation for capital defendants, including a sharp increase in using specialists to develop arguments for mitigation.

DOJ_NMG_0106881

Mitigation specialists assist defense lawyers by investigating and presenting evidence to persuade juries to spare the defendant's life.

Richard C. Dieter, who heads the Death Penalty Information Center, said in an interview that the number of executions and the total population on death rows throughout the country had also declined in recent years.

But Mr. Dieter said that the annual rate of death sentences was the best index for judging the trend because it showed what verdicts were rendered by juries in particular time periods. The other figures can be misleading. For example, if executions went up suddenly, that would mean an abrupt decrease in the death row population.

A Gallup poll earlier this year showed that for the first time, Americans were almost evenly split when asked to choose which is a better penalty for murder, a death sentence or a life sentence without possibility of parole. Until recently, the public had overwhelmingly responded in favor of the death penalty.

Mr. Dieter said that the effect of the exposure of cases in which DNA established a person's innocence after conviction was hard to measure but probably significant.

"You could call this the DNA era," he said. "It's been quite a phenomenon over the last eight years and has had a great impact in raising doubts about the reliability of verdicts."

Joshua Marquis, the district attorney in Clatsop County, Oregon, agreed that the publicity over wrongful convictions overturned by DNA evidence might be a factor.

But Mr. Marquis, a vice president of the National District Attorneys Association, said it was not one of the significant reasons but was promoted by groups like Mr. Dieter's who want to "create the myth of innocence, that the public should be fearful of the death penalty because we're executing innocent people."

Mr. Marquis said DNA testing, usually used in crimes like rape, had never established that an innocent person was executed. The reasons for the decline in the death penalty, he said, generally involved greater discrimination among prosecutors in bringing capital cases and the significant drop in the rates of violent crime and murders.

Christina Swarns, director of the criminal justice project at the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said the fact that there had been no proven case of DNA testing demonstrating an innocent person's having been executed, might soon change with investigations of three executions in Missouri and Texas.

Other possible factors in the reduction of death sentences, experts say, are the truth-in-sentencing laws and recent Supreme Court opinions that require juries to be told when a sentence of life in prison without parole means just that. Mr. Marquis said that in Oregon, people sentenced to life used to serve little more than eight years on average.

The Supreme Court, in a series of rulings chastising South Carolina courts over several years, said juries must be told when they are able to impose a sentence of life that will insure that the inmate will never be released. Mr. Dieter said that in the past juries often imposed death sentences because they believed, sometimes correctly, that the defendant could be released before death.

Robert Rothman, a member of the American Bar Association's committee on the death penalty, said that the increased use of mitigation specialists by defense lawyers has also contributed to the decreasing frequency of the death penalty.

Mr. Rothman, an Atlanta lawyer, said that the specialists were experts at investigating a defendant's background and preparing it for presentation to a jury. He said the bar association's guidelines now make clear that a lawyer has an obligation not only to argue a client is innocent but also to present a thorough argument for the mitigating circumstances.

Executions In U.S. Drop To A 10-year Low (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

Executions in the U.S. declined to their lowest level in a decade this year, according to a study released Thursday by the Death Penalty Information Center, which opposes capital punishment.

Fifty-three people have been executed this year, with no more scheduled until 2007.

That is down from 60 last year and a significant drop from the peak of 98 executions in 1999, the Washington-based organization said in a year-end report.

Two-thirds of Americans still support capital punishment, the Gallup Poll found this year, but for the first time in two decades, it found that more Americans prefer that the penalty for murder be life without parole rather than death, by 48% to 47%, noted the Death Penalty Information Center.

DOJ_NMG_0106882

The attitude is a marked change from last year, when the Gallup Poll reported that 56% of Americans preferred the death penalty compared with 39% who supported life without parole.

This year's developments come amid exonerations of individuals who had been sentenced to death and amid challenges to the lethal-injection process that have led to execution stays in several states, including California, for most of the year.

A ruling is expected soon from U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose on whether California's lethal injection procedure presents an unnecessary risk of inflicting severe pain on condemned inmates and thereby violates the constitutional prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.

Similar challenges have delayed executions in Arkansas, Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota and in three federal cases.

Further fuel was added to the lethal-injection controversy this week when an execution in Florida took 30 minutes — twice as long as usual. Witnesses said the condemned man, Angel Diaz, appeared to be grimacing. Gov. Jeb Bush said an investigation would be conducted.

In addition to the decline in executions, fewer people were sent to death rows by juries, said Richard Dieter, executive director of the organization that released the study.

Dieter estimated that based on the most recent statistics available, the number of capital sentences imposed this year would total 114. That compares with 125 death sentences last year, according to Bureau of Justice statistics, and is a steep decline from the 276 imposed in 1999.

"The American public has turned an important corner in this debate," Dieter said.

"Support for the death penalty is on the decline, and more people are embracing the alternative sentence of life without parole, which is now available in almost every state."

Thirty-seven states permit capital punishment.

"Capital punishment is risky, expensive and could result in irreversible error," Dieter said.

"Fewer people are now willing to put their faith in such a flawed policy."

Less crime may be a factor

Joshua Marquis, vice president of the National District Attorneys Assn., strongly disagreed, attributing the drop in death sentences instead to a recent nationwide reduction in violent crime generally "and murder specifically," as well as to jurors and prosecutors who were "becoming appropriately more discriminating about when to respectively seek and impose a death sentence."

The Gallup Poll found this year that 63% thought an innocent person had been executed in the last five years and 64% thought the death penalty had no deterrent effect.

On the other hand, 60% said they thought the death penalty was administered fairly, and only 21% thought the death penalty was imposed too often.

Death penalty foes said they were heartened by a number of developments this year beyond the decline in death sentences and executions.

New Jersey became the first state to enact a moratorium on executions through legislation, and it joined states including California and North Carolina in forming a commission to study the fairness and reliability of the death penalty. New York legislators declined to reinstate the state's death penalty statute, which had been thrown out by a court.

Dieter also noted that the American Bar Assn. overwhelmingly passed a resolution in August calling for an exemption from the death penalty for the severely mentally ill.

A similar resolution was endorsed earlier by leading mental health groups.

Texas still leads

The number of executions may have decreased nationally, but Texas, the nation's perennial leader, executed five more people this year than in 2005. Texas' 24 executions represented 45% of the national total. Ohio was second, with five.

There are 3,316 inmates on death rows nationwide, with California having by far the most at 655.

California executed one person this year — the 13th in the state since capital punishment was reinstated, in 1977.

ANTITRUST:

Feds Defend Approval Of Telecom Megamergers (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET News.com, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106883

The U.S. Justice Department on Thursday denied allegations that it fudged the analysis that prompted it to approve two telecommunications megamergers now under scrutiny by a federal judge.

In a Thursday filing with U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan in Washington, D.C., Department of Justice lawyers took issue with accusations of wrongdoing lodged by opponents of the twin deals--between AT&T and SBC Communications, and Verizon and MCI--at a November 30 court hearing. The public version of Thursday's document was redacted.

Sullivan had given the Justice Department the opportunity to respond to a lengthy presentation by Silicon Valley attorney Gary Reback on behalf of the Alliance for Competition in Telecommunications, a group formed to oppose the deals. Reback accused the Justice Department of making up facts and ignoring critical considerations while analyzing the competitive impact of the deals.

In its court filing, the Justice Department continued to defend its analysis, arguing that the allegations were "based on mischaracterizations of relevant legal standards, misstatements of United States' positions, and misrepresentations of the factual record."

When approving the mergers, the Justice Department concluded that it needed to place limited conditions--namely, requirements aimed at ensuring that the companies' competitors could gain access to fiber-optic connections in certain commercial buildings where Verizon and MCI or AT&T and SBC had been the only two companies supplying some types of connections.

Reback had argued that the antitrust analysis should have considered situations in which three competitors became just two, or even those in which four competitors were whittled down to three by the melding of the companies.

The Justice Department's filing represents the Justice Department's latest attempt to persuade Judge Sullivan that he should sign off on the deals. Since the summer, Sullivan has been pressuring the government to provide additional information about why it believes the mergers satisfy the "public interest."

A 1974 federal antitrust law called the Tunney Act calls for a court to vet agreements negotiated between the Justice Department and the companies involved to ensure the deals meet that standard. Congress recently amended the law to give judges even greater latitude in reviewing cases.

At the latest hearing involving attorneys for the government, the telephone companies and outside interest groups, attorneys for Verizon and AT&T said they were convinced that the Justice Department's conditions erased any possible antitrust concerns. Sullivan, however, said he did not plan to "rubber stamp" the deals and left no indication as to when he might arrive at a decision.

Stalemate Keeps AT& T-BellSouth Merger Off Of FCC's Agenda (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin J. Martin said yesterday he did not know how soon it would consider AT&T's proposed $86 billion acquisition of BellSouth after the deal was left off the agenda for Wednesday's meeting because of a continuing stalemate between the commission's Republican and Democratic members.

Martin, an advocate of the merger, told reporters he was "anxious" to set a date for the vote, which would create the country's largest provider of telephone, wireless and broadband services. AT&T and BellSouth have waited more than seven months for the commission to act despite Martin's efforts earlier this year to win quick approval of the transaction without conditions.

The FCC has repeatedly delayed voting on the merger in recent months because of a stalemate between Republican supporters of the deal and their Democratic counterparts, who want to impose safeguards meant to protect consumers and ensure competition within the industry.

One of the main obstacles is disagreement over whether to require a "net neutrality" condition that would bar AT&T from asking different Internet services to pay different prices for using its lines.

To break the deadlock on the five-member board, the FCC's general counsel ruled last week that the potential swing vote, Republican Commissioner Robert M. McDowell, could take part in the consideration despite his concerns of a conflict of interest. McDowell has so far refrained from participating in the commission's review of the proposed merger because he previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, as association that lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth.

The opinion from the general counsel, Samuel Feder, left open the option for McDowell to abstain. McDowell, a Virginia lawyer, has yet to say whether he will ultimately participate in the vote, and if does, where he might stand on the conditions under debate.

DOJ_NMG_0106884

In a letter to Feder this month, AT&T and BellSouth senior executives said they would not object to McDowell's participation, suggesting this would shift the dynamic on the commission in their favor, despite his earlier lobbying work.

"Commissioner McDowell stated at his confirmation hearing that he will be 'a fair, judicious, impartial, thorough and thoughtful adjudicator, arbiter and policymaker' and that he will 'prejudge nothing,' and we take him at his word," wrote AT&T Senior Vice President Robert W. Quinn Jr. and BellSouth Vice President Jonathan Banks.

But Gigi B. Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, a public interest group in the District that has opposed efforts to approve the merger without conditions, said last week that McDowell's participation would compromise the FCC's integrity.

"It is unseemly to try to force the commissioner to violate the ethical constraints not only of the commission, but of the Virginia Bar as well," Sohn said. "A better solution would be for Chairman Martin to reconsider his opposition to the pro-competitive and pro-consumer merger conditions."

The proposed acquisition has dramatically increased in value since it was presented to the FCC because of rising stock prices. If approved, the merger would reunite much of the AT&T telecommunications empire broken apart by the federal government 22 years ago because of concerns over competition.

Despite Feder's intervention, it has become increasingly clear in recent days that the merger would likely not be ready for FCC action at its regular meeting Wednesday. Martin said last week it would be difficult for the commissioners to reach an agreement in time. Even if McDowell decides to weigh in, he might need several weeks to familiarize himself with the debate and read the extensive filings by the companies and their supporters and critics, industry analysts said.

Should a majority of commissioners come to an understanding on any conditions, the merger could still be added to the Wednesday agenda or taken up at separate special meeting. The FCC is also not legally required to vote on the deal in public and could approve the acquisition without meeting at all.

Merger Hold Up (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Democrats are back in power in Washington, and one question is whether their wilderness years taught them anything about the wisdom of restraint in regulating business. One early sign that they've learned nothing is their behind-the-scenes effort to delay, and maybe deep-six, the $80 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger.

The deal has the support of Big Labor, was approved by the Justice Department without conditions in October, and would help consumers by bringing more competition to telecom amid enormous technological change and business ferment. But the merger has been held up for months at the Federal Communications Commission, thanks to the political maneuvering of the two Democratic Commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein.

The pair have cited the size of the deal, the volume of public comment it has generated, and even the Justice Department's approval as reasons for delay. But what's really going on here is an old-fashioned regulatory hold up, in the armed-robbery sense of the word. The two Democratic Commissioners want the combined company to accede to "Net neutrality" commitments that go well beyond the FCC's own policy paper on the matter.

Net neutrality is a solution in search of a problem. It is supposed to require that network operators like AT&T or Verizon behave in a "non-discriminatory" way toward Web site operators like Yahoo or Google. In practice, this means restricting the ability of the telecom companies to set market prices for use of their broadband pipes.

But companies aren't likely to invest in laying those pipes if they can't get a market return. And the conditions the Democrats are trying to extort from AT&T could even exceed those found in the several bills that failed to pass Congress this past year. In all of this they are carrying water for rich special interests, in particular Google and the rabble-rousing left-wingers at MoveOn.org. * * *

In a better world, a Democratic minority on the five-member FCC wouldn't be able to use a merger review to engage in back-door regulating. AT&T has already agreed to abide by the FCC's "four principles" of Net neutrality, which is itself a nonbinding document but the closest thing to a public policy on the matter. But Commissioners Copps and Adelstein still won't let the merger proceed.

The Commission's three Republicans would normally still have a majority. But one of them, Robert McDowell -- who would in all likelihood vote to approve the merger without conditions -- must confront an "ethics letter" presented to the Senate at the time of his confirmation in May. In that letter, Mr. McDowell agreed not to vote on any matter to which his former employer, the telecom industry group Comptel, is a party. And Comptel has since made itself a party by weighing in against the AT&T-BellSouth deal.

Last week the FCC's general counsel gave Mr. McDowell a new letter authorizing him to participate in considering the merger. However, sources with knowledge of the matter tell us that Mr. McDowell feels somewhat less than comforted by this ethics "comfort letter." The political risk he runs is that if he votes to approve the merger, Mr. McDowell could incur the trumpedup "ethics" wrath of the new Democratic committee chairmen who are allied with the FCC Democrats. The likes of John Dingell and Ed Markey could make life miserable or worse for Mr. McDowell, as they did for so many others back when they ran Congress before 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0106885

In short, the Democrats on the FCC and in Congress are engaged in a kind of bad cop-worse cop routine with Mr. McDowell: Either he must stay recused on the merger so they can extort more concessions from the new AT&T, or he can vote for the merger and risk spending the rest of his days answering subpoenas. Never mind that if Mr. McDowell does stay recused, the two companies might very well let the merger die rather than submit to regulation that would hamper their ability to recoup their investment in laying broadband pipe.

Strangely, some of our free-market friends in Washington are painting Mr. McDowell as the villain for refusing to step into this bear trap. The AT&T merger was already on the table when Mr. McDowell was confirmed and Comptel's objection to the deal was foreseeable even then. Rather than pillory Mr. McDowell, public attention ought to be on the Democratic minority on the commission as the forces trying to use this merger for their own narrow political purposes. * * *

The real conflict of interest here is not Mr. McDowell's past association with Comptel. It's the Democrats' willingness to carry water for Google and MoveOn.org in the Net neutrality debate. Net neutrality lost so resoundingly in the last Congress that it's unclear even now whether the Democrats have the votes to pass a law imposing it. They certainly do not have the votes at the FCC to impose neutrality requirements via regulation.

A Net neutrality condition has nothing to do with the merits of this merger. If the deal falls apart over this special-interest vindictiveness, it will be a sign that the bad, old anti-business Dems are back in charge.

If More US Airlines Merge, Who Would Benefit? (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

Wall Street is so buoyant about possible mergers among the nation's last six traditional carriers, you'd think airline consolidation was the best thing for the industry since the jet engine replaced the turbo prop.

But an increasing number of analysts are questioning that assumption, and suggesting that all the merger talk may in the end be just that - talk.

"We're in an environment where everyone believes the mantra that consolidation is both necessary and inevitable, but it is neither," says Michael Boyd, president of the Boyd Group, aviation consultants in Evergreen, Colo. "The carriers like American, Northwest, and Continental are making money. Why do they have to merge? We have a very competitive system now."

This latest round of merger talk was sparked by United Airlines' chief executive Glenn Tilton reiterating his stance that "consolidation is good and overdue for the industry" at a shareholder's meeting earlier this week. That prompted a series of still unconfirmed reports that United and Continental Airlines were talking about just such a deal.

Both companies' stock went up more than 5 percent, and it fueled speculation that US Airways' proposed hostile acquisition of Delta Air Lines was gaining momentum. That, in turn, prompted other reports that American Airlines and Northwest were also talking about joining forces - not necessarily because they want to, but because they would have to as a defensive move so they could compete with their potentially merged rivals.

If all the frenzied speculation pans out, the nation would go from six traditional carriers to three. That could put the profitable, but still financially fragile, carriers firmly back in the black, Wall Street analysts crowed.

But an increasing number of airline analysts are raising red flags, noting that federal regulators may not find such a scenario as appealing as the airlines' stockholders and top management teams.

Congressional leaders have also signaled their concern that mergers like a US Airways-Delta one could raise serious antitrust issues. Those two airlines fly similar routes in the South and East, and each owns one of the two shuttles between Boston, New York, and Washington. If a deal were approved, one of the shuttles would have to be sold, say experts. But that wouldn't address other antitrust issues that could drive up prices and reduce consumer choice in a variety of cities.

"If you put US Airways together with Delta, and there's no additional strength there, that's all about reducing competition," says Mr. Boyd. "It's Wall Street wanting to make money that's driving the merger talk."

Advocates of the mergers, like US Airways chief executive Doug Parker, say there is still too much "fragmentation" in the current aviation system, which undermines the airlines' pricing power. That continues to make it difficult for them to fully recover from the past five years' losses, which amount to more than $30 billion. With efficiencies gained from a merged company, Delta and US Airways would be able to further cut costs and reduce capacity by about 10 percent, according to Mr. Parker. Similar moves in the past have already helped his company return to profitability, he says.

"US Airways is the product of several successful mergers, most recently the combination of America West and US Airways," he said last week. "Working together, we have blended employees and cultures to create a new standard in the industry, which combines the best attributes of a low-fare carrier and a full-service airline. We fully expect the 'New Delta' to exceed these already high standards in the marketplace."

DOJ_NMG_0106886

US Airways still needs the backing of the Delta creditors' committee to proceed with its takeover plans. Delta's management and most employees are still opposed to a takeover and are determined that the company will emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone entity.

United is reportedly watching the US Airways proposal to determine whether the market, Congress, and regulators would also warm to the idea of a United-Continental merger. If the US Airways-Delta merger fails, United is expected to be less likely to move ahead.

Aviation analysts like Kevin Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa., believe that would be the best scenario. He argues that a flurry of mergers right now would raise prices, overcrowd already-packed planes, and create chaos for customer service for years to come precisely because it is so difficult to merge aviation corporate cultures.

"Of course, Wall Street is going to push it," he says. "What's good for investors, shareholders, and management may not be good for others: Lots of employees will be laid off, and customers can look forward to 20 to 30 percent price hikes and several years of customer-service [misery]."

Antitrust Wait Ends In $1.1B Sirna Acquisition (BZJRNL)

Silicon Valley/San Jose Business Journal, December 14, 2006

Merck & Co. Inc. and Sirna Therapeutics Inc. said Thursday that the federal regulatory antitrust waiting period has expired for Merck's $1.1 billion acquisition of Sirna.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck (NYSE:MRK - News) and San Francisco-based Sirna (NASDAQ:RNAI - News) agreed on Oct. 30 to the purchase at $13 a share in an all-cash transaction.

The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the sale conditions, and the companies said consummation of the merger -- which is expected to occur in late December or early in the first quarter of 2007 -- remains subject to other customary closing conditions including approval by Sirna stockholders.

Sirna Therapeutics is a clinical-stage biotechnology company developing RNAi-based therapies for serious diseases and conditions, including age-related macular degeneration, hepatitis C, dermatology, asthma, respiratory syncytial virus and Huntington's disease.

Merck-Sirna Deal Clears Waiting Period (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

NEW YORK — The federal antitrust waiting period for pharmaceutical company Merck & Co.'s $1.1 billion buyout of biotechnology firm Sirna Therapeutics Inc. expired Thursday.

Merck and Sirna announced the buyout Oct. 30 and expect the deal to close either this month or during the first quarter.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck offered $13 per share for Sirna, nearly a 102 percent premium over its closing price of $6.45 on the Nasdaq prior to the bid's announcement. Sirna shareholders are scheduled to vote on the buyout offer Dec. 28.

Sirna focuses on developing RNA interference, or gene-silencing technology. Drugs and treatments using the technology target specific genes at the root of a condition or disease, aiming to shutdown that gene, rendering the condition, such as a type of cancer, inactive.

The San Francisco-based company saw revenue of $4.9 million in 2005, compared with Merck's $22 billion in annual sales.

Shares of Merck added 47 cents to $43.81 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while Sirna shares edged up 2 cents to $12.93 on the Nasdaq.

ProSieben Holders To Sell Stake In Private Buyout (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

FRANKFURT -- The controlling shareholders of ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG have agreed to sell their stake in the German broadcaster to private-equity firms Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. of the U.S. and Permira of Europe, according to people familiar with the matter.

The bid for Germany's largest television broadcaster by advertising revenue was in the range of €28 to €29, or about $37 to $38, a share, valuing ProSiebenSat.1 at a bit less than €6 billion, or about $8 billion, these people said.

The bid beat out a rival offer from Turkish media group Dogan Yayin Holding as well as a joint bid from Britain's Apax Partners and the investment arm of U.S.-based Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0106887

KKR and London- and Frankfurt-based Permira are interested in combining ProSiebenSat.1 with SBS Broadcasting, which they acquired last year for €1.69 billion. SBS has television-broadcasting operations in nine European countries, but not in Germany. The addition of ProSiebenSat.1 would create a more powerful rival to big European broadcaster RTL Group, which is controlled by Bertelsmann AG of Germany.

A spokesman for German Media Partners LP, ProSiebenSat.1's controlling shareholder group since 2003, declined to comment. KKR and Permira also declined to comment.

German Media Partners, headed by investor Haim Saban, put ProSiebenSat.1 on the block in October. This is the second time since 2005 that the consortium of private-equity investors has agreed to sell its 50.5% capital stake and 88% voting stake in the broadcaster. An earlier deal that would have transferred control to German publisher Axel Springer AG was blocked in January 2006 by domestic regulators, who feared a tie-up would give Springer too much sway over public opinion.

German Media Partners had hoped to attract as much as €35 apiece for its shares, valuing the broadcaster at about €6.5 billion. Such a price would have represented roughly four times the group's initial investment and a big increase from Springer's offer of €23.37 a share in August of last year, when Germany's economy and ad market were weaker. ProSiebenSat.1 expects to book an operating profit of close to €500 million this year, about three times that of 2003.

At €28 to €29 a share, ProSiebenSat.1 would be valued at between 11.5 and 12 times earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization, according to one person close to the transaction. That would put it in line with other commercial European broadcasters, the person added.

German Media Partners comprises Saban Capital Group Funds, Bain Capital Partner Funds, Hellman & Friedman Funds, Thomas H. Lee Partners Funds, Providence Equity Funds, Quadrangle Funds and Alpine Funds.

Hearst Expects To Close "Daily Breeze" Purchase This Week (E&P)

Editor & Publisher, December 14, 2006

TORRANCE, Calif. Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Daily Breeze on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators.

The document was filed Wednesday in a pending federal antitrust case involving Denver-based MediaNews and New York-based Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, over their plans to consolidate some of the business operations of their San Francisco Bay area newspapers.

A San Francisco investor is trying to block the deal, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws.

The two companies also said they had finished negotiations in their swap deal. Under the agreement, Hearst will purchase the Torrance-based Breeze from The Copley Press Inc. and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

San Diego-based Copley, whose flagship paper is the San Diego Union-Tribune, cited competitive pressures when it indicated in June it wanted to sell its Copley Los Angeles Newspapers. Those papers include the Breeze, the Palos Verdes Peninsula News and The Beach Reporter.

Rochester Medical Settles With C.R. Bard (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

STEWARTVILLE, Minn. (AP) -- Catheter maker Rochester Medical Corp. said Thursday it reached a $49 million settlement with medical devices company C.R. Bard Inc.

Under the terms of the agreement, Rochester Medical will dismiss C.R. Bard from a lawsuit it filed in March 2004 against C.R. Bard, Tyco International Ltd., Tyco Healthcare Group LP, Novation LLC, VHA Inc. and Premier Purchasing Partners LP.

The lawsuit alleged that C.R. Bard, among others, conspired to exclude it from the market and violated antitrust laws.

C.R. Bard has agreed to pay Rochester $49 million, and it plans to take a fourth-quarter pretax charge to reflect the settlement.

Last month Rochester Medical reached a settlement with Premier Inc. and Premier Purchasing Partners LP that dismisses the companies from an anti-competition lawsuit.

The company said the litigation continues against the other defendants in the case, which is scheduled to go to trial in May 2007.

VHA and Novation said they believe the charges in Rochester Medical Corporations lawsuit are without merit, and they plan to vigorously defend against the claims.

The other defendants named in the lawsuit were not immediately available to comment.

Shares of Rochester Medical were trading at $12.35 in the after-hours session, up 97 cents, or 8.5 percent, from Thursday's closing price of $11.38 on the Nasdaq.

DOJ_NMG_0106888

Municipal Bond Probe May Spur Damage Claims, Legal Experts Say (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- The federal criminal antitrust probe into the municipal bond market that has yielded more than a dozen subpoenas of brokers, bankers and insurers may also lead to a spate of civil lawsuits by cities, said an antitrust expert at the University of Iowa law school.

Civil claims typically follow in the wake of successful criminal price-fixing investigations by the U.S. Justice Department. For example, a government probe of vitamin producers prompted more than $3 billion in civil settlements beginning in 1999.

"If it turns out there is a nationwide conspiracy to fix interest rates" of investment contracts sold to local governments, "it's got to be big," said Herbert Hovenkamp, 58, a University of Iowa law professor and editor of the most widely cited treatise on U.S. antitrust law.

The basis for civil suits by cities could be a claim they were overcharged by an alleged conspiracy to rig bids on the contracts they buy to invest bond proceeds. Municipalities need to invest the money until it is required for projects.

Among the firms the Justice Department has subpoenaed are New York-based JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest U.S. bank, American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurer, and Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels-based Dexia SA.

The probe is still in its early stages and criminal charges may be more than a year away. Should the probe result in convictions, it would encourage state and local governments to go to court to seek damages triple their actual losses. Damage awards in successful price-fixing suits are automatically tripled, except in cases where the Justice Department grants a company amnesty from prosecution in return for blowing the whistle on the criminal conspiracy.

Lower Returns

In the vitamin conspiracy, evidence of a global cartel led to guilty pleas by Roche Holding AG and BASF AG in a case that prosecutors nicknamed "Vitamins Inc." The pleas helped bulk purchasers of vitamins win a $1.2 billion settlement with the two companies and other participants in the scheme. The two companies also paid criminal fines totaling $725 million.

Another 130 bulk purchasers of vitamins, including such companies as Kellogg Co., Tyson Foods Inc. and Campbell Soup Co., representing more than $2 billion in purchases, negotiated separate settlements that remain confidential.

Those settlements were spurred by the threat of class- action claims by thousands of consumers. Suits against the investment banks and other defendants probably would move at a slower pace.

Class Actions

"You wouldn't necessarily see an announcement of this investigation trigger the filing of a whole bunch of class actions," said Washington lawyer William Isaacson, 46, who represents plaintiffs for the law firm of Boies, Schiller and Flexner in Washington.

City governments will exercise "a fair amount of caution" and would want to first "figure out how much is at stake," he said.

Plaintiffs' lawyers probably wouldn't file a traditional class-action case, in which the court is asked to allow a lawsuit on behalf of all consumers who bought a particular product from a company. In such cases, an individual consumer has the right to opt out of the lawsuit and bring a separate claim.

In the case of the bond probe, governments must consent in the first place to be a plaintiff. Still, a trial lawyer might be able to file a class-action suit on behalf of all cities that choose to participate, Isaacson said.

Also, a state attorney general may be able to sue on behalf of all public borrowers in the state, Hovenkamp said.

Interest Payments

In the almost 200-year-old municipal bond market, states and localities have more than $2 trillion of outstanding debt on bonds sold to pay for projects such as roads and schools.

States and cities buy guaranteed investment contracts from such companies as New York-based AIG and Charlotte, North Carolina-based Bank of America Corp. The cities use the contracts to invest proceeds from bond sales until the money is needed to pay for projects.

Local governments aren't allowed to profit from the reinvestment of tax-exempt bond proceeds and must rebate any earnings, or arbitrage, to the IRS.

Sometimes, cities face a situation when the prevailing market results in a rate on the investment contract that is below the yield on the bonds.

If, for example, a municipality sells bonds with a yield of 4.5 percent and can invest the proceeds in an investment contract at 4.2 percent, the condition is known as "negative arbitrage." A damage claim could arise if a city can prove that an auction was rigged to lower the rate of the contract, below the market rate of 4.2 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0106889

Yield Burning

Still, cities may be able to bring a price-fixing claim against banks and brokers who sold them a contract that yielded more than the interest on the bond, said Clinton A. Krislov, 57, a Chicago lawyer who has filed overcharge complaints on behalf of Illinois municipalities.

In an earlier probe of the bond market, Banc One Capital Markets Inc. and seven other securities dealers agreed in 2000 to pay $13.5 million to settle federal allegations that firms overcharged municipalities for Treasury securities.

The practice, known as yield burning, occurs when brokerages raise the prices on the Treasury bonds used by municipalities refinancing outstanding debt. Because municipalities are barred from making money on their tax-exempt transactions, underwriters raise the price and "burn down" the yield on the securities.

Samsung Electronics, LCD Makers May Face Record Antitrust Fines (BLOOM)

By Kevin Cho

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Samsung Electronics Co. of South Korea and liquid-crystal display makers in Taiwan and Japan may face the largest antitrust penalty ever after a probe of possible price-fixing in the $69 billion industry.

Fines may exceed $1 billion should authorities in the U.S., Europe, Japan and Korea uncover panel makers colluded, said analysts at Daewoo Securities Co. and Hyundai Securities Co. That would top the $729 million paid by four computer-chip makers following a U.S. probe that ended this year, and the record $752 million fine imposed on vitamin makers in 2001.

LG.Philips LCD Co., the second-largest panel maker after Samsung, said this week it was under investigation, spurring a two-day stock slide that erased about $1.6 billion in market value from the top five producers. Fines from the probe would undermine earnings in an industry where panel prices are forecast to slide more than 25 percent this year.

"This is just more bad news for LCD makers, which are already struggling," said Lee Seung Jun, who manages $760 million at CJ Asset Management Co. in Seoul. "Investors hate this kind of uncertainty, which could last for a long time."

Seoul-based LG.Philips said on Dec. 11 it was being investigated for "possible anticompetitive conduct in the LCD industry." Samsung, Taiwan's AU Optronics Corp. and Chi Mei Optoelectronics Corp., as well as Japan's Sharp Corp. have since said they are being investigated. All of the companies said they are cooperating with authorities.

More than 10 companies are being questioned for price-fixing, said Akinori Yamada, a director of management and planning at Japan's Fair Trade Commission in Tokyo.

Global Investigation

LCDs are the flat-panels that are replacing bulkier glass- tubes in computer monitors and televisions. Industry sales will rise 14 percent to $69 billion this year, according to estimates by researcher DisplaySearch.

The U.S. Justice Department, the European Commission, and regulators in Korea limited their comments this week to saying they are examining the possibility of anticompetitive behavior in the industry. Taiwan, home to three of the world's five largest LCD makers, is monitoring developments and isn't investigating any companies, the island's antitrust regulator said.

"The combined fines could bloat to top 1 trillion won ($1.1 billion) in the worst-case scenario," said Jason Kang, an analyst at Seoul-based Daewoo Securities.

Samsung, the world's largest LCD maker, may face as much as 952 billion won in fines, while LG.Philips may pay as much as 931 billion won, Hyundai Securities analyst Jeff Kim said. Still, it would probably take years before any fines are paid, he said.

Penalty Rules

The penalties can be bigger than what the two analysts expect. Europe may fine as much as 10 percent of a company's annual revenue, including sales of unrelated products. Suwon- based Samsung's sales last year were 80.6 trillion won.

The U.S. Justice Department can fine companies $100 million, double the offender's profits, or twice the victims' losses, whichever is largest. In Japan and South Korea, penalties may be as high as 10 percent of the related product's sales during the period of the offense.

Some analysts and lawyers said they weren't able to provide estimates of the penalties because regulators and the companies haven't disclosed when the alleged violations occurred, the types of LCDs involved, or the identities of the possible offenders.

"Details are scarce because this investigation is just beginning," said Lee Eun Jai, a lawyer familiar with antitrust cases at Seoul-based Lee & Ko.

Reversal of Fortune

Authorities are probably investigating possible price-fixing in 2004 or before, when industry profits were peaking, according to JPMorgan Chase & Co. analyst J.J. Park. Average profit margins at the three largest producers in the first half of 2004 exceeded 30 percent, compared with losses now.

DOJ_NMG_0106890

Prices of TV panels fall about 25 percent to 30 percent annually, according to Hyundai's Kim. Lower prices prove "healthy" competition, Sharp spokeswoman Miyuki Nakayama said.

In 2001, eight drugmakers including Roche Holding AG and BASF AG were fined a record 855 million euros, equivalent to $752 million at the time, after European Union officials found them guilty of colluding on vitamin prices. The fines were subsequently reduced to 790 million euros.

Price-fixing of chips known as dynamic random access memory led to a $300 million fine for top producer Samsung. Korea's Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Germany's Infineon Technologies AG, and Japan's Elpida Memory Inc. had to pay a combined $429 million.

The probe into the LCD industry follows a global investigation into airlines that began in February. U.S., European and Asian authorities are questioning companies including British Airways Plc, Japan Airlines Corp. and Singapore Airlines Ltd. for possible price-fixing of fuel surcharges.

"This is an important case because of the global nature of the investigation and the size of the industry," said Lee & Ko's Lee. "It's likely we're going to see more of these global investigations."

Japan Returns To Global Stage As An Acquirer (WSJ)

By Andrew Morse, Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Japan is back as a global buyer.

The country's biggest tobacco company is close to agreeing on the nation's largest-ever foreign acquisition, with an offer valued at $14.8 billion. The proposed transaction caps a series of deals that reflects a new assertiveness by Japanese companies as the world's second-largest economy continues to rebound from more than a decadelong slump.

Japan Tobacco Inc. has offered to acquire cigarette maker Gallaher Group PLC of Britain for nearly £7.5 billion, according to people familiar with the situation. They said an agreement could be announced as early as today.

Japan Tobacco confirmed it was in talks with Gallaher, whose brands include Benson & Hedges and Silk Cut, and said it would release details when they were finalized. Gallaher said in a statement yesterday that it was in discussions about a possible cash offer of £1.140 a share.

The proposed deal marks one of the highest-profile foreign forays by corporate Japan since it stirred worries in the U.S. in the 1980s and early 1990s with a wave of investments that resulted in the takeover of such American icons as the Pebble Beach golf course in California, New York's Rockefeller Center and Hollywood's Columbia Pictures.

After a long retreat from the global mergers-and-acquisitions scene in the 1990s and early 2000s, Japanese companies are once again on the prowl. With the population of Japan expected to shrink rapidly in coming years, many Japanese firms are looking to tap into growing overseas markets quickly by acquiring existing companies. So far this year, Japanese firms have bought 294 foreign companies for a total of $18.1 billion, more than in all of 2005 and double the figure in 2004, according to Thomson Financial.

"The attitude [of Japanese management] has changed," said Robert Snell, the head of corporate banking at Citigroup Inc.'s Tokyo branch.

Sectors that could see more Japanese acquisitions include the car-parts industry, as suppliers to the big Japanese auto makers look for ways to get closer to their main customers' overseas factories. Already Japanese firms such as engine-parts maker Asahi Tec Corp. and bearings maker NTN Corp. have bought companies in the U.S. and Europe. Last week, Japanese tire giant Bridgestone Corp. said it would pay $1.05 billion for Bandag Inc., an Iowa company that makes equipment for retreading tires, a new area for Bridgestone.

Japan's big banks and financial conglomerates are scouting rapidly growing markets in the U.S., China and elsewhere for growth opportunities. Brokerage-firm giant Nomura Holdings Inc. recently spent $1.2 billion to acquire electronic stockbroker Instinet Inc. The deal gave Nomura access to both new markets and new trading technologies.

"There is a pronounced increase in the interest Japanese companies have in looking for overseas acquisitions, particularly in the U.S.," said James Neissa, chairman of global mergers and acquisitions at UBS AG.

The new round of Japanese deal making is markedly different from the one that peaked in 1990, when Japanese acquirers purchased 429 foreign companies for a combined $25.3 billion. During their buying spree they spent top dollar for trophy properties. In many cases, including the Pebble Beach and Rockefeller Center deals, they bought at the height of the market and ended up selling their acquisitions at a loss.

These days, more Japanese companies are thinking strategically about how an acquisition will fit into their operations. Japan Tobacco wants Gallaher because of its strong presence in Russia and Eastern Europe, growing markets that Japan Tobacco wants to crack.

DOJ_NMG_0106891

Earlier this year, a consortium led by Toshiba Corp. outbid other interested companies to buy power-plant manufacturer Westinghouse Electric Co. for $5.4 billion because it views nuclear power as a driver of growth in the future.

Japan's new acquisitiveness comes in a banner year for mergers and acquisitions. M&A value globally has topped $3 trillion, according to research firm Dealogic, the second-highest on record, after the dot-com-fueled deal-making frenzy in 2000. Foreign buyers have flocked to Europe, where many industries haven't consolidated to the extent they have in the U.S., and to Britain in particular. Companies from India, Brazil and Spain have all announced deals for British firms that top Japan Tobacco's proposed $14.8 billion acquisition of Gallaher.

In contrast to the 1980s, Japan is finding itself more welcome in foreign markets today. That's partly because it has opened its own markets more widely to imports since then, helping to eliminate a major source of friction with its trading partners. Though it runs a trade surplus with the U.S., which reached $8.3 billion in October, Japan has been replaced by China as the global economic boogeyman. China's trade surplus with the U.S. in October was $24.4 billion.

Japanese companies also are more globally attuned than before, aware that their futures depend on being able to grow overseas. As a result, they are careful not to disturb political sensibilities abroad.

One big change in the way Japanese companies approach deals: They are now more willing to embrace sophisticated financial techniques. That contrasts with their more risk-averse management style in the past, marked by an insistence on paying cash. The shift allows companies to raise more money and embark on bigger deals.

Indeed, some Japanese companies are using lots of debt to make acquisitions. Earlier this year, Nippon Sheet Glass Co. bought Pilkington PLC, a British rival that was twice its size, in a $3.8 billion deal. Nippon Sheet Glass used loans and some of its own equity to pay for the deal, in a structure similar to ones employed by private-equity firms. It managed to do so without crimping its own credit rating by piling the debt onto Pilkington, rather than Nippon Sheet Glass itself. Several other buyers of British businesses have since copied the move.

Others are using complex financial instruments to project more financial strength. Japanese Internet-and-telecommunications conglomerate Softbank Corp. bought the Japanese mobile-phone operations of Vodafone Group PLC this year in a deal valued at $15.6 billion. Softbank arranged the final financing for the deal by pledging the cash flow from the Vodafone operations as collateral for the loans it took out.

That structure, known as a whole-business securitization, walls the mobile-phone unit off from the rest of Softbank until the debt is paid off. Softbank's whole-business securitization deal was the biggest of its kind in the world.

Some Japanese companies have even risked their reputations by launching hostile takeover bids in Japan. The attempts failed, but they were viewed as a potential harbinger of more aggressive deal making both at home and abroad. In a widely watched takeover battle this summer, Oji Paper Co. launched an unsolicited $1.4 billion bid for rival Hokuetsu Paper Mills Ltd., in the first hostile takeover battle between two Japanese blue-chip companies.

"There are an increasing number of managers who understand that they have to be more aggressive if they want to ensure growth," said Yasu Hatakeyama, who heads the Tokyo office of Lazard Ltd.

Japan Tobacco, beset by slowing cigarette sales in its home market, where the population is aging and smoking is increasingly falling out of favor among younger generations, has been looking to expand in faster-growing markets. Three years ago, it made an unsuccessfully $1.15 billion bid for Tekel, a state-owned tobacco company in Turkey.

Speculation it would adopt a more aggressive overseas acquisition strategy has mounted since Hiroshi Kimura was named president and chief executive in April. That's because Mr. Kimura oversaw Japan Tobacco's 1999 purchase of the international operations of RJR Nabisco Holdings Co., and served as their head.

Analysts said the company will probably have to pay for more than half of the proposed Gallaher transaction with debt. It had $7.8 billion in cash on its books as of March 31, according to its annual report.

Japan Tobacco's proposed deal for Gallaher would far exceed the largest Japanese acquisition of a foreign company to date. That record is held by mobile-phone operator NTT DoCoMo Inc.'s $9.8 billion purchase of a stake in AT&T Wireless Group in 2001. DoCoMo subsequently sold its stake to Cingular Wireless in 2004. Japan Tobacco is in second place with its 1999 RJR Nabisco deal, valued at $7.8 billion.

Merrill Lynch & Co. is advising Japan Tobacco, while Dresdner Kleinwort is advising Gallaher.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Casino Plan For Catskills Moves Closer To Reality With Interior Department's Approval (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106892

After more than 10 years of delays, tribal recriminations and opposition from Atlantic City gambling interests, the effort to build a Las Vegas-style casino in the Catskills took a major step forward yesterday.

The Interior Department approved an environmental review of the St. Regis Mohawk Indian tribe's $600 million project. Proponents say the casino will bring thousands of jobs and tens of millions of dollars in revenue to a once thriving resort area known as the Borscht Belt.

James E. Cason, the associate deputy secretary for Indian affairs at the Interior Department, said yesterday that he was notifying the Mohawks, whose reservation straddles the Canadian border, that the agency determined that the proposed casino on 30 acres next to the racetrack outside Monticello in Sullivan County would not have a significant environmental impact.

The longtime harness racing track, owned by Empire Resorts, which would build the new casino, is currently the site of Monticello Gaming and Raceway. It now features more than 1,500 electronic gambling machines, including video poker, where patrons can wager from pennies to $10. A similar setup with the electronic machines is in place just north of New York City at Yonkers Raceway, which is about 85 miles southeast of Monticello.

"It's a step in what's been a long process for Monticello," Mr. Cason said of the casino, which would include table games like blackjack, roulette, craps and the more traditional slot machines as well as the current electronic ones.

Mr. Cason, who said "there is not an environmental impediment" to the new casino in Monticello, added that he was sending a notice to Gov. George E. Pataki, who has long supported Indian casinos in the Catskills, asking him to concur.

As recently as May 25, Mr. Pataki urged the Interior Department to expedite its review of the Mohawk casino, which he "strongly supports." A spokesman for the governor said yesterday that Mr. Pataki, who leaves office in two weeks, had not yet received the notification.

The federal determination formally revives a project that first received approval in April 2000, when the Interior Department ruled that a casino at the racetrack would be a boon to both the tribe and the surrounding communities.

"This is great news for the Mohawk people, as well as the people of Sullivan County who have been waiting for this project to become a reality for well over 10 years now," Chief Lorraine M. White of the Mohawks said yesterday.

The next step in that reality is for the Mohawks and New York State to amend a gambling compact and revenue-sharing agreement before construction can begin. The tribe may also have to fend off a lawsuit by environmentalists.

While Mr. Pataki, a Republican, is expected to send a concurrence letter before he leaves office, the compact negotiations would presumably fall to the incoming governor, Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, who has generally said he supports tribal casinos in the Catskills.

Chief White said the tribe had already agreed to provide the state with up to 25 percent of the slot machine revenues and to collect sales taxes for the state. The Mohawks also agreed to provide Sullivan County and Monticello with $20 million a year.

The political climate nationally has turned against what are known as off-reservation casinos, with Senator John McCain, a Republican from Arizona, leading an effort to curtail or even eliminate them. If the Monticello casino is built, it will be the fourth such casino established since the National Indian Gaming Regulatory Act was passed in 1988.

The Mohawk casino "may actually be the last off-reservation casino," said Prof. I. Nelson Rose of Whittier Law School in California, an expert on Indian gambling.

There are currently four tribal casinos on reservations in New York. But for casino operators and the tribes, the prize has always been the Catskills, which is closer to New York City than either Atlantic City gambling or the two Indian casinos in Connecticut.

Empire Resorts says the casino in Monticello would attract 6.1 million visitors annually. Analysts estimate that it could take a 15 percent bite out of Atlantic City gambling revenues. "It's exciting to get going," said David P. Hanlon, the chairman of Empire.

Under federal law, Empire can transfer 30 acres to the tribe for a casino project. Empire would build and operate the casino under a contract with the Mohawks.

News of the latest move by the Interior Department was greeted with delight and relief by tribal chiefs on the Akwesasne Reservation and, 400 miles south, by officials in Sullivan County.

"This is great news," said Anthony P. Cellini, supervisor of the Town of Thompson, which includes the village of Monticello. "It's about time. This will have a major economic impact on the county. I think you'll see an economic development explosion."

There has been a burst of second-home construction in Sullivan County. But many of the hotels and bungalow colonies that were in the county in the 1940s and '50s are gone. And along Broadway, the once bustling main road in Monticello, there are mostly vacant parking spaces and empty storefronts.

Not everyone is thrilled. The Natural Resources Defense Council has said that the federal government failed to adequately assess the casino's environmental impacts. Rosa Lee, treasurer of Casino-Free Sullivan County, said that a casino would generate road-clogging traffic, pollution and crime, ruining the bucolic environment that now exists.

"The paybacks the casinos are offering don't begin to touch the impacts from the casino," she said.

But elected officials like Senator Charles E. Schumer, Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, State Senator John J. Bonacic and Sullivan County legislators support the Mohawk plan.

If the project goes forward, it will be a victory for Empire Resorts and Robert Berman, a local resident who in 1994 conceived the idea. Mr. Berman suffered innumerable setbacks over the years, including a falling-out with the Mohawks in 2000, but always kept at it.

"After 12 long years, the federal approvals have been secured by Governor Pataki," Mr. Berman said. "Now it's at the state's sole discretion whether thousands of jobs can be created and the Catskills can be revitalized."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pipe Bombs Lead To Arrest (PITTTRIB)

By Jason Cato

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, December 15, 2006

Federal agents arrested a California University of Pennsylvania student Thursday after tests showed he was storing numerous pipe bombs in his dorm room and his parents' Upper St. Clair home.

Agents charged Michael Blattner, 18, with unlawful possession and manufacture of destructive devices.

He was taken into custody at his parents' Harrogate Road home by agents with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Francis X. Caiazza set bond at $10,000 and ordered that Blattner undergo medical or psychiatric treatment. Blattner is being held in a Pittsburgh halfway house for observation, said Tom Stankiewicz, assistant special agent in charge of the Philadelphia ATF office.

ATF agents and members of the Allegheny County Bomb Squad raided Blattner's dorm room and his parents' house Dec. 5. They collected numerous pipe bombs, materials and tools.

"Pipe bombs have been used to kill and maim people and to damage property and are inherently dangerous to people and property," ATF agent Matthew Regentin said in court papers.

Agents recovered at least 22 pipe bombs from the two locations, court documents state. The explosive devices were wrapped in black electrical tape and ranged from 2 to 4 inches in length.

Also seized were journals containing detailed plans for making improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. One drawing was titled "medium pipebomb" and another "Planted IED," court documents show. Agents also found fragments from at least one exploded device, tools such as drills, ammunition used to create the explosive charge and shrapnel.

Blattner told authorities he was experimenting with making "fireworks," according to the criminal complaint filed against him yesterday.

Authorities were tipped off by employees at the Home Depot in Collier, who became suspicious when Blattner bought a length of pipe and end caps on Dec. 2.

Purchase records from Dick's Sporting Goods show Blattner opened a charge account in January shortly after turning 18, the legal age in Pennsylvania for buying ammunition. Agents discovered that Blattner bought more than $170 worth of shotgun shells, other ammunition, carbon dioxide cartridges and .50-caliber pellets at the sporting goods retailer between Sept. 15 and Dec. 1.

When Eric Rudolph detonated a pipe bomb in Atlanta's Centennial Olympic Park during the 1996 Summer Olympics, two people were killed and more than 100 were injured.

In 1999, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold used pipe bombs during their massacre at Columbine High School in Colorado.

In August, police in Salem, Ore., found four pipe bombs scattered around the city. Three were attached to cars, and another was found on a roadside. No one was injured, and police arrested Lonnie Troy Glinski in the case.

The devices found in Blattner's possession were tested in the ATF National Laboratory in Rockville, Md.

"There was some explosive material in the pipes," Stankiewicz said.

Stankiewicz refused to comment on the motive for creating the pipe bombs or whether more arrests are expected. He said the investigation is ongoing.

Blattner will appear in court next on Wednesday.

FBI Hails Phila. Labor Leader's Crime-prevention Work (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106894

The FBI honored a local labor leader yesterday for her crime-prevention efforts in Philadelphia.

Janet Hammond Ryder is vice president of labor participation for the United Way of Southeastern Pennsylvania, director for labor participation for the Philadelphia Council AFL-CIO, and cohost of the weekly Labor to Neighbor show on WURD-AM (900). Ryder received the FBI Director's Community Leadership Award for her efforts to combat poverty, violence, drugs, gangs, and crime by reinforcing the value of education for inner-city youths.

Briefly... CITY/REGION (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 15, 2006

Police see breakthrough

in 'Screwdriver Bandit' case

Investigators believe they've made a break in the case of the notorious "Screwdriver Bandit."

Cops said yesterday they have a man in custody who likely is the culprit who robbed nine college-aged women at screwdriver-point in several parts of the city between Nov. 9 and Nov. 17.

The suspect was arrested in an unrelated incident late last month.

One investigator said police are reviewing their evidence and still talking with victims and witnesses. A formal announcement on the case was expected later today.

N.J. woman carjacked,

robbed; suspect sought

A man armed with a knife forced his way into the car of a 20-year-old woman in the Echelon Mall parking lot in Voorhees, N.J., Monday night and drove her to an ATM machine in Gibbs- boro, police said.

The man forced the woman her to withdraw several hundred dollars in cash and then drove to an apartment in Lindenwold, police said, where he bought narcotics.

He then drove to a Ramada Inn in Hammonton and was preparing to check them into a room when she broke away from him and ran, police said.

He caught up with her in the parking lot, but she struggled with him and he fled.

Police identified the assailant as Stephen M. Rule, 29.

He is charged with carjacking, kidnapping, robbery, possession of a knife for an unlawful purpose and possession of a controlled dangerous substance.

He is being sought.

Janet H. Ryder receives

FBI community award

The FBI's 2006 Community Leadership Award has been presented to Janet Hammond Ryder, vice president of labor participation for the United Way of Southeastern Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Council.

The award is presented to individuals who have made an outstanding contribution toward crime prevention and community awareness.

Ryder also is co-host of a weekly radio show, "Labor to Neighbor," on WURD (900-AM).

A Travesty Of Injustice (BOS)

By Brian Mcgrory, Globe Columnist

The Boston Globe, December 15, 2006

Spend a couple of days -- or, for that matter, a couple of minutes -- in the Moakley federal courthouse listening to testimony in the lawsuit brought by four wrongfully convicted men against the FBI, and a few simple questions come to mind.

Why is the federal government fighting this? Why haven't Joe Salvati and Peter Limone already been paid for the 30 years they spent in jail? Why are 40-year-old documents being kept secret? Why isn't there a single person in the Justice Department with a shred of common sense?

Don't get me wrong. For pure legal drama, it doesn't get much better than what's happening in Courtroom 3 these days.

First off, there's the parade of swaggering legal eagles like F. Lee Bailey and Jack I . Zalkind taking the witness stand to decimate the FBI. Zalkind, for example, quipped after a long day of testimony, "At $450 an hour, I'd like to get out of here."

There was the cameo appearance of former governor Michael S . Dukakis on Wednesday afternoon. He strode from the witness stand out into the hallway, where he declared the actions of the FBI "disgraceful."

Then there's the unfailingly brainy and always brassy judge, Nancy Gertner, who began Tuesday morning's court session by threatening to haul the director of the FBI in front of her.

The plaintiffs' table is lined with so many lawyers -- nine, most days -- that it looks like a reenactment of da Vinci's "The Last Supper." The government attorneys act as if they haven't slept in a month. Even Gertner appeared to take pity one morning, telling them, "You've been asked to litigate this case with one hand tied behind your back."

But there shouldn't be the need for pity. There shouldn't be any reason for Limone and Salvati to give up more of their lives to dutifully sit in the front row and relive the loss of their freedom.

Because there shouldn't be a trial at all.

In fact, it should be the opposite. FBI Director Robert Mueller ought to fly to Boston, all right, but rather than offer absurd excuses to Gertner, he needs to extend apologies and big payouts to the men who were framed by his agency so many decades ago and the families that have survived them.

Let's not draw too fine a point on this: The Boston office of the FBI was for too many years its own crime family. It sanctioned murders. It turned a blind eye toward drug-running. It wrought havoc on the everyday lives of everyday people, all, supposedly, in the name of ridding the town of the Mafia. And in this case, it intentionally hid evidence that would have exonerated four men who were wrongly convicted in the 1965 murder of a petty thief.

Two of the men, including a World War II hero, died in prison. Two others, Salvati and Limone, were released a few years ago. Salvati has since lived a simple life filled with family and odd jobs and friends who have survived his ordeal.

To this day, the federal government has never offered a settlement. When the two sides met with Gertner earlier this year, the government lawyers said there would be no offer forthcoming.

Salvati and Limone are both in their 70s, and you get the sense the government would rather see them die than compensate them for their loss of freedom.

Contrast that to the government's handling of a case in Oregon, where a lawyer was wrongly implicated by the FBI in the 2004 Madrid terrorist bombings and jailed for two weeks. The Justice Department wrote him a $2 million check last month, accompanied by an apology.

If two weeks in jail are worth $2 million, then by my calculation, Salvati alone would be owed $1.6 billion. Makes you think the geniuses down in Washington should have rethought that stand about not settling.

What the FBI and the rest of the Justice Department are doing in this trial isn't just an embarrassment, but a disgrace -- and it will undoubtedly prove to be an expensive one at that.

2 Plead Guilty In Ski Resort Fire (NSDY/AP)

By Jeff Barnard, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 15, 2006

EUGENE, Ore. -- Two people who have admitted helping in the $12 million arson of a Vail, Colo., ski resort as part of an ecoterrorism campaign formally pleaded guilty Thursday to federal arson charges.

Chelsea Dawn Gerlach and Stanislas Gregory Meyerhoff, both 29, had already pleaded guilty to some of the $20 million worth of arsons committed between 1996 and 2001 by a Eugene-based cell of the Earth Liberation Front known as the Family. Under plea deals with federal prosecutors, they agreed to have charges from the 1998 Vail arson transferred from Colorado to Oregon to be settled along with their other cases.

Prosecutors have recommended a 10-year prison sentence for Gerlach, who is to be sentenced April 18, and 15 years and eight months for Meyerhoff, who has a sentencing hearing scheduled for April 10.

The Vail arson focused national attention on radical environmentalists who ascribed their attacks to the secretive Earth Liberation Front and Animal Liberation Front, characterized by the FBI as the nation's top domestic terrorism threats. The investigation went nowhere for years until a task force found an informant who got old friends to talk about the crimes in recorded conversations.

Two others indicted in the Vail arson, Josephine Sunshine Overaker and Rebecca J. Rubin, remain at large.

The Vail arson was one of 20 fires in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado blamed by federal investigators on the Family. Twelve people -- 10 in Oregon and two in Washington -- have pleaded guilty in the cases, and others remain at large. The alleged leader of the group, William C. Rodgers, committed suicide in an Arizona jail in December 2005.

The lodge destroyed in Vail, about 100 miles west of Denver, has been rebuilt.

Shiite? Sunni? Some In US Learn Who's Who. (CSM)

By G. Jeffrey Macdonald

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106896

Some in Congress may need a primer on Islamic extremists. Five years after 9/11, three members of the House Intelligence Committee in recent interviews couldn't answer basic questions about who's Sunni and who's Shiite in the Muslim world. But other American institutions are already boning up - especially when they have a stake in doing so. For example:

· Law-enforcement agencies, from the FBI to the New York Police Department are learning Muslim customs in attempts to do their jobs more effectively.

· Major hospitals, including one in Tampa, Fla., are training staff to honor Muslim beliefs about the body.

· Business groups are studying Islamic law in order to raise capital among Muslims, who aren't allowed to charge interest.

In general, Americans don't know much about Muslims, surveys show. The Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life found that the share of those saying they knew "not very much" or "nothing at all" about Islam actually grew from 61 percent in 2001 to 66 percent in 2005. In another 2005 Pew finding, 62 percent failed to identify Allah and the Koran as the terms Muslims use for God and sacred scripture.

Certain key sectors of US society also display a dangerous ignorance, Muslim advocates say. Topping the list this month is Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D) of Texas, the incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. In an interview with Congressional Quarterly last week, he could identify the historic Sunni-Shiite split but didn't know that Al Qaeda is Sunni or that Hizbullah, which fought Israel this summer in Lebanon, is Shiite.

GOP Reps. Jo Ann Davis and Terry Everett, also on the intelligence committee, fared worse when the Congressional Quarterly interviewed them last summer.

But even on Capitol Hill, there are pockets of hope, Muslim advocates say. Congressmen tend to know more about Islamic culture when their own futures depend on working well with Muslims.

"In areas where there are large Muslim populations, you tend to see that members of Congress are more in tune with the thinking of the Muslim community," says Corey Saylor, national legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a Muslim advocacy group in Washington. Among those with few Muslim constituents, he says, knowledge of Islamic culture is "better than it was five years ago, but we still have a long way to go."

That same trend shows up in other sectors of society. Where the stakes are high, Americans are doing their homework. FBI beefs up Muslim culture training

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, for instance, will emphasize Muslim culture when it expands introductory training for new agents from 18 to 21 weeks next month. In upcoming sessions, trainees will "drill down deeper" than they have in the past, for instance, into differences between radical Shiite cultures and radical Sunni ones, says Keith Slotter, assistant director of the FBI's training division. For the first time, new agent training will also cover dynamics surrounding suicide bombing.

"When a person from another culture says something, the meaning behind the words may not be the literal translation that an agent might want to jump to," Mr. Slotter says. "There are so many different nuances and aspects [that] to be an effective interviewer ... you're going to need those cultural skills."

Urban police are taking similar steps. About 100 members of the New York Police Department's hostage negotiating team, for instance, earlier this year spent a day learning to foster cooperation by honoring Muslim customs. For example, when entering a home, leave dogs outside and don't step on prayer rugs. In San Jose, Police Chief Rob Davis is a Mormon, but he has in the past fasted each day during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan in order to foster understanding and closer ties with Muslims in his city.

Sometimes, the passion for knowledge has proved fleeting. When the Houston Police Department first offered a monthly continuing education course on Muslim culture at a local mosque in 2003, every class was near capacity with about 30 officers in attendance. But the department discontinued the course last year because not enough officers were signing up. The sharp decline in numbers coincided with a department policy shift.

"We used to have classes on city time, but now that you have to go on your own time, the majority of officers don't want to take this class," says Muzaffar Siddiqi, the department's liaison to Muslims. They're taking other courses online because "they can just sit at home and do it."

Some business people are also trying to learn more. Earlier this year, managers at East Cameron Partners, an energy development firm in Houston, studied Islamic finance in order to raise funds in the Middle East for oil and gas exploration. The result was the first-ever US issue of sukuk, an Islamic bond that generates revenue from sales, profits, or leases rather than interest. In September, International Swaps and Derivatives Association in New York began studying Islamic law requirements in order to craft international standards for more cross-cultural deals. Focus on healthcare concerns

In healthcare, Tampa General Hospital has emphasized Muslim culture in its two-year-old diversity training program, which counts as continuing education for many of the hospital's 5,000 staffers. In March, Muslims will make their fourth presentation - more than any other group - to an expected crowd of about 150.

DOJ_NMG_0106897

The education has had immediate on-the-job value for medical staff, according to the Rev. William Baugh, director of pastoral care at Tampa General. They now try to have women physicians visit Muslim female patients "because of the tremendous modesty," he says. And when a patient dies, nurses now accommodate family members who insist on taking the body to wash it.

Guards In Prison Sex Scandal Sentenced (WP/AP)

By David Royse, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- A former federal prison guard who admitted smuggling contraband to inmates for money and sex in a scandal that ended with a deadly shootout was sentenced to a year in prison Thursday.

The judge said he lightened Alfred Barnes' punishment in part because he cooperated with prosecutors in the case, which ensnared six guards at a women's prison.

One of them, Ralph Hill, was killed in a June 21 gunfight he started at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution when federal agents came to arrest them. One of the agents also was killed and a prison officer was wounded.

A second former guard sentenced Thursday, Vincent Johnson, shielded a federal agent who came under fire in the shootout, U.S. District Judge Robert Hinkle said.

Johnson, who was sentenced to a year of probation, was not accused of participating in the sex-for-contraband scheme but admitted coercing inmates to keep quiet about it.

Barnes, 43, of Thomasville, Ga., and Johnson, 40, of Tallahassee, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail fraud in September; the government dropped other charges.

Former guards Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore were convicted and are to be sentenced in January. E. Lavon Spence pleaded guilty but has had his sentencing delayed after suffering a stroke.

None of the surviving guards has been implicated in the shootout.

Murderer Of Witness Gets Life In Prison (PHI)

By Julie Shaw

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 15, 2006

Felix Summers - the reputed South Philadelphia drug dealer authorities say was at the center of a web of witness-retaliation and drug killings in his neighborhood - was sentenced yesterday to life in prison without parole.

Summers, 25, was convicted last month in the March 1999 shooting death of Charlotte Presley, 39, a witness against him in another homicide.

Just two months shy of his 18th birthday at the time of the crime, Summers was not eligible for the death penalty. In a ruling last year, the U.S. Supreme Court banned the execution of juvenile killers.

Yesterday, in a fairly empty courtroom, Common Pleas Court Judge Carolyn Engel Temin handed Summers the automatic life sentence on first-degree murder, topped by 30 to 60 months for witness retaliation.

Summers, a bearded, heavyset man, declined to make any statement.

An aunt, Phyllis Summers, 43, showed up shortly after the brief sentencing ended and said outside the courtroom as she wiped away tears: "I just want to say that he's not the monster people think he is."

Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega said that the judge's additional sentence on the witness-retaliation charge "highlights the fact that this is not just a murder. It's a pretty horrible murder in that he killed a witness."

Earlier this week, Vega described Summers as the center of a "spider web" of people who were his associates or who were potential witnesses against him. Summers lived on the 500 block of Hoffman Street, near the scene of various killings on or near South Fifth.

The first two juries in the Presley murder case had deadlocked, resulting in mistrials.

Vega argued at last month's trial that Summers killed Presley because she was a witness against him in the Jan. 12, 1999, drive-by shooting death of John Niles, 19, at Fifth and Mifflin. Authorities have said the shooting was drug-related.

Presley had told police she saw Summers pull the trigger.

About 4 a.m. March 29, 1999, Summers, who enlisted the help of neighbor Diana Meirino, went to Presley's third-floor apartment on South Fifth, near Mifflin. When Presley came to the door, Summers shot her twice in the face. She died at the scene.

Summers' then-girlfriend, Sherrie Hewett, testified at last month's trial. Hewett, who is in the district attorney's witness relocation program, was in a minivan outside the apartment when the shooting occurred. She testified that Summers wanted to ask Presley why she was telling police that he shot someone.

DOJ_NMG_0106898

Jack McMahon, Summers' defense attorney, argued that this was a case of mistaken identity and that Hewett was a scorned girlfriend.

At the Niles murder trial in 2000, Summers was acquitted. By then, Presley was dead, and another witness failed to show.

Summers was also charged in the Aug. 16, 2001, shooting death of Veronica Rios, 15, a bystander who was at Fifth and Pierce Streets with others when three men in a car came by. Two gunmen jumped out of the car and opened fire, killing Rios and injuring five people, including Joseph Mulhern, 18. Police have said the gunmen believed Mulhern, the intended target, was cooperating in a drug investigation.

A month later, Meirino, 22, was shot to death outside her South Fifth Street home. Police arrested Summers' cousin, Alvin Lawrence. Charges were later dropped after a key witness died of a drug overdose. Summers was not charged in that case.

Vega, however, while not implicating Summers, said this week that "he was the only person in all of Philadelphia who was to gain" from Meirino's death. Meirino was expected to testify against Summers in the killings of Presley and of Rios, which she had also witnessed.

The FBI added Summers to its 10 Most Wanted list after Rios' slaying.

At Summers and his codefendants' 2002 preliminary hearing in Rios' murder, Mulhern reluctantly testified. By the time the case went to trial two years later, Mulhern was dead. Summers and his two codefendants were acquitted.

Mulhern was killed after being shot multiple times in the chest on the 500 block of Sigel Street, near his home, at 11:23 p.m. Nov. 16, 2003, said Officer Beth Skala, a police spokeswoman. Two neighborhood men, Julio Esteves and Paul Luvice, were arrested, but were acquitted in an October trial.

Brian McMonagle, Esteves' defense lawyer, said he did not believe Mulhern's death was related to the 2001 shooting. He said his client and Luvice were acquitted because witnesses in the case were not credible.

Officials Say Man Arrested After Mixing Pills On Flight (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 15, 2006

Passenger held on a charge of interfering with a flight attendant

A 66-year-old man who was arrested after a disturbance aboard a Continental Airlines flight to Houston had mixed his medication during the trip, federal authorities said Thursday.

Noboru Akao, a Japanese citizen and U.S. permanent resident alien, also put his hand up a flight attendant's skirt and "made a mess" in a restroom after mixing his pills, U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy said as she read from a criminal complaint in a hearing.

Federal prosecutor Michael Schultz declined to specify the medications in open court. Continental spokesman David Messing said he did not know whether Akao was served alcohol during the seven-hour flight from Honolulu.

Houston police arrested Akao on Wednesday morning and handed him over to the FBI after the flight arrived at George Bush Intercontinental Airport. He was charged with interfering with a flight attendant.

According to the complaint, Akao became "disruptive" and "combative" during the last 2 1/2 hours of the flight. He finally was restrained in plastic handcuffs and placed in a jump seat, away from other passengers.

Akao, who moved to the United States in 1986, communicated in court through his interpreter and frequently bowed toward the judge to indicate that he understood the proceedings.

If convicted, Akao faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. A hearing to review evidence and consider bail is scheduled for Monday.

Body In Mexican Park Had U.S.agents' Business Cards (HC/AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 15, 2006

EL PASO — Business cards of two U.S. law enforcement officials were found taped to the head of a man whose bloody body was dumped in a Mexican park last month, federal officials said today.

Mexican authorities said the unidentified victim's body was left in a popular park in Ciudad Juarez, across the Rio Grande, the afternoon of Nov. 23. He was found with a finger stuffed in his mouth, a traditional punishment dealt out by drug traffickers to informers.

Photographs of the victim published in today's edition of the Spanish-language newsapaper El Diario de El Paso, show one of the business cards is from Raul M. Bencomo, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent. Bencomo oversaw a controversial drug informant who led authorities to the bodies of about a dozen men buried in the yard of a Juarez house in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0106899

The second card, which is barely legible in the photos, is believed to be from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Officials with ICE and DEA said today that the agencies were notified about the discovery but do not have any role in investigating the killing.

"This matter is under investigation by Mexican authorities," ICE spokesman Carl Rusnok said in a written statement. "It would be inappropriate for ICE to comment out of respect for the integrity of the Mexican investigation. We have a strong relationship with our law enforcement counterparts and will assist if requested."

Chihuahua Attorney General Patricia Gonzalez told reporters today that her office sent photographs of the body to U.S. authorities in El Paso and requested their help in identifying him. It was unclear who sent the photos to the newspaper.

It also was unclear today what, if any, connection the killing has to Bencomo. His bloodied U.S. Department of Treasury-embossed card appears to be several years old. Treasury officials have not overseen immigration agents since ICE was formed under the Department of Homeland Security in 2003.

Bencomo's informant, Guillermo Ramirez Peyro, who also goes by "Lalo," has been accused of working for the Juarez drug cartel run by Vicente Carrillo Fuentes while he was being paid by U.S. authorities.

An El Paso lawyer for Bencomo, who is being sued by relatives of at least one of the victims found at the Juarez house, was not immediately available today.

Ramirez, who is being held on immigration charges, is in U.S. custody at an undisclosed location. A spokeswoman for the Executive Office of Immigration Review, which oversees immigration cases, said she could not discuss details of the case.

Jodi Goodwin, Ramirez's Harlingen lawyer, said Ramirez is fighting deportation and fears that he will be killed if he returns to Mexico.

Goodwin said today she did not know if the Nov. 23 killing had any connection to her client.

"I don't have any information to be able to make any kind of connection," Goodwin said.

Associated Press Writer Olga Rodriguez contributed to this report from Monterrey, Mexico.

Cyclist Indicted In Steroids Probe (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

Filed at 11:11 p.m. ET

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Prosecutors sent a clear message Thursday to Barry Bonds and everyone else linked to the federal steroids investigation: lie to us, and we'll come after you.

Former world silver medalist cyclist Tammy Thomas, 36, was the latest sports figure and first athlete to be indicted for hindering the 3-year-old grand jury probe. She faces three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice.

Thomas was ordered to appear in court Jan. 5. Each count carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

She did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

Kevin Ryan, the U.S. attorney for Northern California, said Thursday's indictment, along with last month's obstruction of justice charges against track coach Trevor Graham, marks a new phase in the BALCO investigation.

"A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury," he said.

The first stage, Ryan said, netted guilty pleas from Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative founder Victor Conte, BALCO vice president James Valente and track coach Remi Korchemny. Also convicted was Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer, who served three months and is back in prison for refusing to testify against Bonds.

Authorities suspect Bonds, like Thomas, lied to the 2003 grand jury when he said he never knowingly used steroids. An investigation of the San Francisco Giants slugger for perjury and possible tax-evasion charges is ongoing.

"On one level, the agents on the BALCO case and the U.S. Attorney's office were unfairly attacked for targeting only certain high-profile people," said Travis Tygart, general counsel for the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. "Now, it appears obvious the only targets in the investigation were those who broke the law, and justice will be served on those who violated it regardless of their fame and notoriety."

The second stage involved the conviction of Patrick Arnold, the Illinois chemist who created the banned substances distributed by BALCO, Ryan said.

Thomas was banned for life in August 2002 after the performance-enhancing drug norbolethone, an obscure and previously undetectable steroid, was found in her urine.

"That was the first proof that there were these designer drugs out there," said Don Catlin, director of the UCLA Olympic doping lab. "It told me that there would be others coming."

DOJ_NMG_0106900

Norbolethone originally was tested by Wyeth Laboratories in human trials during the 1960s as a potential treatment to help severely short people grow and for conditions causing weight loss. The company abandoned development of the steroid in the early 1970s, and it never was marketed.

It languished in obscurity until Arnold dusted off Wyeth's recipe and made new batches to boost athletic performance.

USADA didn't test for the steroid until Catlin determined Thomas had used it. This likely was the prelude to THG, the designer drug created by Arnold at the heart of the BALCO investigation.

Thomas' indictment adds cycling, a sport often associated with doping, to a probe that already has exposed steroid use in professional baseball, football and track and field.

The Yazoo City, Miss. native, was a silver medalist in individual sprint at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships. Thomas always has maintained her innocence and said the results might have been triggered by contraceptives she was using.

The indictment accuses Thomas of lying when she told the grand jury in October 2003 that she never used performance-enhancing drugs. She also is said to have lied when she testified that she did not get illegal drugs from Arnold, who currently is serving a three-month sentence in a West Virginia federal prison.

Thomas was granted immunity from prosecution if she told the truth, according to the indictment.

She was subpoenaed to testify after agents raided the BALCO laboratory and allegedly found evidence linking her to steroid use.

Graham, a coach for track stars Marion Jones, Justin Gatlin and Tim Montgomery, was indicted last month for allegedly lying when he said he did not distribute steroids to his athletes or tell them where they could be obtained. He has pleaded not guilty.

Darryl Seibel, a spokesman for the U.S. Olympic Committee, declined to comment on the specifics of the Thomas indictment.

"We have continually stressed the need to bring more resources to bear in order to eliminate doping from every segment of sport," he said. "This is a national issue, and nothing less than an aggressive, sustained effort with significant leadership from the U.S. government will solve the problem."

AP Sports Writer Eddie Pells contributed to this report

Cyclist Indicted In BALCO Steroid Scandal (SFC)

By Lance Williams And Mark Fainaru-wada, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, December 15, 2006

(12-14) 12:51 PST -- A former world-class cyclist who was caught up in the BALCO steroid scandal was indicted Thursday on charges of lying to a federal grand jury about her use of banned drugs.

Tammy Thomas, who won the silver medal at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships, was charged with perjury and obstruction of justice in connection with her Oct. 30, 2003 testimony before the grand jury that was investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative sports doping case.

In 2002, Thomas was banned from cycling for life after she tested positive for a little-known steroid promoted by an Illinois chemist associated with BALCO.

But the indictment states that the following year, before the BALCO grand jury, Thomas denied under oath that she had ever obtained banned drugs from the chemist, Patrick Arnold, who himself pleaded guilty to steroid conspiracy charges earlier this year.

Thomas also testified that she had never taken steroids and had never obtained steroids from anyone, according to the indictment.

All the statements were lies, according to the indictment, which was handed up by a grand jury in San Francisco.

A perjury conviction carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison.

Thomas is the second sports figure to be accused of lying in the BALCO probe. Last month, track coach Trevor Graham, who has coached Olympic superstars Marion Jones and Justin Gatlin, was accused of making false statements to BALCO investigators when he told them he had never distributed banned drugs to athletes. Graham pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial.

In addition, Giants outfielder Barry Bonds is under investigation for lying to the BALCO grand jury, according to informed sources and to remarks a judge has made in court. Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, has been imprisoned for contempt of court because he refused to testify before a grand jury investigating Bonds.

Thomas, 36, who is thought to live in Michigan, could not be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0106901

Thomas is a muscular woman with a husky voice and facial hair. She once told a reporter that people often mistook her for a man, and her cycling career was marred by doping allegations.

In 2000, she was suspended for a year after testing positive for elevated testosterone levels. She claimed she was innocent, and, acting as her own lawyer, sued Dr. Don Catlin, director of the sports doping laboratory at the University of California-Los Angeles, claiming her urine sample had been mishandled there. The lawsuit was dismissed.

In 2002, Thomas was caught using the steroid norbolethone, a drug that had been developed by Wyeth Laboratories in the 1960s for medical purposes but never marketed. Arnold had learned of the drug from an old pharmacology textbook and distributed it to athletes and to BALCO founder Victor Conte as an undetectable steroid, court records show.

Arnold presumed that authorities would be unable to detect the use of the drug because it was unknown to modern science. But Catlin's laboratory found it in Thomas' blood sample, and she was banned from cycling for life.

On Oct. 30, 2003, the indictment says, Thomas testified that the only product she had ever gotten from Arnold was a legal nutritional supplement. She was asked three times if she had used steroids, and each time she said no, the indictment charges.

Conte, Anderson and two other men pleaded guilty in the BALCO steroids conspiracy case last year.

E-mail the writers at lwilliams@sfchronicle.com and mfainaru-wada@sfchronicle.com.

Former American Cyclist Indicted As Balco Inquiry Takes New Step (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

The federal grand jury investigating steroid use in sports yesterday indicted a former cyclist, Tammy Thomas, for perjury and obstruction of justice, charging that she lied to another grand jury looking into the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroids case.

Thomas received a lifetime competition ban in 2002 from the United States Anti-Doping Agency after she tested positive for the previously undetectable steroid norbolethone.

Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney for the Northern District of California, said in a written statement that the charges were part of a new stage of the case targeting people that federal investigators believe lied to them or to the grand jury during the three-year investigation into Balco.

That category includes Barry Bonds, who is still under investigation for suspicion of perjury during his grand jury testimony; Trevor Graham, the track coach, who was indicted last month for allegedly making false statements to investigators; and others.

Graham, who had sparked the Balco investigation by sending a syringe to investigators, has pleaded not guilty and is free on bond. The syringe contained a previously undetectable steroid known as THG, or the clear.

Michael L. Rains, Bonds's criminal defense lawyer, said yesterday that he did not know what the indictment of Thomas might mean for Bonds. "I don't think it's bad news for Barry at all," Rains said, "but keep in mind Greg Anderson continues to reside over in federal prison in Dublin, and they may be waiting to see if he has a nervous breakdown or something and talks."

Anderson, Bonds's childhood friend and former trainer, has defied court orders to testify to the Balco grand jury about Bonds. Anderson was sent to jail for contempt of court, and will be asked again to testify.

Thomas, a world champion cyclist, testified to a grand jury in 2003 that she had never taken performance-enhancing drugs or received them from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who worked with Balco in Burlingame, Calif.

Thomas's failed drug test that led to her lifetime suspension was her second doping offense.

She did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

Ryan said in his statement that the federal investigation has "generally unfolded in three distinct stages."

"In the early stages of the investigation, the individuals who distributed steroids to some of the nation's top-flight athletes were indicted and convicted," he said. "In the second stage, we developed the evidence to indict and convict the creator of the undetectable steroid THG distributed through Balco.

"A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury. Our investigation into each of these stages will continue as the evidence develops."

Cyclist Cited For Perjury (NYDN)

By Michael O'keeffe, Daily News Sports Writer

New York Daily News, December 15, 2006

A federal prosecutor sent a strong warning to Barry Bonds and other elite athletes yesterday after former cyclist Tammy Thomas was indicted for hindering the BALCO investigation: If we can prove you lied, you will be prosecuted.

Thomas faces three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice for allegedly giving false testimony while under oath to the BALCO grand jury.

DOJ_NMG_0106902

"Perjury undermines the fundamental mission of our investigative and judicial processes - to uncover the truth," U.S. Attorney for Northern California Kevin Ryan said in a statement. "Lying under oath to a grand jury must be vigorously prosecuted or else this essential truth-finding mission is significantly undermined."

The indictment accuses Thomas of lying when she told the grand jury in 2003 that she never used performance-enhancing drugs. It also said she lied when she said she did not receive illegal drugs from Patrick Arnold, the chemist who created the once-undetectable steroid THG. Each charge carries a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Bonds is the focus of an ongoing perjury and tax-evasion investigation, but that probe has apparently stalled because trainer Greg Anderson chose to go to prison rather than testify against the San Francisco slugger. The Thomas indictment, along with obstruction charges brought against track coach Trevor Graham, make it clear that prosecutors won't give up easy.

"The investigation into doping in sports has generally unfolded in three distinct stages....A third stage has begun as we bring charges against individuals who lied to investigators or committed perjury while testifying under oath to a federal grand jury," Ryan said.

The first stage targeted steroid distributors, including Anderson and BALCO founder Victor Conte. The second stage, according to Ryan, focused on Arnold, who created the banned substances distributed by BALCO.

Thomas was banned from competition in August 2002 after norbolethone, a designer drug formulated to evade detection, was found in her urine. Norbolethone was originally tested by Wyeth Laboratories as a potential treatment to help severely short people grow. It languished in obscurity until Arnold dusted off Wyeth's recipe and made new batches to boost athletic performance.

The U.S. Anti-Doping Agency wasn't testing for the steroid until the UCLA Olympic drug testing laboratory determined Thomas had used the once-obscure steroid. The lab also uncovered THG, the designer drug created by Arnold at the heart of the BALCO investigation.

Thomas was a silver medalist in individual sprint at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships, but her attempts to make the 2000 U.S. Olympic team ended because of high testosterone levels. She said the results were triggered by contraceptives and has always maintained her innocence.

The Associated Press contributed to this report

Cyclist Faces Perjury Charge In Balco Probe (MERCN)

By Elliott Almond

The San Jose Mercury News, December 15, 2006

Perhaps Barry Bonds should be more concerned about facing a perjury charge than major league pitching next season.

A turn of events Thursday in the Balco Laboratory case sent a chilling message to athletes connected to the inquiry: Anyone who allegedly lied to a federal grand jury investigating the use of drugs in sports could find themselves in a legal bind.

Former world-class cyclist Tammy Thomas, now a law student in Michigan, became the first athlete indicted in the Balco scandal when she was charged Thursday with three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice. She faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

"A third stage has begun," U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan said in a statement.

Thomas, who was banned for life in 2002 after testing positive for the steroid norbolethone, didn't immediately return calls or e-mails. She has denied using illegal drugs in past interviews with the Mercury News.

The action in the 4 1/2-year-old case is not expected to be the government's last.

"If this is phase three, why not indict Barry?" Bonds' attorney Michael Rains said Thursday. "The simple answer -- they need the testimony of Greg Anderson."

Bonds' trainer, who pleaded guilty to distributing steroids and laundering money, is in prison on a contempt charge because he has refused to testify against the Giants slugger.

Bonds, 42, is being investigated for lying under oath in 2003 when he testified that he believed the substances he took were flaxseed oil and an arthritis balm. Prosecutors believe those substances were "the clear" and "the cream," performance-enhancing drugs distributed by Balco.

Investigators confiscated calendars and ledgers allegedly showing drug schedules and payments for Bonds and other baseball players from Anderson's home.

"Barry maintains he told the grand jury the truth to the extent that he knows the truth," Rains said. "They hit him with documents he had never seen before."

Bonds could also face charges for failing to report tens of thousands of dollars in income from the sale of memorabilia. Rains dismissed the possibility, saying the government's evidence is weak.

DOJ_NMG_0106903

Another possible target for perjury is Marion Jones, an Olympic gold-medal sprinter who also testified in 2003. If she denied using performance-enhancing drugs, Jones might have a problem because her ex-husband, C.J. Hunter, said under oath that he gave the sprinter banned drugs and saw Jones inject herself.

At least two other grand jury witnesses who worked with her former coach, Trevor Graham, have testified in the case. Also, Balco mastermind Victor Conte Jr. has said in interviews with the Mercury News and others that he supplied Jones with performance-enhancing drugs. Jones repeatedly has denied all allegations.

Graham, Jones' coach when she won five medals at the 2000 Olympics, was charged last month for giving false statements to Balco investigators. He has pleaded not guilty.

Former Cyclist Charged With Hindering Steroid Probe (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Bob Bensch

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Tammy Thomas, a cyclist banned from the sport for using performance-enhancing drugs, was charged with hindering a federal investigation into steroid use by athletes. She is the first athlete indicted in the probe.

Thomas, 36, a silver medalist at the 2001 World Track Cycling Championships, was indicted on three counts of perjury and one of obstruction of justice, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco said today in a statement. Prosecutors said she gave false testimony to a grand jury.

Thomas declined to comment when reached by phone at her home in Lansing, Michigan.

Thomas was banned for life from competitive cycling by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency in 2002 after testing positive for the steroid norbolethone. It was the second time she failed a drug test. She tested positive for elevated testosterone at the 2000 U.S. Olympic Trials.

Thomas is accused in the indictment of lying when she told a grand jury in 2003 she never took performance-enhancing drugs. She also said she never received illegal drugs from Patrick Arnold, a chemist who pleaded guilty in April to making and distributing the steroid tetrahydrogestrinone, or THG, and supplying it to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or Balco, the California lab at the center of the investigation, the indictment said.

Indictments

Grand juries in the investigation also indicted Balco's co-founders, two track coach and a trainer for baseball All-Star Barry Bonds. The panel has heard testimony regarding steroid use from Bonds and other athletes, including baseball's Jason Giambi, without returning charges against them.

Thomas was ordered to appear in court Jan. 5. Each perjury count carries a maximum five-year prison sentence and a $250,000 fine. Obstruction is punishable by a 10-year sentence and a $250,000 fine.

Thomas was second in the sprint competition at the 2001 World Championships and was ranked second in the world in the event at the time of her suspension.

The case is U.S. v. Thomas 06-0803, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California (San Francisco).

33 Indicted On Drug Ring Charges Tying City, Suburbs (MJS)

By David Doege

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 15, 2006

Waukesha's main line shut down, officials say

In a case authorities say demonstrates the growing ties between urban and suburban drug traffickers, a federal grand jury indicted 33 people Thursday on charges linking large-scale cocaine suppliers in Milwaukee to a tightly controlled network of dealers in Waukesha.

The indictments and arrests, officials say, dried up the primary source of cocaine in the city of Waukesha while taking a handful of large-scale operators off the streets of Milwaukee.

"This is going to go down as the largest, most significant drug investigation in the history of our county," said Waukesha County Sheriff Daniel Trawicki.

The charges result from a lengthy probe begun quietly in January 2004 by Waukesha County narcotics investigators whose work revealed that a single network of people was responsible for a large share of the cocaine finding its way into Waukesha.

"The buys we were making, the information we were getting kept leading us back to a particular group of people, a particular group of residences," said Lt. Charles Wood, operational supervisor of the Waukesha County Metro Drug Enforcement Group.

DOJ_NMG_0106904

After state and federal agencies joined the inquiry, which featured court-approved telephone taps, investigators linked the cocaine peddled in Waukesha to large-scale suppliers in Milwaukee.

"This was an investigation that was not going to just stay in Waukesha," said Daniel Layber, special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the state Division of Criminal Investigation. "It used to be that the drug dealers that you saw in Waukesha were relatively small. It sure isn't that way anymore." Phone calls monitored

Court records show that while the major players were constantly watching their backs and taking steps to insulate themselves from the drugs, money and drug deals carried out by underlings, investigators were secretly monitoring their conversations to keep abreast of their activities while learning of more associates.

"During the court-ordered monitoring of these communications between July 11, 2006, and September 8, 2006, over 1,000 intercepted calls were drug-related," according to a criminal complaint in the case. "Over 50 people involved in trafficking cocaine were identified."

One conversation took place Aug. 11, according to the complaint, when investigators listened as Javier Aguilera, accused of being a major marijuana and cocaine trafficker in Waukesha, told his father, accused of delivering drugs and collecting drug debts for his son as well as himself, where to find cocaine and money hidden in the their Arcadian Ave. home.

"I have it there in the house, in your room," Javier Aguilera told Brijido Aguilera, according to the complaint. "You know, there's a small box in the room where the mirror is.

"I tossed it in there. I don't know if Mom puts her gold in there or what, but I left your earnings in there, too."

In another conversation, according to the complaint, investigators listened as the father complained to the son about his methods during a discussion on what to do with a 10-pound marijuana shipment.

"Listen, I've been calling you for some time, but you don't answer the damn telephone," the elder Aguilera said. "I can't work like that."

After the son told his father to stow the marijuana in the garage until he arrived, the elder Aguilera said, "It's there in the same place, but one thing, don't speak to me in that tone of voice."

As investigators went from phone to phone, the conversations they heard eventually led them to figures in Milwaukee who supplied buyers with kilograms of cocaine.

"I got the buns," Teodoro Meraz told Andrew Oblak during a conversation Oct. 6, after Meraz received a shipment of cocaine and was offering to sell a kilogram - or a bun - to Oblak.

In addition to charging suspected high-, mid- and street-level dealers, the indictment included people accused of packaging and cutting cocaine, and a woman accused of storing it.

On July 31, Javier Aguilera called Kayla Lapp just after she had ordered dinner at a restaurant with her mother; he told her that he needed her to meet him immediately at her Waukesha home so that he could retrieve cocaine from his stash there for an impending deal, according to the complaint.

"Why can't you just wait 'til we're done eating?" Lapp said, according to the complaint.

"Because I need it now," Aguilera replied, the complaint says. "Because it's cash."

Charged in the indictment and complaint with supplying kilograms of cocaine were: Meraz, 27, of St. Francis; Gabriel Urbina, 29, of Milwaukee; Antonio Cruz, 56, of Milwaukee; Oblak, 20, of Milwaukee; Richard Welsh, 18, of Milwaukee; and Ana Hurtado, 37, of Milwaukee.

Javier Aguilera, 29, was charged in the complaint with being at the top of the Waukesha network, directing his father, 51, and others who distributed multiple-ounce quantities of cocaine to street-level dealers.

The others charged in the case include: Pedro Romo, 27; Alejandro Romo, 21; Fidel Moreno, 21; Jose Meraz, 31; Federico A. Meza, 27; Leonardo Urbina, 30; Elias Perez, 22; Michael V. Popp, 23; Wagas Tariq, 23; Usman Tariq, 22; Jeffrey Scott Wingert, 34; Enrique Urbina, 23; Jose R. Quinonez, 25; Miguel A. Valdez, 29; Christian Gabriel Martinez, 21; Miguel Healy, 34; Jose Godina, 29; Sal Uribe, 27; Juan Carlos Flores-Bobadillia, 20; Rick J. Rivera, 27; Francisco R. Aguilera, 23; Sean D. Kruschke, 30; Jonathan David Colla, 23; Jose Alfredo Aguilera, 21; and Lapp, 19. The complaint did not list their hometowns.

"I think that you can determine the significance of this case by the number of people arrested and the scope of their activity," said James Bohn, assistant special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Search warrants were executed recently at a home in St. Francis, three homes in Milwaukee and five homes in Waukesha, court records say.

"As a result of the search warrants, we're holding 11 cars that we're hoping to seize," said Wood, of the Waukesha County Metro Drug Enforcement Group. "We also seized 2 kilos of cocaine, cash and three residences that we expect will become the subject of forfeiture proceedings."

DOJ_NMG_0106905

Five From Hazleton, Freeland Indicted On Heroin Conspiracy Charges (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), December 15, 2006

Five people from Hazleton and Freeland were indicted last week in connection with an alleged heroin distribution conspiracy that operated in the Hazleton area since January, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced today.

Thomas A. Marino, U.S. Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, said the following suspects were charged with conspiracy to distribute more than 100 grams of heroin:

· Anthony Rish, 55, of Freeland
· Sheryl Raab, 46, of Freeland
· Margaret Grohman, 51, of Hazleton
· Anthony Mundo, 36, of Freeland
· Michael Bonney, 27, of Hazleton

Marino said the defendants were also charged with additional counts of distribution of heroin – Rish with four counts, Raab with three counts, Grohman with seven counts, Mundo with six counts, and Bonney with one count.

The charges stem from an investigation by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and Pennsylvania State Police.

Marino said each of the defendants faces a sentence of five to 40 years in prison, a fine of up to $2 million, and a period of supervised release of four years to life to follow any sentence of imprisonment if convicted of the conspiracy charge.

Each count of distribution of heroin carries a potential maximum sentence of 20 years in prison, a $1 million fine and at least three years of supervised release, he said.

Marino said Assistant U.S. District Attorney Francis P. Sempa is prosecuting the case.

Marijuana Co-op Duo Out On Bail (CCT)

By Josh Richman

The Contra Costa Times, December 15, 2006

OAKLAND - Two people arrested in a raid at a Hayward medical marijuana cooperative were selling the drug to anyone, not just people with medical conditions, the federal government contends.

The attorney for Hayward residents Shon Matthew Squier, 34, and Valerie Lynn Herschel, 23, the Local Patients Cooperative owner and manager, respectively, says the two were working legally with Hayward and the Alameda County Sheriff's Office.

Agents arrested the two Tuesday on suspicion of conspiracy, marijuana distribution and maintaining drug-involved premises. Drug Enforcement Administration and Internal Revenue Service agents raided the Foothill Boulevard cooperative and each suspect's home.

Federal Magistrate Judge Wayne Brazil told them Wednesday that each of the crimes is punishable by as many as 20 years in prison and involve maximum fines of $500,000 to $1 million.

Brazil ordered Squier freed on $300,000 bond and Herschel freed on $100,000 bond, each secured by their homes. Both are due back in court Jan. 5.

Brazil warned Squier and Herschel, 23, that although there's a debate over the conflict between the state's medical marijuana law and the federal ban, "those debates unfortunately are irrelevant to what goes on in this court" and state law provides them no defense. "Congress gets to decide," he said.

Until their properties can be assessed and posted to secure their freedom, their families have signed promises to pay should either defendant leave town. Herschel's parents and Squier's fiancee and sister were in court Wednesday.

After Wednesday's hearing, defense attorney Bruce Atwater noted that IRS agents took part in Tuesday's raid and that prosecutors are emphasizing the money that flowed through Squier's account. Atwater said he believes tax charges will figure prominently when a federal grand jury indicts the two next month. He called it a "backdoor way"' for the federal government to persecute medical marijuana providers.

Squier and Herschel "worked well with the city; they worked well with the Alameda County Sheriff's (Office). ... They were compliant with state law," Atwater said. "I guess their crime is that they made too much money."

In an affidavit, DEA Special Agent Kenny Lee wrote: "I believe that Hayward Local Patients Co-op attempts to disguise the breadth of its criminal activity by claiming that it caters exclusively to persons suffering from medical illnesses, when in fact persons without any medical condition can purchase marijuana ... at the retail establishment."

Reach Josh Richman of the Oakland Tribune at jrichman@angnewspapers.com or 510-208-6428.

DOJ_NMG_0106906

IMMIGRATION:

The System Is The Problem (WP)

By Tamar Jacoby

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

At dawn on Tuesday more than a thousand Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents descended on six plants owned by Swift & Co., one of the country's largest meat processors. Some 1,300 workers were arrested, and operations at all six slaughterhouses were suspended.

Seen in one light, the raids were perfectly justified. Both employer and employees were breaking the law. It's a law that's being violated on a massive scale from coast to coast, and the public is increasingly upset about it.

The only catch: Swift has been trying for years to comply with our poorly conceived immigration laws, coping as best it could with an impossible situation. Like a driver who finally goes through a broken traffic light, the company and its workers aren't the problem -- the system is.

Both Swift and its employees -- who bore the brunt of the punishment -- are caught in an economic bind far bigger than themselves. Meat processing is dirty and dangerous. Fewer and fewer members of the increasingly educated American workforce are interested in the jobs.

As a result, although it now pays an average of $13 an hour, or $25,000 a year, the industry increasingly relies on foreign workers, not because they're cheap -- $25,000 a year is what trained paramedics and college-educated kindergarten teachers make in meatpacking states such as Iowa and Kansas -- but simply because they'll do the work. If immigrants weren't available, companies such as Swift would have to close, and both meatpacking and the agriculture that depends on it -- cattle and hog producers -- would eventually move to other countries.

Not only that, but U.S. law makes the bind much worse for both employers and employees. Despite the meatpacking industry's well-known need for foreign labor, the United States offers virtually no way for these workers to enter the country legally. Every year the economy as a whole creates some 500,000 more unskilled jobs than Americans want to do, yet we issue only 5,000 year-round visas for the immigrants who might fill them. For companies such as Swift and its workers, there's no good answer, and it's not surprising that many break the law.

But even that isn't the end of the cruel twists of Swift's story. Far from ignoring or shrugging off the law, the firm has been trying to comply with it. When job applicants started showing up with what the company suspected were false papers, it tried inquiring into their backgrounds -- only to be sued for discrimination by the Justice Department.

When the government created a program meant to help employers verify that their workers were in the country legally by checking Social Security numbers against a central database, Swift was among the first to sign up. And when that program didn't seem to be catching the worst offenders -- people using not false Social Security cards but stolen ones -- Swift came to Washington to testify in Congress about the problem. The reward: That was precisely the offense that ICE raided the company for on Tuesday.

Don't misunderstand: Swift is no band of saints. Everyone involved -- the company, its workers, the U.S. government -- knows that the kind of compliance required to pass muster today is a charade. But it is a charade our dysfunctional immigration system has all but forced the firm and its workers to play.

Does this mean it's all right to break the law? Of course not.

Our nudge-nudge, wink-wink immigration system -- unrealistic laws, all but ignored on the ground -- must be replaced by a law enforcement regime that works: more honest quotas, enforced to the letter, including in the workplace. Raids such as those that took place this week would be justified in the context of an immigration overhaul of the kind proposed by the president and passed by the Senate last spring. Workers need a legal way to enter the country. Businesses need a legitimate way to get workers, plus a reliable verification system -- not unlike credit card verification -- to tell them which workers are legal and which aren't. And once these things are in place, there will be no excuse for breaking the rules.

But until then, raids of the kind that occurred this week can only be counterproductive: Companies trying to do the right thing will be driven out of business, even as those happy to flout the law will find themselves with more of a competitive advantage. And meanwhile illegal workers will be driven further underground.

I happened to be with a group of employers when the Swift raids were announced -- not food-processing companies but contractors, landscapers, growers and others who also count on unskilled workers -- brought together by their growing anger at the broken immigration system and the lies it makes them tell.

DOJ_NMG_0106907

"What am I supposed to do?" one employer asked bitterly. "I'm paying $22.50 an hour. I still can't find enough workers. I'm making less and less money as a result -- I've stopped bidding for lots of jobs. And I could go to jail just for trying to get the work done."

And the sad truth is, he can't do much. Only Congress can fix the system he and his workers are trapped in. As the Swift raids remind us, it's a job that cannot wait.

Tamar Jacoby is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute.

Texas Official's Report Ignites A New Border Conflict (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

It is a Texas showdown, a war of words over illegal immigration at the border.

State Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn fired the first shot with a recent report that, for some, says the unthinkable: Illegal immigrants not only pay their fair share in taxes, but they are also good for the economy.

"The absence of 1.4 million undocumented immigrants in Texas . . .would have been a loss to our gross state product of $17.7 billion," Strayhorn said in a statement. Overall, the report said, illegal immigrants put about $420 million more into state coffers than they take out.

Strayhorn billed the report as the first ever by a state finance official, a crucial step forward. But for Texans who believe hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants are overrunning their state, the report is a misstep.

State Rep. Leo Berman (R-Tyler), who introduced legislation that would bar Texas from recognizing children born to illegal immigrants in American hospitals as U.S. citizens, called the report "outrageous."

Dan Stein, a spokesman for the Washington-based Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), which supports measures to deter illegal immigration, ripped the report as a composite of "design flaws, assumptions and conclusions in direct contrast to our years of exhaustive studies on this issue, and to our most recent Texas report, which shows illegal aliens cost Texas taxpayers $3.7 billion annually."

In these times of tough proposals against illegal immigration in Congress and huge protest marches by illegal immigrant workers and their supporters, it is not surprising that the comptroller's report caused a stir.

